By dysfunctional thinking here means every thought that comes into your head absorbs your consciousness totally, and that you, when I say identify, this is the key. When you identify with thought, there's a sense of me, a self in every thought. There's no space between you, who you ultimately are beyond thought.

There's no, you're totally unaware of who you are beyond thought because you're so totally identified with that voice in the head that never stops talking. It goes on and on. Oh, why don't you shut up, shut up.

But that's the voice too. That's just another aspect of the voice. It says, why can't I shut up, shut up, shut up?

Well, that's the voice also, so that doesn't work. And some people are so unconscious when I say you have a voice in the head that never stops talking. Say, what are you talking about?

What voice? This kind of a voice. What is that one?

So from anybody who is not, who is totally identified with mind, is virtually trapped in that particular dimension. So you have unhappiness arising simply as a product of your mind, even without an external challenge. And then you have other types of unhappiness arising because there is an external challenge in your life.

There is a difficult relationship situation. There is a difficult work situation, a difficult financial situation, a difficult health situation. So you might think, well, I'm fully justified in being unhappy because let me tell you about what's going on in my life.

And then you will tell me that, yes, you have a right to be unhappy. And so, yes, but if you look closely at those things, and again, it requires a certain degree of awareness. When you seemingly become unhappy, and I'm using again, just reminding you, I'm using this as a generic term, it could be anything from slight irritation to extreme anger or extreme sadness or anything in between, or even an undercurrent of an undercurrent of unhappiness, which many, many people, almost everybody has, unless they have awakened.

There's an undercurrent of dissatisfaction, of unease. And it comes in every situation, whether they know it or not, there's an undercurrent there. It's also, it's emotional.

These are emotions that have been created by years and years of dysfunctional thinking, and that undercurrent is there. So something in your life situation is challenging. We can look at one small example of how unhappiness arises.

Let's say, just something seemingly insignificant, but life is full of seemingly little things and they accumulate. So if you become irritated with one little thing after another little thing, after another little thing, that eventually grows, and becomes part of your personality, and you become an irritated person. And the irritated person is actually, without knowing it, looking for more irritation.

Just waiting, just the slightest thing to go wrong. And then you make a phone call to your bank. Please wait, we appreciate your call, but we are in the Philippines and we can't answer immediately or they don't say that.

You have to wait, please. Okay, there you are. And five minutes pass.

We value your call very much, but there's nobody yet ready. Okay. And then the mind starts saying things.

If it hasn't started already, this is dreadful. How can they do it? I'm going to change banks, but they're all the same, aren't they?

Why can't I get a human being to talk to? What's wrong with them? I hate this whole civilization anyway.

All kinds of things. And you become unhappy if you weren't unhappy already, because you were probably a little bit unhappy already, and then it grows. And then you're dealing with the next thing, or if you're lucky, you get a lovely Filipino person that is, hi, how are you?

And say, oh, but you have to be open. If you're not open, you don't even know that there's another. Finally, there's a human being there, but you don't even know that anymore.

I've been waiting for 25 minutes on this. And then the next thing comes up in your life, and you're already bringing that into that situation. And there goes an irritated person, an angry person.

And then you have to go to the airport, and you wait in line. It is not moving. Why can't they?

Why don't they? They're completely incompetent. What's the story?

Now, if you look, how does the unhappiness arise? And again, it needs a little bit of awareness so that you're aware of what your mind is doing. If you're totally identified with your mind, you don't even know what's going on.

You are the thoughts. Every thought has a self in it, a sense of self in it. There's an awareness.

You can suddenly see, oh, where is the unhappiness arising? Is it because I'm sitting or standing here waiting for this or that? Or is it because I am telling myself something about sitting here, waiting, and about standing here?

Where is the unhappiness coming from? Could it be that the narrative that I have created around this particular situation, rather than the situation, is causing the unhappiness? It's possible, but you have to figure it, try it out.

Now, because you've got plenty of time, because they're not answering the phone. So you investigate. It's a spiritual investigation while you're waiting.

How would I experience this situation if I did not add these thoughts to it? If I didn't add the possibly unnecessary burden of thought to it, how would I experience this moment without the addition of a narrative? Okay, let's find out.

I've got plenty of time. And so there you are, holding the receiver.

[Speaker 16] (3:10:44 - 3:10:45)
Okay.

[Speaker 1] (3:10:47 - 4:24:45)
Well, I would experience this moment as I'm breathing, and I feel myself breathing, and I'm looking out of the window, and I'm looking around the room, and as I'm breathing, I can feel the energy in my body. There's an energy that's, the body is alive, and I can feel that it is alive. I've got nothing else to do right now.

I can feel the body is alive. There's an aliveness that pervades every cell of the body. And suddenly, you now realize what this is without the addition of thought.

Without the addition of thought that says, this should not be happening. This, because ultimately, that's what it's saying. This should not be happening.

Or it might say, this should not be happening to me. Or it says, why is this always happening to me? Those are, that's the type of thought.

And then you experience, okay, that's a relatively small situation, but you are looking into the origin of unhappiness. So you can become free in little situations of the mental, emotional, reactive patterns that before you were completely identified with, so identified that they became you, that they became part of your personality, part of the person. And so that's an amazing thing.

And then you can, after a while, these are all little challenges in life. And then occasionally a bigger challenge comes. And again, and a big challenge comes, you lose your job.

You go to a doctor and there's a health challenge. Relationship comes to an end or relationship is very difficult and toxic. Something collapses around you.

And again, you can, there is a similar, yes, you realize there is a challenge here and you realize that it may be necessary to take some action. But in the meantime, you can experiment and see, this requires, by the way, more developed, more intense presence when a bigger challenge comes into your life. But you've practiced already with little things, telephone calls and lineups in the supermarket and airport and countless other things.

So you've already been successfully practicing with that, just getting ready for the next big challenge to come into your life. And it will come. And there it comes.

And then you have already developed the muscle presence power in you has already grown. The ability to relinquish dysfunctional thinking and being able to be with a situation as it is right now, without the addition of this burden of superfluous suffering, creating thought. And let's show you have developed that already.

And then the big challenge comes and there you are. Let's say you lose your job. And one day you go to the office and the boss says the famous expression, they don't usually say, you're fired.

That's somewhere else in New York, somewhere they'll say you're fired. But usually there are much more clients say, I'm afraid we'll have to let you go. As if you had been longing to go for a long time.

And perhaps you have, you just didn't know it. We'll have to let you go. Really?

Oh, thank you so much. Finally, they're letting me go. We'll have to let you go.

And, but usually it's not people who usually react as and there comes a slightly bigger challenge because who knows how you're going to pay the mortgage next month. Who knows? And there we go.

And if you, if presence has grown in you, you can then walk out of the office building with a, carrying the box of your belongings from your office. And then you put it in your car and then you sit in your car. And again, your question, if I didn't add any thought to this, how would I experience this moment?

It is as it is. And right at this moment, it's actually fine. It's actually, this moment is actually better than it would be if I were still stuck in the office.

This moment, certainly now the mind says, yeah, but you've got the future to think about. And of course, yes, you may have to take action, but the question is how, what is the quality of your consciousness in the present moment? Because that determines what kind of action you take is the basis for your action, a sense of fear or anger or panic.

I need to write another job. And then if you go, if you get another interview, you're so, so tense that they don't want you to say, no, we can't have a nervous person like that. But so you differentiate between taking action and even perhaps focusing your mind on what, what is it that I can do?

What steps can I take? What are the possibilities? I usually, when I do something on that, I get a piece, I'm a paper and pen person.

I write it down on a piece of paper and then see the possibilities. And then you return into this present moment. So you develop the ability to always have your conscious attention anchored in the present moment rather than in your thinking mind.

So you're at, this is the, you're becoming aligned with the present moment and it requires, I must admit, some situations require more intense presence than others. If it's a bigger thing, more intense presence. You go to the doctor's office and the doctor says, okay, you have about 12 months and then maybe not beyond.

That's a big challenge. It's a huge challenge because it means, but by the way, he may be wrong, but it means time has been taken, virtually been taken away from you. It's like, like, like some deity, malevolent deity, or maybe a good deity that suddenly you have no more time or, because you had been looking for some self-fulfillment through time, unless you're 95 years old, but maybe even then, you've been looking for self-fulfillment, for some kind of completion of who you are, of the story you want.

You want the happy ending of the story of me. Of course it never comes, but don't tell anybody. It never, the happy ending of the story of me never comes.

And then somebody takes away time from you. And that could be the most dreadful shock to you as a person, because then you mentally go somewhere that doesn't exist anymore. No more vacation, no more this, no more that.

And so some people have become terribly, terribly, dreadfully unhappy in that situation, which has only been normal, I suppose, one would say normal, but others have become intensely present through having no more time. And they went, I've met some, and some, the body began to deteriorate more and more, more quickly. And they were like luminous lights.

They were just sitting there looking at me. And I remember a lady years ago who came to see me when I was still seeing people. She had developed this illness, only had a few more months, and she was just, every time she came, she was more luminous and just sit there.

And we were just present together. There was nobody left. There was no person left.

There was only a space of conscious presence. So the person had been burned up completely by this. That was amazing how, there's another thing I read a couple of years ago.

There was a musician in England, apparently quite famous, but I had never heard of him, which doesn't mean anything. So there was a pop musician and he went to the doctor. I don't know if he is still alive now or not.

He went to the doctor and he says he told him, the doctor told him something like that. And this is a very rare case. He said in an interview, he walked out of the doctor's office in a state of enormous elation.

He was just, and suddenly he said he was able to enjoy every moment intensely. And he said, why didn't I do this before? And what happened to him?

So some people are forced into awakening by a situation. Now, any big challenge in your life potentially is that it is a way of how life forces you into awakening. And there are some people who have never come into touch with any spiritual teaching and it happened to them.

Others encounter intense suffering and they suffer and suffer, and then they come into contact with the spiritual teaching that points to the possibility of transcendence. And suddenly the very same suffering situation suddenly becomes the opening. So any seemingly bad event in your life, which usually entails some kind of loss, disappointment, something crumbling, somebody leaving you or dying, somebody dies close to you, you lose your job, whatever it may be, that any such event can be extremely helpful and significant spiritually.

It's not only a foretaste of what is to come later. If you surrender into it, it can be an opening into the spiritual dimension and into a stillness. And even such a relatively mundane thing as, for example, finding your car got stolen when you go back to get to your car, it's no longer there, it got stolen.

Or even a pleasant weekend with friends or family coming to an end, anything coming to an end, having to say goodbye. Even such a trivial thing as dropping something and it breaks and you, some, an object that you liked, you lose your job. All these things, seemingly negative things, or there's some kind of loss or dissolution of form, can be an access point into a deeper dimension within you, traditionally called spiritual.

If you catch that moment, and instead of going into inner resistance, mental condemnation, telling yourself how dreadful that is, this event, then experiencing the corresponding emotions, the emotions that correspond to those thoughts, that these things that are happening right now or have just happened, should not have happened, have no right to have happened. This is something wrong with the world, because this just happened, or is happening. And the mental commentary that tells you all these things, and then the painful emotions, that's a natural reaction.

And the ego actually loves that, because it strengthens the ego, when it can resist something and become upset about something, make something wrong, or someone, usually it's associated, you can make yourself wrong too, or somebody close to you, another person, an entire situation that you're in. So those are normal reactions that the false self actually enjoys, even if they are painful, it strengthens itself. But if you catch yourself at those moments of loss, something going wrong, something or someone leaving you, and if at that moment you come into complete alignment internally with what is, then that takes you into that stillness.

And you may experience a glimpse of peace that cannot be explained causally through the situation that you are in. In fact, it seems to contradict the situation that you are in, which looks negative, but suddenly, because you are surrendered to this event, suddenly you can sense that peace. And at that moment, you have become free of externals, you have transcended the normal state of consciousness, where your mental emotional state is completely dependent on what's going on around you.

If things are going fine, you're relatively happy. Things break down, there's loss, you become unhappy. So it's that continuous movement.

So you are at the mercy of other people, how they behave towards you, at the mercy of unpredictable situations, whether the plane is on time or not, whether you get to that place in time or not, whether this person does what he or she is supposed to do in relation to you, or whether he or she lets you down, as the little mental story goes. He let me down. Oh, yeah, terrible.

Now, you might have noticed that living in this world, it's fairly normal to experience being let down by situations and people. Even missing your plane is a letting down. Expectations crumble, disappointment happens.

So everybody living here, as part of a fairly significant part of their life experience, is being let down by situations, events, people. You can let yourself down because you have these expectations and you can't manage to do it. I'm always letting myself down.

So that's an interpretation. It's a little story in the head that causes painful emotions. And it's based on a misperception of what this world is all about.

It's based on the erroneous assumption that this world is here to make you happy. And the erroneous assumption that this world is not supposed to let you down. And if a person or situation or an event happens that lets you down, that there is something deeply wrong.

So if that is your underlying assumption, then you'll experience life as quite frustrating. And a lot of the time, time upsetting and disappointing. Because there's a clash between your assumption of how things should be in the mind and how things actually are.

And that gap is painful. Suffering arises. And suffering arises because you haven't recognized the nature of this dimensional world.

World where everything, to use the Buddha's terminology, everything is impermanent and unstable. But once you recognize that that's how it is, and you recognize that the world is not here to make you happy, neither is it here to make you unhappy, but it's here to challenge you. How can I cope with the feeling of family members not understanding you and betraying you?

I feel my family has betrayed me and I can't forgive them. How can I understand these feelings? Thank you.

Now you have to see that when you say that your family has betrayed you, that's an interpretation of their behavior. It's a thought in your head that causes you corresponding to feel corresponding emotions. It doesn't sound very good, does it?

My family has betrayed me. And when that thought goes through your head again and again, what you feel is not pleasant. But is that the truth or is it an interpretation?

But this is frustrating to the ego because when there's no longer any story where you oppose the other, where you make yourself feel superior to the other, then there's no food for the ego anymore. Hopefully you had a light meal, otherwise all your consciousness will be drawn into the stomach. I'm beginning to receive your questions.

Thank you very much. And we will, this evening, have our first session dealing with questions. If possible, write as legibly as you can, otherwise I'll get really irritated.

And my mind will say, do they expect me to read this, to be able to read this? Why can't they write more legibly? Isn't it common sense that they should write legibly?

Why do people do things like that? That would be a normal ego reaction to something that in itself is perfectly okay because you can either read it or you can't, but the ego adds a story to it. And behind the story is always an attempt to be more right than the other person.

There's always an attempt to have in some kind of superiority. It's unconscious, of course, ego is always unconscious. And this is alternatively what actually I don't get irritated as you might have guessed.

If there's a paper that's not legible, I look at it. Okay, I'll put this aside and give it more attention later. In the meantime, I'll read the legible ones.

And then if there's time later, I'll give it more attention. There's no problem without a story. And there's no, you are not wrong and I'm not right.

This is just what is. It's just a tiny example of the difference between aligning yourself to the simple isness of the present moment and imposing a story on it in the service of the self that wants to inflate itself, indignation, irritation. They should.

Why do they, don't they know better? I said, oh, they're all stories in the service of a false sense of self. And so the, in presence, all this, what I sometimes call unnecessary baggage that people manufacture mentally and emotionally or that unnecessary baggage that really is a, there's a heaviness to it that they carry around doesn't arise anymore.

And there's the simple, this is what is. I can either do this or I can do that. I can deal with it now.

I can put it aside. No story. But this is frustrating to the ego because when there's no longer any story where you oppose the other, where you make yourself feel superior to the other, then there's no food for the ego anymore.

But there's an incredible lightness and the lightness of being comes and the heaviness goes out of situations. That really, that's what the ego is. The heavy me.

And even when it attempts to make itself superior, what it doesn't recognize is that all these are really forms of suffering. The ego doesn't even recognize suffering as suffering. It doesn't realize that when you get angry or irritated about somebody else's behavior and bring up a big story about it, you are actually in a state of suffering.

If you were able to have attention in your body, you would notice that your body is suffering because those things affect the smooth, harmonious working of the energy field that goes through the body. So an angry thought has an effect on the body. Small irritation all has an effect and the body doesn't really like it.

But the ego, the ego itself is not in touch with the body. So it mistakes suffering for something good. Anger, I can really get into this.

So you can look at your own life and see where you are manufacturing unnecessary stories, both in small situations and in bigger life situations and in situations to do with relatives, family members, partners, ex-partners, a wonderful source of egoic stories, can talk about your ex-husband or wife for hours, either to somebody else if they're ready to listen or in your own mind. Or you had a confrontation or an exchange with somebody yesterday and you can go on, continue that in your mind and say so many hurtful things to the other person that unfortunately you couldn't think of in the situation. But you can relive it now and it's almost as good as the real thing.

So in that fantasy world of the mind, you can be right again and again and the other person can be wrong again and again. How wonderful. These things are not, all this is what we call unconscious.

So people don't know what they are doing. For them, that is their reality. Now can we understand why Jesus said, forgive them for they know not what they do.

They're unconscious. It's an automatic process of ego inflation, of ego reinforcement. It's conditioned, learned.

It's part of the structure of the mind. What part does willpower play in the awakening process, if any? Don't I use some willpower to motivate myself to follow your teachings?

I must listen to Eka now. I don't want to, but... So it's not willpower because if you use willpower and you listen because you think you should be listening or you're a spiritual person and you should be listening to a spiritual talk to just prove to yourself that you are spiritual or you are determined to awaken.

No, there is something in you that wants to listen and that responds. And that in you that wants to listen has nothing to do with willpower. It's an energy field that rises up.

And whatever, the only way you can listen to any spiritual teaching is from that deeper level, not from the conceptual mental level. And whenever you listen to a spiritual teaching, it's always from the deeper place. It's always a recognition of what you already knew deep down.

So the truth is always recognized because it comes from, you listen from the same place from where the teaching arises. And so it recognizes itself. The truth, you already know it, even though it may not, it may be too deep for you to access it for yourself.

Then you listen to a spiritual teaching and suddenly the truth that is in you is called forth and drawn out and responses, oh yeah. And you immediately sense, that's it, yes. Why didn't I know that before?

Of course you didn't know it before because now you recognize it. Now there's something else in you that does not want to listen. The egoic entity may sometimes take over and say something like, I can't deal with that spiritual stuff now.

God, it's just too much. What's the point of all this? It's not getting me anywhere, is it?

Been doing that for years. Where is it getting me? Nowhere.

The story in the head. And then you believe in what it says. And sometimes it can stop people temporarily from going to the spiritual teaching.

But then if that goes on for long enough, you start to suffer more and more. And finally the suffering becomes the thing that awakens you again, that creates the gap or the opening in you and you're ready, ah. Now you want to listen again.

Can't stand the suffering anymore. So willpower is not it. Now it may sometimes look to, at first sight, it may look, when I say, be present, you can choose to be present.

When there's a certain level of presence in you already, you can choose to be present rather than to drift back into your mind. And there is an alertness associated with presence. But it is a relaxed alertness, not a tight alertness.

It's not a, no, it's a, you see the difference? It's easier acting it out than talking about it. It's not the tight, almost fearful alertness, or even some anger behind it.

It's a relaxed alertness. So it's almost, it might seem incompatible almost, relaxed alertness, but it's not. So the alertness has an intensity to it.

And, but that's not willpower. The non-relaxed alertness has an element of willpower in it, and that's not it. You can sometimes see in paintings or drawings of Zen masters, that alertness, and in Zen masters, that particular version of spiritual awakening, there is a fierceness.

There's a fierceness to the way they look sometimes in the ancient drawings. And there is also a fierceness to the way in which they teach. That's partly culturally conditioned, because everything comes through the particular veil, the teaching is the same, no matter what cultural veil or conditioned veil it comes through.

But the way it manifests can be conditioned by a culture, or in the case of a teacher, it can be conditioned by the energy field of the teacher. Some teachers are, seem more forthright and aggressive, almost. It's not really aggressive, but it might look so to the ego.

So there can be, there's a fierceness sometimes to the alertness, which is sometimes required to break through all the mental stuff you need to go into. Now, whether you look fierce at the same time, doesn't matter, you can. But if you look, the greatest drawings of Zen masters, at first sight, they look fierce.

If you look more closely, you'll see that behind the fierceness, there's a compassion and a gentleness. And of course, those can only be done by artists who are masters, who can capture what the inner reality of the Zen master, which is both the fierceness and behind it is hiding compassion. The same applies to meditation practice.

Willpower is not a good way to ensure that your meditation practice is successful. In other words, it doesn't work. Because willpower in meditation is the famous lid on the boiling kettle.

You're holding it down, forcing yourself to be still instead of surrendering into the present moment so that stillness arises naturally, forcing yourself to be still. And then that may work for a while. And when the next episode of unconsciousness happens, which will be soon, when you go back into your normal life, after the meditation, you come downstairs into the kitchen.

And before you know it, you're shouting at somebody. And everybody's disturbing your serenity. Just to remind you, especially people who are meditators or have been meditating for some time, a few years or many years, perhaps the greatest obstacle to true meditation is the idea that you are doing a meditation.

And as part of that idea, the belief or assumption that you're trying to get somewhere or achieve something through the meditation. And so meditation becomes like the rest of your life. What you do is a means to an end.

And the end is considered more important than the present moment. So you're doing in order to achieve or get or attain something. And that underlies most people's meditation, that unconscious assumption.

And that's a great obstacle because true meditation is about something much more immediate. It's getting in touch with, we could say, being, which is prior to all doing. Now, being has been talked about in philosophy.

There are big books written about being. Jean-Paul Sartre wrote Being and Nothingness. Heidegger wrote Being and Time, two very big books.

They're interesting, well, in some respects. But they're still trying to reach being through doing. In their case, it's through thinking and conceptualization to reach what they correctly assume to be something absolutely fundamental that underlies all of existence.

They try to reach it through conceptualization and thinking, which is another way of doing, of course. Thinking is a kind of doing also. And they didn't quite realize, of course, they were professional philosophers, so they couldn't stop thinking.

Philosophy being the activity of thinking, at least in modern times. In very ancient times, there was something else there that went beyond thinking. So true meditation is getting in touch with something deeper than any kind of doing, where you no longer try to achieve or attain anything, any point in the future.

Add anything to yourself as some kind of additional achievement or even realization. In fact, the belief that what you need is some kind of realization is the great obstacle to true realization. So being, the substratum, to use a geological term as a kind of analogy, being is a substratum of all existence and all life, that which underlies it all.

And that can be known directly within you, but not in the sense in which things in this world are known. Not even in the sense in which anything is known that becomes an object in your consciousness. It's a direct knowing where subject, the subject that knows and the object that is known merge into one.

Now, being or to be, sometimes people overlook that when you say I am, that is the first person singular of the verb to be. So being can be sensed directly. Again, I have to mention not as an object, but as object and subject in one can be sensed directly if you realize the I am that underlies all of which arises in your life.

All sense perceptions, all thinking, all emotions, feelings, that which makes it possible for sense perceptions to be there, thoughts to be there, emotions to be there, what is it that makes it possible for these things to arise and then to become your so-called life? Because your life consists of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions. I think that's about it.

I can't, there's nothing else is there. It's just a different combination of sense perceptions, thoughts and emotions or feelings that make up individual people's lives. So a different combination of sense perceptions, this is what constitutes individuality as we call it.

But if you look closely at what individuality or individual existence means, it is a mixture, a particular mixture of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions and feelings. So then we can then, the common denominator in all individuality so-called is they're all different kinds of mixture and there are billions of people on this planet with each one slightly different or sometimes fundamentally different mixture of sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions. Okay, we have that.

And yet what makes it possible for these sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions to arise and to become a person? What is that? What is the light in which these are known?

What or who is the knower of all these sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions? And that is the substratum, that is the being or the knowing, the eternal subject of all knowing. And essentially you are that.

What is infinitely more fundamental than anything that arises in your life that's to do with experiences. When we say experiences, really it's sense perceptions and thoughts and emotions coming together, experiences that make up your life. So we are getting at now as an experience, an experiential realization here and now is who or what you are beyond sense perceptions and experiences.

Experiences includes those things, sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, feelings. Is there a more fundamental dimension than the temporary coming together of your experiences, which of course come and go fairly quickly and then evaporate completely and then the person is gone. So the question is, who are you beyond those things?

But don't look for an answer on any kind of conceptual level, but as a direct realization here and now, sensing in yourself that which makes all those things possible, your life experience. And that is the being that underlies it all. We could say also the unconditioned consciousness that underlies it all.

So you can access here the silent spaces in our meditation. Become aware of the silent spaces. This is why we still call it a meditation or it's not a doing.

Become aware of the silent spaces here, like now and now and now and realize that when you become aware of the silent space, there is no thinking anymore. There's a cessation of thinking. It arises naturally.

And what remains of you when there's this cessation of thinking and with that, the cessation of doing? All you know then, what is left, is there is a presence there, but it has no form or attributes. What remains is a silent presence in the background.

And you can sense that silent presence not just with your head, but I could almost say with your entire being, with your whole so-called body, you can sense the silent presence in the background. And the background, when it temporarily actually becomes the foreground, and you sense it not as something, but as yourself. That is why I say subject and object merge into one.

The perceiving, it's not perception, the knowing subject and that which is known are one. And that's the realization of being. And you don't need to read 500 pages or whatever of Sartre's being in nothingness or Heidegger's being in time.

Oh, that's a relief. Perhaps the mind comes in and says, can it be that simple? Of course, it is the most immediate and the most natural thing to know that in yourself.

But somehow humans at some point lost it. Perhaps that's what's called the fall. And humans are now regaining it here and now.

And when you regain something that had been lost, you know it more deeply. So what was before a natural connectedness with being, perhaps many thousands of years ago, natural, by the way, means you don't even know it's there. You're just connected with being.

And there's that rootedness in being there now becomes a conscious rootedness in being. And that's the next step in the evolution. Could also be called the awakening.

Your challenge is in daily life to stay connected with that dimension, realize that dimension as the essential I am, the self-realization. So that remains then in the background as this silent presence or spaciousness. It remains in the background while in the foreground you deal with your daily life.

And you even you think again, you do things, you respond, you feel, you have emotions. But now there's a fundamental difference when that dimension is present consciously in your life. That which happens in the foreground of your life, which is thinking and doing and experiencing, never absorbs you totally anymore.

You give it its due, yes, but it does not take up the totality of your attention or your consciousness. Or in other words, you don't lose yourself completely anymore when you start to think and to do and to react, which is the normal state, lost, lost in doing and thinking. So you become a grounded, in the true sense of the word, in the deepest sense of the word, a grounded human being, rooted in being, and then able to deal with things in a different way also, because it does change when that dimension is present in the background of your life.

You can sense the beingness in the background. It's not difficult. Then the way in which you do, the way in which you think and experience undergoes a change.

You don't need to change it yourself. It just happens. And everything you're thinking and you're doing becomes imbued with quite a peaceful energy.

The next step, one could say, in the evolution of human consciousness is stepping out of self-talk, which is the conditioned mind, and realizing there is much more to who I am than this conditioned content of my mind. And that is a beginning of awakening. It's not those words, not that you need to believe that there is much more to who I am than the self-talk in my head, because that is still self-talk in the head.

I believe there's more to who I am, and you better believe it too. And suddenly you go, and your attention is suddenly in the present moment. The self-talk is never in the present moment.

And suddenly your attention is in the present moment, and you go, and the whole person at that right now is not there anymore when you go. You're not a person at that moment anymore. You are an aware presence.

So that shift in consciousness can happen very easily, whether it stays with you for a few seconds or a few minutes or an hour or a day or longer. It doesn't matter that much. The important thing is that it arises.

It arises. And suddenly the unhappy self-talk entity is disappearing, and what has taken its place is just a sense of presence. And that sense of presence is first of all aware of sense perceptions.

So you look more consciously, you listen more consciously, because there's so much to look at and so much to listen to. And it's not only looking and listening, it's also feeling the breeze on your skin, the air. Do you feel the warmth of the air?

And there might be a scent in the air. And you become conscious of that. But feeling the air, the movement of air on your skin requires a considerable degree of awareness.

A person who is immersed in the self-talk in the head, they cannot feel the breeze touching their skin. They can't feel that. It's a very subtle thing.

And to feel subtle things, you need to have that aware presence, that alert, aware presence. You cannot be immersed in the self-talk to really honor and appreciate deeply the present moment, which is life. We could say honor, appreciate deeply life, because present moment and life are synonymous.

There is no life away from the present moment. If you cannot appreciate the present moment, it means you are away from life. Instead of life, you have a substitute in your head, which is abstractions in the form of thoughts.

So to notice the breeze on your skin, you need to be quite alert and basically still inside. And then you can go. Ego is something that needs to be overcome.

Schools should encourage children not to excessively identify with concepts.

Question is on kids. I have a teenager at home. And like many, most teenagers, they tend to get unconscious.

So I think what I've seen is when they are small, I mean, they are the most present, right? They are in the present and doing everything with the joy as they grow up, middle school, high school. Some stage we give them a cell phone.

They have computers to work on homeworks and everything. And obviously they're trying to identify themselves and they become unconscious. So the question is, and it is a good spiritual practice, even for me, sometimes I can be conscious when they are unconscious and sometimes you're drawn into the unconsciousness.

So the question is, what can we do to bring in that presence into their lives or what are, if there's anything that, you know, you are doing or Eckhart Teachings is doing with the schools, in middle schools or high schools where we can have a course or something where, you know, as a group, they can get some kind of presence teachings.

Yes. Thank you. That's very important.

Thank you. There's also, the question could also refer to parents. How to approach teenage years typically are difficult for, so the human ego has to, at that point, the human ego has to develop and grow.

Unfortunately, the way it is for most humans on the planet so far is, the human ego should be a limited time period when it grows in a human being, let's say up to the age of 20, 25, at the most 30, let's say mid-20s. Then you cannot prevent the arising of ego in a child and an adolescent, nor should you want to prevent it. It's not possible.

They need to develop a sense of separate identity that is part of the evolution.

The tragedy is, unfortunately, if people get stuck with that ego for the rest of their lives, they never go beyond it. So for a parent, to begin with parents, it's to observe the growth of the ego in the child, which already starts with, may start at the age of two or three when the child begins to, well, the child learns his or her name and then the child learns that it is possible to possess something.

It learns the concept of mine fairly early and so it possesses a toy and it learns the concept of my toy. That's the beginning of ego. And then also the beginning of the suffering that comes with ego identification because if the toy is lost or disappears or somebody takes it, enormous suffering arises.

Oh, oh, my toy, mine. This is the early suffering of egoic consciousness. The next step would be for the child to assert that it is better in some ways than another.

I can jump higher than you. Can you jump this high? No, you can't.

Look at me. I can do it. And parents say, you're great.

You're doing it. And that's fine. If you don't overdo the praise, give praise when praise is deserved, but don't just praise anything because then there comes an inflation of praise and that can create a narcissistic personality, which is an overblown ego.

Many parents these days do that. They say, everything you do is so great. You're the greatest.

You're wonderful. It feels good for the child, but when you print money, when you print money, it loses its value. It's called inflation.

I know that, but many politicians these days don't seem to know it. And they probably have degree in economics. But that's on the side.

So you are there to gently guide them. You observe the growth of their ego as it has to gently guide them. And school ideally should prepare children for adulthood and should also prepare them perhaps for the transcendence of ego.

Even when I said 25 years old, just a number came to me. It could already be at 21. Ego is something that needs to be overcome, but something that is necessary for a certain stage of human development.

So schools should encourage children not to excessively identify with concepts. And there are a few alternative schools, I believe, that already to some extent do that. There are perhaps, I don't know, Montessori schools or Rudolf Steiner schools and so on.

They, to some extent, they encourage children not to be excessively drawn into conceptualization at an early age. That is very dangerous. Also to be given the devices at a very early age has a very detrimental effect on their development.

I know it's an easy thing to do for parents to keep them quiet, but it is not good for the growth of their consciousness. Children need to remain in touch for as long as possible with nature. Some way they need to be taken out into nature, even if it's just a park, but preferably out of the city periodically where they are encouraged to interact with nature, leave all the devices behind.

Every school should do that, take them out in groups where they spend time connecting with nature without their devices. These are all important things. To teach even abstract subjects like mathematics and so on at too early an age is also detrimental for their development.

So there are many things that I know, I have met quite a few teachers over the years who are already bringing that into their classrooms. But so far, mostly on an individual basis, it's rare that it has become, for it to become a already part of the official curriculum, that's still relatively rare. Although there are some schools now also, I don't know what schools they are, whether they may be private schools that teach mindfulness, so-called, I don't often use that term, but basically mindful is to be present in what you do.

I don't use that term because it implies that your mind is full. So I'd rather not use that, but they teach mindfulness. So for a parent to encourage the child not to get lost in conceptualization, to encourage the child to continue to interact with nature if you can't have an animal in the house, that is nature too, a cat or a dog, encourage the child to look after the animal, to relate to the animal.

Animal presence can be very important in a home, especially for children. So it requires the teachers to finally establish the teaching of presence as part of the curriculum. And that implies also, it signifies to help children to become aware of their emotions.

That was one of the most vital things. And if it's not taught at school, the parents have to do it or the parents would do it anyway. Help the children to become aware of their emotions because the emotions can wreak havoc with the child's life.

And sometimes they get amplified in the teenage years when many adolescents become very hostile and they're consumed by negative emotions, by self-hatred, by hatred of others, by hatred of everything, very destructive emotions. So the most vital thing that a child already at an age of four or five needs to begin to be taught to observe his or her emotional field rather than be always taken over by it. As I mentioned before, not that it's not challenging anymore.

There will be challenges, but of a different kind. External challenges will continue to come. The challenges, the problems and difficulties of the unobserved mind, however, will no longer be there.

And that's a huge percentage of suffering in a person's life. A huge percentage of suffering, of unhappiness to use a generic term, a huge percentage of unhappiness arises not created by situations, but by the mind. You can verify that wherever you are and see when you begin to feel upset, you begin to feel unhappy.

What is it that causes you to feel upset or unhappy? Is it a situation or is it what your mind is telling you about the situation? What makes you unhappy?

You can test it in the most seemingly insignificant situation because the mechanism is the same, whether it's a big suffering or a small suffering. You're in a queue in the supermarket. It's not moving.

The person is so slow, the cashier, and so inefficient, and you have so much else to do. Well, why should you be standing here waiting if they could only find people who are more efficient and just can't stand it anymore? I'm not going back here anymore.

I really should be. That's the beginning of suffering. It's unhappiness.

And what's creating it? The situation or your mind? And this is only a small example.

You can take almost your entire life when suffering arises. Is it really the situation? In some cases, it may be because there can be dreadful things that can happen.

But if then, if you're still unhappy several months later, then it's also your mind again. But so observe how, when you become aware of what your mind is doing, when you're upset, when unhappiness arises, see, okay, is it a situation? Is it my mind?

And suddenly the awareness comes and your mind is no longer the unobserved mind. Now your mind becomes the observed mind. And then you realize what your mind is doing.

And then you stand in the supermarket and Nick you and said, okay, I don't really need all that. What would it be like to just accept this moment as it is without adding the mental stuff to it? Oh, not so bad.

I'm just standing here, breathing, looking at people. Okay, there's nothing wrong with it. If your mind doesn't tell you there's something wrong with it, it's actually okay.

It's just the present moment. If I were not standing here, I would be standing somewhere else. Or if I wouldn't be standing, I would be sitting somewhere else or walking somewhere else.

Not that different, but their mind tells you should be somewhere else. I shouldn't be. So you become, and you can tell the difference between situations where you can do something about it and situation where you can't do anything about.

But even if you can do something about it, make sure that you accept the present moment first and then you take action. Because if you don't accept the present moment, the action you take will be action arising from upset or from anger. And this is karmic action.

It creates more of the same stuff coming back at you. It might solve this particular situation, but in solving this particular situation through your angry reaction, you've created two or three other situations in the next moment that reflect back this karmically. Insane.

Normal. This is why I say normal equals insane. So observe your mind.

See how much of your unhappiness is not the situation that you lost your job, your marriage collapsed, whatever it is, is that causing the unhappiness or the mental commentary, the story in the head, that tells you how bad this is. Either by blaming somebody else or by blaming yourself or blaming life or blaming God. Can choose whatever you want to blame.

The mind is happy. Whatever the mind can blame is the egoic mind is happy with that. But that's all those challenges or suffering or difficulties, those things begin to evaporate from your life.

What remains, however, is certain challenges that come in wherever you are, through situations, through other people who are still unconscious. There are a few left, you might have noticed, who are still unconscious and you can't remove yourself from that. So you're faced with certain situations that correspond to where humanity is at in their collective level of consciousness.

You might have physical problems still, although many illnesses are created by the unobserved mind, there are other factors too. And the body will eventually grow old. And that's a big problem if you make it into one.

And a dreadful thing, if you had completely identified with the body and now it's beginning to shrink or disappear or collapse, who am I now? If for the past few decades, you're looking in the mirror, gave you most of your sense of who you are or taking selfies, one day, a few years pass, then the selfies are not that satisfying to look at anymore. Who am I now?

There's something wrong, I need to get a new iPhone. So that's the, beware of what your mind is doing. And if you only get, there are many things from this evening that are potentially life transforming.

And even just taking one with you would be enough. Even if you took the one, the last thing we just mentioned, whenever suffering arises, upset, angry reaction, unhappiness, be aware of where does it come from? My mind or the situation?

And if it is your mind, do I want that? Who am I? Am I those thoughts?

No. Well, who am I? Do I want those thoughts?

Do I want that unhappiness? Is that my choice to think unhappy thoughts and feel unhappy? Year, day after day, night after night, every time I wake up in the middle of the night, the same thoughts come, make me unhappy.

And I think this is the reality of my life. The thoughts that make me unhappy, people think that's the reality of my life. It's a total illusion.

And so you step out of that into, oh, that's just things that happened. And that's just life. Things come and go.

You lose, you gain. And then you lose again. And then you gain and loss.

Impermanence. Can't hang on to anything. There's no security out there.

No matter how many life insurances, insurance you have or whatever, it's an illusion. Life insurance. I have a big life insurance.

Well, to start with, it shouldn't be called life insurance. It should be called death insurance. But that's not so attractive anymore.

It would destroy the illusion. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 6] (4:45:22 - 4:46:15)
I think it's even wrong to use the word consciousness because we make it a thing. We make it a noun. And as soon as we add ness to anything, we turn a quality or an attribute into something which we can talk about.

It's useful for language. Yes, it becomes an object again.

Exactly. A mental object. Yes.

But so can one talk about it all? Is there a better word that doesn't have that? Is it the Tao?

[Speaker 6] (4:46:26 - 4:46:58)
Well, I think we should not use nouns for it because as soon as we use a noun, whether it's Tao, consciousness, awareness, whatever, as soon as we use a noun, we're making it a thing which implies we're beginning to look for another object, another form of perception. And so even the question, what is consciousness, which they're asking, to me is a wrong question. It's like we are knowing, we are conscious, and then we're asking, what is it?

We're looking for something other than what we are.

The question immediately makes it into an object again.

[Speaker 6] (4:47:02 - 4:47:27)
So I prefer to use verbs for it. Let's see what that sounds like. Well, I am aware and there is a wearing.

I mean, what I know is there is, we could call it a wearing. There is experiencing. Consciousing doesn't work quite.

[Speaker 1] (4:47:28 - 4:47:37)
Well, a wearing, so you have to create a new word to get rid of the inherent error in nouns and so on.

[Speaker 6] (4:47:37 - 4:48:18)
Yes, or even knowing. Knowing. I mean, knowing is a word we do have.

There is that knowing. I know my experience. There is this experience now, being here, talking to you, and there is the knowing of that experience.

And that to me is, that's what we're referring to as consciousness. And that is, as you pointed out many times, that's what is always there. It is unchanging.

Just that knowing or the knowingness. So I think science is actually misleading itself by looking for something. Yes.

Not realizing it's the act of looking. Yes.

[Speaker 1] (4:48:18 - 4:48:53)
So in a way, science can never find the answer to consciousness until or unless the scientist becomes introspective, to direct attention away from there, redirects attention back to the source within himself. In other words, the scientist has to become a meditator or a mystic. Yeah.

And then, of course, whether the mystic would still want to be a scientist, I don't know.

[Speaker 6] (4:48:55 - 4:49:35)
I actually think the mystic can be a scientist. I think we have to, again, draw a distinction between science as it's practiced now and the belief systems of science, which are, it's a very materialistic belief system. Yes.

And it excludes awaring or consciousness and deliberately has done so because you can't measure it. Yes. You can't put a rule up against it.

And it hasn't seemed important. I mean, science is explanation of how the universe works, seems to work perfectly well without ever getting into this funny thing called subjectivity or knowing that we don't need bother about that.

I come from an evangelical Christian background and was a true believer until five years ago when my beliefs literally fell away. So many of the ideologies and stories in the ancient texts, both old and new testaments, began to ring as insane.

I didn't want to let go of my faith.

I just couldn't continue to believe. It was as if the decision was made for me. It occurred to me at that time that a belief is just a thought and yet we hold beliefs to be this incredibly important thing.

Why are beliefs a source of identity? Have you ever heard of someone's religious beliefs just falling away? What are your thoughts on beliefs and consciousness?

Thank you. Now, obviously, you believe when you believe that something is the case, it implies that you don't know. You have no evidence for it, but you believe it.

So you wouldn't say, I believe in this table. I don't have to because I know it's here. Well, we call it table.

Who knows what it is on other levels? But you don't need to say, I believe in this flower. I know there is a flower here, at least that's on this level of perception.

There's so belief implies you don't really know, but you would like something to be or... And that's interesting in religions. Those things are regarded as very important.

You believe in certain things that have been transmitted to you from generation to generation that are in the books. And then you have a certain belief structure. And since you're not free of ego, it becomes incorporated into your sense of identity, the collective identity of we, the believers in these particular kinds of stories.

There is in the English language, there's the word belief. And there's also the word faith. And they're quite different, but sometimes people don't realize the difference.

In some languages, there's no difference between these two words. In Spanish, you have faith, which is faith, and cliencia, which is belief. But if I remember correctly in German, you only have one word for faith or belief, and that would be glaube or glauben.

But they're very different. Faith is, a true meaning of faith is a deep sense of trust. And what you are trust, and you have that deep sense of trust because you are connected with the essence of who you are, which is one with the essence of the universe.

I forgot to mention that before. You are connected with the essence of who you are, that's the vertical dimension. You realize yourself as consciousness.

And that consciousness is not yours, although I sometimes call it your consciousness. It's not yours. Because if I said, my consciousness, I would have created a duality.

There would have been me, an entity who has consciousness. But there is no me without consciousness. I am consciousness.

It is the essence of who I am. So, when you know that you are connected not only with the essence of who you are, but that essence of who you are is linked to the very source of all creation, it emanates from there. And when you are therefore connected with that, then what arises is this deep sense of trust in life.

And what is trust? Well, one definition of trust would be absence of fear. There is no more psychological fear.

If you only inhabit the horizontal dimension, fear is inevitable to a greater or lesser degree. It is your companion as anxiety, as worry, and for many other manifestations of fear, including anger, which in most cases, hiding underneath anger is fear. So, faith is something wonderful that does not require belief, although in some languages, as I said, they are the same word.

So, when Jesus talks about faith, it is about that, that state of connectedness with being, with the essence of who you are and yet something infinitely greater than you could call you. For a long time, when human consciousness was not all that developed, the only way millions of humans could be reached with some kind of spiritual truth was through stories. And so there are stories that contain truths that are not literally, these stories are not literally true.

They have actually a deeper truth than a literal truth. And this is sometimes called mythological stories. Let's give another example of literal truth or historical truth.

And there is a deeper truth than the historical truth. If you read a great work of literature, that all the characters, they might've been inspired originally by certain historical events or they might've been inspired by people that the author knew and observed. But basically, all the characters that are described in this great work of literature, whatever it may be, they never existed as such.

These characters never exist. It's not an historical account of what happened. But in fact, this tells you more about the human condition than any historical work could do.

So it contains a deeper or higher truth than if it had been a historical account of something. And so there are many things in the old religions that are of that kind. And they have had a useful and continue to have a very useful helpful function of transmission of truth, which people, if you expressed them in a more abstract way, nobody would have understood a word.

But if people can identify with certain stories, there are more than stories. There are expressions of a deep truth. And then there are the literalist interpretations of these things.

In Christianity, for example, evangelical interpretations, they take everything absolutely literally. And then it can easily becomes an ideology in the mind. And there's no depth anymore suddenly.

So this is something that the questioner grew out of. Now it's important not to throw out the baby with the, what's the, baby and with the bath water into a funny expression. I don't think it exists in Spanish.

A child, baby, con el agua del baño. So it could then suddenly arise, all this is just nonsense. If somebody suddenly grows beyond the stories, sometimes they arrive at the conclusion, oh, this is all nonsense.

But that is not the case. There is a deeper level on which these things can be understood. And in the case of here, there are certain churches, of course, where you might not be able to continue if they are mainly ideologies, then you may not be able to continue in a particular church.

It is possible to deepen whatever your religion still is. You can see a deeper truth as presence grows. And in some cases, it may happen that you leave it behind completely.

That's possible too. Even in Buddhism, you have to separate the mythology from the essence teaching, very profound teaching about the human condition. And then you have the mythology, which says when the Buddha came out of the womb of his mother, he immediately uttered the word, I have come for the salvation of the world.

That's a lovely story. On the downside of the story, on the one hand, it's a way of transmitting certain things, but on the downside, it confuses form and essence. And then the Buddha becomes a kind of God, God-like figure to be worshiped.

The Zen masters recognize that. And that's why there's a story of when the Zen master was getting cold in the middle of the winter and he ran out of firewood, he used the wooden image of the Buddha for the fire to keep warm. So I have certain respect.

I know it can be terribly misused, the religions in the service of the ego, the personal and the collective ego. And they have been misused for egoic purposes over the centuries, have been quite, have become part of the insanity in many ways of the human ego as it was growing. But despite all that, there is something there that is of value, of great value.

It's still, it might be deeply hidden, but it's still there. And that's, for example, why although a conventional Christian would probably, I'm not a Christian in a conventional sense. Well, I'm everything.

I'm a Buddhist. I'm Christian. I'm Hindu.

I'm a Muslim. I'm all religions. You know, the essence that underlies them, you can say I'm all of that.

But although I'm not a conventional Christian, Jesus has something, is something of profound significance. To me, and some people believe that he didn't even exist. Some people, there are some books that provide convincing arguments that actually he didn't actually exist.

And even that to me doesn't matter because Jesus exists in the collective human consciousness. And there was a time when they made a movie many years ago that the Monty Python team, they made a movie called, I think it was called Life of Brian. And that was a kind of parody of Jesus.

There was a man who spoke and behaved like Jesus, but he wasn't Jesus. But anyway, I read about it and I could not get myself to see it. I just did not want to see it.

And to this day, I wouldn't, I would not want to see it because I have too much respect for what that means that in the collective human consciousness. Let's start with the more complicated questions. This one is typed, so it must be really complicated.

I don't have any doubt that we are being, playing a human role. And I don't have any doubt that we are one with the entire universe. And that individuality as a person, an ego is nothing else but an illusion.

So when death occurs, it sounds natural to me that we will come back to the dimension we always have been in where we belong to the universal unity of the cosmos. Home. In the very seldom occasions in which you slightly touch, something's happening to my voice, the edge of the issue of reincarnation, I always get the impression that you, with your often used explanation that you are not a dead master.

I think that that was a Zen master who said that. What happens after death? They asked him and he said, how do you ask me?

I'm not. Well, they said, you're the master. And then he said, yeah, but I'm not dead.

So the obvious question then that keeps floating in the air is being every, here comes the question. Being every one of us one with the totality and seen clearly that individuality is just an illusion created by the mind, then what or who is that unity that supposedly reincarnates? Now that's a profound question.

So if it's an illusion, what is it that reincarnate? That's an interesting word. It comes from Latin and it has in there somewhere C-A-R-N which means flesh and reincarnate.

It's the same as chili con carne. In the dish chili con carne, of course means meat because it's dead. When it's alive, it's flesh.

English language has two words because who would want to eat flesh? In German you eat flesh, but that's another story. Reincarnate is to assume a physical form, a fleshly body.

So you reincarnate into that. What is it then that assumes the form of the physical vehicle? And the answers to questions like that are best found through self-observation.

And you can observe reincarnation in yourself many times during the day when you identify with a thought because the moment you completely identify with the thought, you as the consciousness have forgotten your essential nature as consciousness, forgotten who you are, and you have reincarnated into a thought form. You have assumed a thought form. So that incarnation that happens many times during the day, unless you're really present, you may catch yourself completely identifying with the thought.

You become it and then you think you are it. It gives you your sense of self. And that's basically how reincarnation happens.

And now you know directly without needing some abstract philosophical discourse on my part, you can verify in your own experience what incarnation is and how it happens. You lose yourself in a kind of hypnotic state. It's a kind of, when you're completely identified with a thought, it's a kind of dream.

It's a kind of hypnotic state or dream. So the consciousness, then one could say you as a person, well, this goes a little bit into almost philosophical thought. You as a person is a dream of the one consciousness.

It's an analogy. It is not totally correct. Nobody could give a totally correct statement about something that transcends language and even analytical thought.

But just as an approximation, just to get you a feeling of what it might be like. You as a person, you can, well, I'm just suggesting to you that maybe for a moment, you consider the possibility, not trying to convince you of anything, or I'm not saying this is the ultimate explanation, but just suggesting that you might consider the possibility that you, the person that you are or seem to be in this particular life, time, incarnation, is an aspect of the dream of the universe. You are a figure in the dream of the universal consciousness.

You are being dreamt by the universal consciousness. And then you disappear. And then perhaps you reappear again because you haven't realized your identity with universal consciousness.

So the dream continues in a slightly different form and to a bit more drama. And then you disappear again. And then the dream happens again in a slightly different form until the urge to, that this pull towards incarnating, identifying with form begins to dissipate.

And this may be happening in this dream character that you are here. The urge, the desire to reincarnate into the next thought, the next thought form, because the thought form gives you your sense of self and your identity. And you begin to awaken to a deeper reality of who you are.

And then you will notice in this lifetime, the urge to reincarnate into another thought and another decreases. And so you can observe in this lifetime that the urge towards reincarnation diminishes. So, and that's the, one could say perhaps that process happens because the universe is becoming more conscious, is awakening to itself.

One could almost say that the universe started off, it all started off as a big, huge dream, the dream of form gradually becoming more and more complex. And then another stage is reached when the dream begins to, there's so many things that you can, with reference to yourself and self-observation, that will tell you a lot of mysteries in the macrocosm. If you look into the microcosm of yourself and observe yourself clearly, because there's a famous ancient dictum, as above, so below.

So you are in a way, in many ways, you are a reflection of the macrocosm of the totality. So just through self-observation, you can find many answers to questions that arise concerning the universe. So in fact, the deepest answers you find by turning your attention within, the less deep answers you find by turning your attention without, and you get big telescopes.

And then you forget who or what is looking through the telescope. The mystery is out there. And you forget that the greatest mystery is the fact that there's a consciousness, that the universe is looking at itself.

And the universe is conscious, or becoming conscious, waking up. So these are not ultimate explanations, but approximations or analogies that perhaps can give you a sense of how this all works. Why is love not reciprocated?

Why does one-way love traffic situation arise? I'm placing my aching heart before you. So please operate.

Thank you, thank you. All right, I will begin the operation. Now, one form loves, and the other form doesn't reciprocate.

Why is that? And the pain that comes with that, great pain for many people, this enormous pain. Now, you know that the basic condition of the self, or the egoic self, is one of a very deep-seated sense of lack, of not enough, of not complete.

And then it tries to fill through strategies. The mind-made self tries to fill that lack that it knows and feels almost continuously, except for brief moments when something has been put in there. And then for a moment, the lack is not felt.

It never lasts long. So it looks for the next thing, and it looks to the future. It looks to add to me, to fill that hole that is always there, where I'm not myself.

I'm not complete. I haven't, I'm not home. I haven't arrived.

And so all kinds of strategies are there. But, and one of the main areas where it looks to fulfill that lack is in the area of relationship, the other person, he or she. And then when that happens, the entire focus of the self becomes focused on one other person who is perceived unconsciously as the one who is going to complete me, make me whole.

He or she is the one. And so almost an obsessive attachment forms to that image, that form of that person. And that is called falling in love.

And sometimes if you're lucky, the other person feels the same about you. That you are going to complete him or her also. And of course that is great.

You both feel that you are going to complete each other. And then probably you will want to get married, sign a contract just to make sure that for the rest of your life, you are going to complete me and you're not going to leave me because that would have dire consequences if you broke that contract and left me. Don't you even think about that.

But life goes on. And you marry. And after, perhaps even during the honeymoon, the first doubt comes into your mind whether this actually works.

Whether the other is going to live up to that enormous task of fulfilling and completing you. And then you start an ordinary existence, jobs, family, and gradually it doesn't seem to be working anymore. The completion.

The sense of lack comes back. He or she isn't behaving in the way that he or she should to make me feel complete, make me happy. You read it in ads.

I don't know if you read it in India. Looking for man or woman to make me happy. Oh, wow.

Who could live up to that? And nobody can. And then the luck that was covered up by the temporary delusion that this person was fulfilling you, this person who has a pain body, but you didn't know that.

The temporary delusion that this person should be fulfilling you, that suddenly the sense of incompleteness, aloneness, fear, not being yours reemerges. But now through your mind, you attach that to the other person and say, he or she is the cause for what I feel. You're feeling again the basic egoic condition.

You're feeling it more strongly now because for a little while, it was covered up by the love relationship. And so gradually, the love then periodically turns into hate. And every time the person is not fulfilling his obligations or her, the love turns into aggression, hostility, withdrawal, complete withdrawal.

What's wrong with you? Nothing is wrong. Just don't want to talk, whatever, or throwing something, whatever they do.

And then the relationship fluctuates for a while, it works again. And then it doesn't work. It works again, it doesn't work.

And then it becomes the periods when it doesn't work become longer. And you feel it feels bad. The happiness of marriage turns into the unhappiness of just coexistence.

The happiness of the honeymoon becomes the divorce and they're all one really. So it was an attempt to fulfill you through some form, some outer form. And then all that happens in the end, you sense the unfulfillment more strongly.

And then you blame that form for causing you that pain. It's egoic pain. This is the pain that arises out of love-hate relationships.

Now, the questioner, of course, is not at that stage because it is one way traffic, as he puts it. That great love is felt for this form, but it's not reciprocated. What do you do then?

Then you feel that lack even more strongly. And it's painful. And there's the tendency for the mind to weave all kinds of fantasies around it, all kinds of stories.

And the self gets in there and becomes a very painful self-image of me. And it can then, if it goes on, it can happen that that attraction turns into hate. Can happen.

Not saying it will happen in your case. And then you see it never was love in the first place. So what is called love is the deep-seated need of the ego.

It focuses on one form. So this is a retreat. You've been taken out of your usual surroundings and put here.

For some of you who have come from more distant places, this is a very exotic environment. Tropical with wonderfully exotic birds and animals and kangaroos and Australian gigantic lizards and all kinds of wonderful things and trees that, if you're not familiar with this part of the world that you've never seen before. So all this is wonderful and helpful.

It can be a helpful thing to be in unusual surroundings because it's easier to be more present in unusual surroundings. That's the advantage of traveling. And that's why, as I've written somewhere, many people feel more alive when they travel.

And when they are at home, their surroundings are so familiar that they lose presence completely. They don't see things anymore. They go from where they live to their office or wherever it is, gone, done it so many times, they don't see it anymore.

And you would be surprised even at home, your usual surroundings, you might have a painting on your walls and haven't looked at it in the past three years, might be very beautiful. Or your garden or the plants in there. So this is the familiarity can lead to a kind of semi-sleep-like state.

And when you're traveling, you go, oh, and the good thing is you might not even have a name for all the new things you see. At home, you know what everything is called, but here you see things, you might see a weird animal. The mind stops because you can't name it and that's a wonderful thing.

Or you see trees that you haven't seen before and you go, or you might say to your friend, look at that. And you might notice in the moment of looking at that, you're not naming it in your mind because you don't know what it's called. So there's a moment, a few seconds of just being present, being the presence rather than the naming person.

And so let's hope we're here for a few days. Let's hope that by the last day, this place will not have become so familiar to you that you're not looking anymore. So it helps to be wide awake to your sense perceptions because that is one way of coming into the present moment, which is why we are here.

Because there is more to the present moment than we realize most of the time. There's more to it. It's the access point to the deeper dimension within yourself.

So as a general theme, underlying theme for our retreat, I recommend, surprisingly, that you practice being in the present moment. So we have this helpful thing that you are in unusual surroundings unless you live just a few miles from here, then it may be a harder job or you might even live next door. However, although you've been taken out of your usual surroundings, you have carried with you something else.

And of course, that's your mind that travels with you wherever you go. That is perhaps the meaning of the book that somebody wrote. I believe the title is Wherever You Go, There You Are.

So wherever you go, you carry your mind and the conditioning of your mind with you. So that is the challenge here on our retreat to transcend the conditioning of your mind, the habitual way of interpreting, the habitual way of reacting to things, habitual mind patterns, if a mind pattern in you is that you frequently and very quickly become discontent with where you are, if that's a pattern in you, then that pattern will arise here also. If your mind pattern is one that loves complaining and finding fault with things, then it's very likely that very quickly this mind pattern will appear here also, despite the fact that you are in these wonderful, unusual surroundings.

The first thing you might complain about is the dinosaurs. And the mind says, I'd rather see a big Buddha or something like that. Or the mind says, we've come here on a spiritual retreat.

Isn't there supposed to be a Buddha somewhere? So you get surprising things, that your expectations are not met in various ways. And that is a challenge to the mind, to the conditioned mind, because the conditioned mind wants its expectations met.

And if they're not met, it gets uneasy, restless, irritated, angry, starts talking about what's wrong. Either silently in your mind or to others. And if others can agree with you, then it's even better.

Or you can go on the internet and then you can get 1,000 people agreeing with you. So you always find those in some of you, maybe one or two of you that have that complaint pattern. I'm not saying if there's something really wrong, you shouldn't do something to rectify it.

So if something is leaking in your room, say, no, I'm not going to say anything because I'm not supposed to complain. No, of course. You go to reception, say there's something there that needs to be rectified.

That's not a complaint. It's just information. Complaint means there is an emotion behind it.

And the emotion says, this should not be happening. Then it becomes a complaint or it's your fault. Then it becomes a complaint.

If it's simply presenting information, it's not a complaint. It's just a fact. And then the question is, can anything be done about it?

If yes, good. Or if they say there's nothing we can do, do you go on insisting that this is very bad and create suffering for yourself? Or do you simply then accept this is what it is?

And there is no situation ever, including at a retreat in a wonderful, almost perfect place, except for the dinosaurs, for some of you. Almost perfect place as far as the natural environment is concerned. You can't imagine anything more, the profusion of vegetation and aliveness that surrounds you.

You cannot imagine anything more wonderful. And yet it's not perfect. And not just because of the dinosaurs.

There will be other things too that are not perfect. You cannot find a place where you go, everything is just so perfect. It doesn't exist.

If it did exist, you would become incredibly unbearably bored with saying, it's so perfect. What am I going to do now? But of course, you're lucky.

There is no such place. So there's always something that goes wrong. And that's a wonderful thing.

You can not only anywhere, as you might know in life. I believe I'm not the only person who can say that since I was born, life has been challenging ever since then. And very rarely do you get a little bit of moment of freedom from challenges.

And then suddenly something drops behind you or falls on your head, metaphorically speaking. So something you can practice here is to have an expectation that things should be in a certain way and nothing should go wrong. And that reality, external reality, should conform to exactly the expectations of the conditioned mind that creates ultimately unhappiness.

Because a lot of the time, reality does not conform to the expectations of your mind. In some ways it does, in other ways it doesn't. And not only in a retreat, but also in daily life, as you might have noticed.

One damn thing after another. One damn thing after another. And then the mind says, I can't take anymore.

Of course, that's just another thought. Completely untrue. You can take anything.

If you drop the thought, this is what is. So you practice here letting go of the expectations of your mind and live in alignment with what is, internal alignment with what is, rather than demanding that something should be otherwise. The exception is conveying information so that something can be changed.

If it can be changed, that's understood. Or doing it yourself. Clean it up, do this, do that.

That's fine. But other than that, see if here, make it your spiritual practice to live in alignment with the is-ness of the present moment and honor the present moment. And bring a kind of appreciation to the present moment.

Appreciate while you're here, appreciate whatever the present moment presents to you. Another word for it is you welcome the present moment. And that's not, this is actually a relatively easy place to do that.

It's not, nothing is perfect. We know that. But this is a, you're in a protected setting and it's relatively easy here to welcome the present moment.

It might be easier here than to be at a crowded airport and the flights have been canceled or to be stuck anywhere or to be in the hospital then things, big things, small things happen. Wherever you go, welcoming the present moment is the practice that gives you access to the spiritual dimension, to that which is beyond the person in yourself. It seems too simple almost, but let that be your practice here.

You may remember, I mentioned it once or twice before, there was a Zen teacher and a disciple came to him and said, I'm going away now on a journey for several years.

And since I haven't made it, I've been in this monastery for five years and I still haven't got it. Can you give me some practice for my journey?

And the Zen master said, okay, here's your spiritual practice for your journey. Come back in five years and let me know how it went. Wherever you are, whatever situation you find yourself in, whoever you are with, whatever happens, say, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. Is that it? One imagines spiritual practice, some complicated meditation method that takes years to master, but no, he said, make it your spiritual practice to say, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever, no matter what happens. So if you miss, whether you catch the bus or you miss the bus, you catch the bus, say, thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever.

You miss the bus, thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever. You're in a lovely hotel room, in a warm bed, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. Or you're out in the cold with nowhere to sleep. Oh, then it not only gets more challenging to say that, but if you say it, and you mean it, saying it is just words.

But if you say it and mean it, when instead of being in a luxury hotel, you find yourself penniless in the street, if you then say it and mean it, that will take you much deeper than being in a luxury hotel bed and saying, thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever. That's relatively easy.

Or you might say, the pillow is not quite the way I want it. But it is, it's relatively easy to say, but say it when you're out in the cold and you can't get a hotel because you don't have the money or whatever. There are no hotels, nowhere to sleep, cold, wet.

Thanks for everything. Thanks. Thanks.

That's a sarcastic thank you. Thanks, God. It's just what I needed.

That's not the thanks. That's not it. It's if you say thanks, which means a total acceptance of this moment, not a total acceptance of the, okay, I might as well accept it for the rest of tonight.

I'm going to be out in the cold. You don't know. Maybe a minute from now, something will happen and you'll find somewhere or somebody will offer you a place to sleep.

It's just this moment. Thanks for everything is thanks for this moment. So, and thanks really here means a complete acceptance of this moment.

And if you accept a moment that seems difficult to accept, that takes you much deeper than accepting a moment that's easy to accept. If you have a nice meal, you have a, you're drinking a cocktail and then you've ordered the starter, which is whatever, let's say oysters, half of what, if some people love them, some don't, but it's, that's a general thing that people think, oh, that's okay. And they can, thanks for these oysters.

Thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever. Thanks for everything.

And then you go home and suddenly you feel sick in your stomach. So when you were eating the oysters, thanks for everything. I have no complaint, right?

But what about now? Because you ate too many oysters. So it's bringing your inner self into alignment with the present moment, a very powerful spiritual practice.

Why is it so powerful? Especially when it's, when it's a situation that's challenging and you still say it and you mean it. Because everything that sustains the person, the exclusively personal sense of self, in that act of complete surrender to what is, the personal sense of self gives way to a deeper transcendent sense of self, which the Buddhists call no self.

A deeper consciousness of self. Suddenly shines through. So really it's a kind of denying your form identity.

It doesn't mean you don't have it anymore, but you are no longer trapped exclusively in your form identity. The form identity is strengthened the more you can be in opposition to what is, the stronger your form identity, me, the person, the me, the more you are in opposition to what is, the stronger the me becomes, your form identity. And if you can have enemies, lots of enemies, it loves, that gets even stronger.

They're all against me or us, if it's a collective ego. The collective ego loves its enemies, can't actually survive without them. Every collective even needs the others.

We're not us. This is us and that's the others. So that's the wonderful thing that the person, the exclusively personal sense of self becomes weakened, subsides, and something else emerges when you are no longer habitually oppose what is, something emerges that is deeper than the personal sense of self, the transcendent dimension, presence, whatever we want to call it.

Some people call it your higher self or you could call it your deeper self, words, doesn't matter. But something emerges that is from beyond the person. And that is a place of great power and aliveness and possibility.

And that is where you are connected with a vastness and with everybody else too. So it's when you feel, when that transcendent dimension arises, you feel a greater sense of connectedness, no longer the separation with, not only with nature, but also with other humans. You no longer feel the otherness of the other.

It's just yourself in another disguise. That's really becomes your experience. Whoever you meet, there's yourself in another disguise.

Isn't that a wonderful way of being with other humans that essentially you can sense not only your connectedness, but you can also sense your inherent oneness with others. Becoming aware that is more to you than meets the eye. And that's an interesting expression, meets the eye.

Not believing that there's more to you than the physical body and the thoughts that go through your head and the emotions. Not a belief that there's more to me than that, but knowing that there is infinitely more to me, and I'm talking for every I here, knowing that there's infinitely more to who I am than what meets the eye, and what goes on in my head as thought, or in my body as feelings or emotions. If you don't know that directly, real knowing, not knowing about something, but knowing, then you'll just inhabit the surface reality.

There's a philosopher, Ken Wilber has the expression, flat land. I don't know if he coined it or borrowed it from somebody else, but it's a good word. If you inhabit flat land, there's only the horizontal dimension to your life, then there's no depths.

And that includes thought, and that's a very impoverished existence. If you cannot feel or sense, it's not a feeling. Let's use the word knowing.

If you cannot know your own depths, not as an occasional high that you experience at a retreat or after meditating for a long time, and then you go, and then the moment you go back into your daily life, it's gone again. But to know that continuously, a little analogy, or we could say a visualization, it's what I'm saying now, it's going to be halfway between an analogy and a visualization. That could be helpful, is to imagine yourself, the person that you are on the surface of a globe, which in a way, you don't have to imagine, it's actually you are.

You exist on the surface of a sphere, a globe, and that's where your life happens. You run around the surface. Some people stay in one small spot on the surface and others move about the surface a lot.

They go around to different places. So you exist on the surface of this globe and your reality is what you see around you on the surface. You look around and big things happen there.

Your life happens there. And then there's a little bit of, below that which can be perceived on the surface, there is the activity of thought. It's a little bit below the surface, but it's really still also a surface phenomenon.

So you exist on the surface of this globe and everybody else that you see and every other life form that you see running around or not running around on the surface is a totally other. That's what the word other comes from. It's not you.

There's another. Every human being, you could have a human being next to you on the surface and it's the other. You don't really feel any true connection with that person because there's a distance between you and that person.

There's a separation. Now, let's say this person that exists on the surface derives his or her life, the life that animates this life form from the center of the sphere. And this person who is perhaps only aware of the surface of the sphere is not aware that he or she derives his life and is connected with, is only an outer expression of a deeper life that originates within the center of the sphere.

Because he or she doesn't know that, because what happens on the surface of the sphere is so hypnotic or seductive and there's so much going on and there's continuously, the attention is drawn to the surface phenomena. And then another thing happens and then there's many things you need because as the little surface entity, you feel very incomplete. You feel there's something very important still missing in my life.

You may be familiar with that feeling or that belief, there's something missing here. And so, but the surface entity looks around the surface to find what's missing here and continuously reaches out on the surface to grasp at something that hopefully will make him or her feel more complete. So there's that search for that.

But there continues to be this underlying sense of, either in some entities, it's felt as there's something wrong. It's not quite right. Hopefully at some point in the future, when I have explored more of my surface reality, it's going to be right.

There's something not right or there's something I'm not complete. And this is an underlying feeling that majority of the population on the planet has a sense of lack. And even if they become wealthy, it's still there.

And also the sense of fear, you feel threatened, feel threatened by other entities that are moving around the surface. What do they want? Oh, there's another one coming.

And there's always completely other. So there's this sense of separation, but occasionally you grasp at another and say, I want you to complete me. It's called falling in love.

And after a while you realize that doesn't work either because it's short-lived. And then you realize one morning, that's not the person I married. What happened?

Totally different person is suddenly here. Something again is fundamentally wrong. So the wrongness comes back, no matter where you go and what you do, that sense of there's something missing or wrong, always sooner or later and usually sooner, creeps up on you.

And so, because you don't know that what really would make your life feel complete and whole and remove the fear would be knowing that the life that you are comes from a very deep place that far transcends who you are as this surface, temporary surface reality. So, and this is where really any spiritual teaching, even might use different terminology, is about that. And to some people, the realization comes without any spiritual teaching because they are so frustrated by their surface reality that somehow suddenly their attention goes deeper.

So here you are connected with deriving your life from the center of the sphere without knowing it, that the life that you are transcends the form reality. So we could differentiate between your form reality, the person with a name and a history and a body and the essence reality, which far transcends the person. If you know your essence reality, then the form reality is far less problematic.

You are no longer then a problem to yourself as if you don't know who you are in essence, you are inevitably a problem to yourself. You create a world of, the way in which you experience the world is problematic and you create a world of problems for yourself. And then of course, you do it to others too.

You can't create problems to yourself without creating problems for everybody around you. So you become the source of the problems in the world, not the solution. But you're accusing others that they are the source of the problems in the world.

So let's, again, this kind of visualization that you are on the sphere and suddenly your attention moves from sense perceptions and from thoughts to a deeper place. And that is easily done when you allow thought activity to subside and the consciousness that usually would have been absorbed by thinking is suddenly free to realize its own depths. You become still.

And as you become still, you become aware of your own depths. When I say that, it sounds dualistic, but this is only because we're using language. It's not so much that you become aware of your own depths.

Really, there's not two here. The depths that you are is becoming aware of itself. And that's what we call self-realization.

So there are many ways in which this can be pointed to. I sometimes say you become aware that you are spacious inside. You're not just the stuff in your head and that does not make up your true identity, whatever goes on in your mind.

You become spacious as the mind, as there is a gap between two thoughts, for example. Or right now, when there isn't really very much to think about, you suddenly realize there is something else to who I am, although I cannot analyze it in any way. I can only sense it as my own aliveness.

I can only sense it as my own essential beingness. But the dilemma or the fallacy is the belief that whatever you manifest is going to make you happy. It's to seek the fullness of life through what you manifest.

So to go about wanting to manifest material abundance in your life is perhaps not the right way to go about it because you're concentrating on the outermost layer of abundance. And even if you manage to manifest abundance on the outer level, it's not going to give you the true feeling of abundance. It's not, in other words, it's not going to make you happy.

It's not going to fulfill you except for a few days. The new possession, nice and shiny, whatever it is, and there you look at it, got it now, it's mine. And after a few days or a week or two, or give it a month, it wears off.

It's no longer that fulfilling to be driving the Ferrari or whatever it is. There's nothing wrong with the Ferrari, but if you're looking to the Ferrari for happiness and fulfillment and to give you the feeling of, it's not going to work for that long. If you're just driving it because you enjoy that experience, that's a different matter.

There's a very, there is a difference here. So don't condemn the world of things. This has been done traditionally by many religious people.

They were afraid of it. And so don't go there. You must not have any possessions in many religious orders and so on, not just Christian, but also other religions, monks, nuns.

No, you must not have any possessions. In some traditions, Buddhist monks are not allowed to touch money. Of course, I can see the reason behind it, but it would be even greater, of course, if you could touch money and you're free of attachment to the money that you touch.

I'm not attached to that, and you can touch it. It's fine. Rather than being a, ooh.

And of course, you're not allowed to touch a woman. Oh, ooh. It's dangerous because, of course, the reasoning behind it is, it will take you into complete unconsciousness.

The sexual urge will arise up in you and will make you totally unconscious. Maybe that's the reason why in some cultures, women are covered, scared. It could be chaos.

And yet, if you are connected with a source, then all that is not a problem. So, manifesting abundance is not really the right way. Go to the source and allow from the source for abundance if it wishes to manifest in your life.

You start with the source, then you go into enjoying all the forms of life, next level of abundance. Then you enjoy relating with the forms of life, the play of whatever you do in life. You enjoy that, and then that is how, and out of that enjoyment of what you do, that energy most likely also brings things into your life, forms that before you thought you needed desperately to feel abundance.

So they come as icing on the cake, and you might give them away again if they come. You have them for a while, just, oh, I've had this for long enough, now you have it. And so the flow is there beautifully.

As you give things away, new things come. And if they're all taken away from you, that's fine, too. You're quite happy with that.

So manifest abundance from the inside out, not from the outside as hoping that you go find some inner state through external things. That is a dilemma of many people who practice manifesting, which, of course, manifesting is a something that you can use, and it works if it's done rightly. But the dilemma or the fallacy is the belief that whatever you manifest is going to make you happy.

It's to seek the fullness of life through what you manifest, through things. And that doesn't really work. So when people manifest something in that way in their lives, a material thing, initially they're quite elated.

I've got it now, I've got the house or whatever it is that I wanted to manifest. And then that manifestation wears off and after a while brings about its own problems and a new level of problems. And the feeling of fullness does not stay.

It doesn't stay with them. Nothing can give it to you, can give you the true feeling of abundance. And that's the amazing thing, which implies nothing that you achieve in the future can get you there.

You have to start with that and you don't need to ask for things to be different in your life. You start here and now where you are. And here now you go within and see if you can find that place within where life is born continuously, but which in itself is unborn, timeless, consciousness itself.

So don't start there and allow abundance to come from there rather than start with the outermost layer, hoping that it will fulfill you. If you are in touch with the, whatever you want to call it, that which cannot be named, the Tao which cannot be named, what about manifesting something? Yes, you can.

If you want, it's part of the play of life. If you've wanted to manifest something and you feel the connectedness with source and say, oh, well, I'd like to manifest maybe a bit more space in my life on an external level and some greenery. It's a preference.

You don't need it for your happiness and fulfillment, but a preference. You can do that. You can visualize.

It's a play of form and if you feel the abundance already, visualization is very easy of abundance if you wanted it. Usually it comes even by itself. If you're connected with abundance, it comes by itself.

If you want to add something just as a play, as a preference, you can. It's playful. Nothing more.

It's not that important. There are many books that tell you how to manifest, but some forget to tell you that it's not going to make you happy. So you could get the impression that if you've manifested enough pairs of shoes, I don't know how many it would take to make you happy, but maybe 200.

Maybe a few more, 300. Or ask the great master of manifestation of shoes. Apparently it's Mrs. Marcos, they say. She has several thousand pairs. Yes, so just a little thing that some of these books don't mention, but otherwise they may be quite useful. But that little thing is quite vital.

It won't make you happy, by the way. Because happiness is really another word for... I don't often use the word happiness because it sounds a bit superficial.

Something good has just happened to me. It's been so great, so great. And then the next day is, oh no.

Happiness, happy, unhappy. So I don't, and some teachers use the word happiness, even some great teachers, and I know exactly what they mean. Ramana Maharshi, the great Indian sage, used, said, happiness is your true nature.

But I know exactly what he means, and he's absolutely right. Except the term happiness as a pointer may not be the best, but if you know what he means, then you can see beyond the limitations of the pointer and say, yes, he is absolutely right. Because happiness is the connectedness with the unmanifested, with, it is the joy that is not caused by anything out here.

Uncaused joy. That is the joy of aliveness itself, the joy of being conscious, of consciousness itself, life enjoying itself, life recognizing itself. And in that self-recognition, there is joy.

I am life. That's joy. And it's very subtle that it's in the, that joyful aliveness in the background of your life is very subtle at first, and as you pay more attention to it, you feel how there's a vast power there.

Your mind has to become still, by the way. As long as you're interested in every thought that comes, you can't sense that. You have to let go of the thoughts, at least don't be drawn into every thought that comes up and follow it with your attention.

Like somebody pulling, has got a piece of a carrot on a string or something, and pulling, you're running after it. Or yeah, a dog running after a bone on a piece of string. That's the thought that comes into your head.

And you follow every thought that comes. And before you know it, half an hour has passed, and you followed up a train of thought into all kinds, into weird places of fear and anxiety and feeling not good enough and anger towards others. And finally, you have depleted your life energy just by following up one thought, which led up to a train of thoughts.

And then your mind doesn't leave you alone. And another one comes up. Oh no, go this way now.

So you don't follow every thought with your attention. If a thought comes, say, okay, let it go. If you don't give it your attention, you're not interested in following it up.

You just let it. It comes, it comes. Where's your life going?

Where are you really going with your life? Have you, what are you going to achieve? What have you achieved?

You haven't done anything with your life, have you? What are you? And you recognize it as just a thought.

Don't follow it up. And then your attention becomes free for presence. Before it reverts back into the formless, where it came from, it's consciousness.

Consciousness born into a thought becomes limited. And consciousness, the attention is taken out of the form, the thought form, and remains as pure attention.

She heard this in her voice, this is a course in miracles, please take notes.

[Speaker 1] (6:20:10 - 6:37:29)
And she went to her colleague and said, I hear this voice, I think I'm going insane. And her colleague said, just write down what the voice says and then we'll decide whether you're insane or not. When I was young, a long time ago, I had some interest in that and experimented a little bit with that.

And I had a little bit of experience with presences. But when I went through my awakening, I lost interest in that. My focus was not on that.

Although I have come into contact with quite a few people who, over the years, who channel spirit, spirits and spirit presences, who you know what channeling is. And I've looked at various, I've spoken to and looked at what is being channeled. And the important question is, these presences are also just manifestations of the one consciousness, obviously.

So whatever you contact, and even if you contact extraterrestrials, they will be manifestation of the one consciousness. So ultimately, there's nothing alien in this world. As far as my interest, for many years, even after awakening, has been in channeling, although I never attempted to channel myself.

Channeling would mean one specific entity uses your mind and speaks through you. Some people, occasionally people thought that I was channeling when I speak. But I don't have the sense that a specific entity is speaking through me, rather than that consciousness is using my mind directly, rather than through an intermediary, so to speak.

Because the entity that speaks through the channeler, again, is an expression of consciousness. You always get, it's always consciousness. I've had some people who've told me that, I don't know, they saw me being overshadowed by some, I don't know whether that's the case or not.

I don't want, I don't need to explore this. In a way, when I speak, it flows from the presence. In that sense, it's channeled in the sense that I do not, as a person, I do not construct the sentences that I speak.

They flow from a deeper level. But I don't feel that they are dictated, so to speak, by an entity. I have examined the product of channelings.

Lots of channelings are not that profound. They are very nice words, but ultimately don't say very much. Or there are exceptions.

I'll get that in a minute. Or they tell you stories that could be very interesting science fiction. What Ashtar is doing, the commander of the galactic fleet, and so on.

Maybe he is, maybe he is not. I don't need to know that. There are some channelings that are exceptional, where there's actually a higher consciousness at work.

So, for example, the Course in Miracles is a book that was channeled through a medium, a medium, Helen Schucman was a psychologist at Columbia University. And this voice came through her and spoke through her. And she was writing, basically taking down dictation every day in her office at Columbia University.

She only told one colleague about it. She had to lock the door when she was doing it, because they would have thought she was insane. So she was taking down dictation.

It started with, she heard this inner voice, this is a course in miracles, please take notes. And she went to her colleague and said, I hear this voice, I think I'm going insane. And her colleague said, just write down what the voice says, and then we will decide whether you're insane or not.

And she wrote down, and it was not insane, it's actually a deeply inspired teaching, not for everybody, because the form in which it comes is not suitable for everyone. No one spiritual teaching is suitable for everyone. But the Course in Miracles has survived and will survive as a spiritual classic.

There are other channelings too that are quite profound, but they tend to be exceptional. So my main interest is, as far as the spirit realm is concerned, what comes through when people channel the messages. Now, there is the belief in many people that if they have passed away, they automatically are in possession of greater wisdom.

And I don't believe that to be the case from some experience. According to the famous dictum, just because they are dead doesn't mean they are smart. So you get a lot of posturing from these entities, sometimes they want to be taken seriously, they exaggerate their importance sometimes.

And at other times, it can also be the case, I observed, that the ego of the person channeling is actually the entity. So there isn't an entity, but the ego gets blown up and amplified, and the ego realizes how much power it can have over others when it suddenly changes its voice and looks up at the ceiling or something and goes, Hello, entities. I am here to guide you.

And it's very impressive. I mean, it's scary when you listen to them. Oh, my God.

He really must know the secret of the universe. So I wouldn't, spiritually speaking, I would not seek that out too much. It is comforting, of course, if you go to somebody who can contact deceased, it is very few who are genuine.

It can be very comforting to know that a loved one is still there, has not disappeared into nothingness. But there's also a lot of deception there with people who do that. But a few are very good.

But don't lose yourself in that, because then you give your own power away to other entities, and that can be also quite dangerous. So don't lose yourself in that realm. Go to consciousness directly, rather than seeking an intermediary through which to access wisdom.

Rather than that, find the wisdom that is within you. You don't need an intermediary in order to provide you with wisdom. Because it is inseparable from the essence of who you are and what you are.

The wisdom is in you. So don't seek it. If something like that happened to Helen Schucman, that's a different thing.

Suddenly, you are overpowered by this. And in most cases, when a voice comes to you, it's not good news. This person asks, after many years of meditation and all the twists and turns of life, I'm now in the grip of intense fear and anxiety.

It seems it was always there, only more intense now. Sitting with it, letting it be there seems to make it grow. So, well, fear, anxiety, which is a form of fear, very common.

Some people have it, many have it in the background continuously. And I would say there's some degree of fear, even if you're not conscious of it. If you're totally identified with the egoic mind, you will have fear, if only in the background.

And it may come out in other forms. It can come express itself as anger. If you look at anger closely, you'll usually find hidden underneath the anger is a state of fear.

So if there's fear, one important thing is to, of course, you need to direct your attention to it. You acknowledge that there's fear. The important question that arises is, are there any thought processes connected with the fear?

In other words, what are the thoughts that your mind is producing while you're feeling the fear? Is it possible that certain thoughts that you think frequently or habitually produce the fear? Is it possible you project yourself into the next moment, into the future moment, excessively trying to control something that you have no control over?

What's going to happen to me? Or creating an imaginary scenario of loss that you might suffer. It's not happening now, but it might happen.

And many things that the thought activity, the excessive thought activity, often creates scenarios of things going wrong that are not happening now, may never happen, often probably will never happen. And even if they did happen, the actual situation would actually be easier to face than the imaginary situation in your mind because there's nothing you can do. There's no action you can take to remedy an imaginary situation except to stop thinking it.

But if an actual situation arises, you face it and you give it your attention and then you take the action that you need to take. But an imaginary situation, you're totally at the mercy of it, so it only exists in your mind. So you need to see whether your mind is creating the fear by thinking fearful thoughts, by projecting itself into the future.

And if that is the case, then you can see, oh, so I'm creating those because my body cannot tell the difference between an actual event that's happening outside and what my mind is producing. So when I'm thinking thought, my life situation is critical. If this is basically what your thoughts are telling you, then your body believes that this is the actual truth, that you are being threatened at this very moment.

The body doesn't know the difference, that the tiger isn't in the room. The threatening presence is your thoughts. The body reacts in the same way, whether there's an actual threat in the room or your thoughts can create the same, even palpitations.

You can be shortness of breath because you're thinking fearful thoughts. You go, ah, at night. I had that for years.

It's an awful state. It's insane. It's a disease, but nothing is happening.

Absolutely nothing. There's a quiet room, nothing. It's all happening in the mind.

So if that's the case, see, okay, then you need to tackle the thoughts because they will cause the fear. And how do you tackle thoughts? It's by realizing the futility and the destructive nature of these thoughts and choosing to step out.

And what do you do to step out? First, you don't believe your mind that tells you, no, you can't step out. You have to continue thinking.

No, you step out and take a conscious breath or put your attention into the inner energy field of the body. A conscious choice to remove attention from thinking. And you may have to be really alert to do it.

If you are immersed in a mind stream, it could even be that it's so powerful that you just cannot get out. It has such gravitational pull. It pulls you, but at least you know that this is what's happening.

So there's a state where you cannot help yourself yet, but at least there is a beginning of a disidentification from it when you know that this is what is happening. So at least there's a part of you that knows this is not totally real. This is the fears being produced by my mind.

Or in those early stages, you may not yet be able to step out of it. It may be so strong that you're still totally in the grip of it, but at least you know that you're in the grip of it. The worst thing is to be in the grip of it and not even knowing it because you're so identified with it.

It is absolutely real to you. So even to know that this is happening is already a step forward. And then perhaps after a while, the energy exhausts itself a little bit of this, and then you can begin to say, okay, you will step out of those fearful thoughts because they are creating suffering.

And you take a conscious breath. And another. And another.

Then begin to feel the energy field of the body. Wow. It's like this huge burden is suddenly dropped away.

Now the important thing is then when you show the child what is wrong, that the showing does not come from a place of fear. It's always easier to answer something that's a concrete situation. So for example, with your child, can you give just one example of choice of behavior?

[Speaker 15] (6:37:30 - 6:37:31)
Well, there are some children who bite.

[Speaker 1] (6:37:32 - 6:37:33)
Bite?

[Speaker 15] (6:37:33 - 6:37:33)
Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (6:37:33 - 6:37:35)
Okay, now we're getting somewhere.

[Speaker 15] (6:37:35 - 6:38:27)
There are some children who bite other children. And it's true. And they do it.

Some do it just because they're still sensing with their mouths. And others do it out of anger. But it's a behavior that's harmful and frightening for others.

So parents certainly are confused about whether the child is able to understand consequences or whether it's just more love, more love, more love that's going to help that child to grow out of that particular behavior or running into a street or breaking away in a parking lot. Any of those behaviors are dangerous. And it's important to modify them.

But is it through firmness or is it through grace and love?

[Speaker 1] (6:38:28 - 6:46:12)
Now I understand completely what you're asking. You needed to mention the biting, then now I get it. Well, that's a very subtle balance because, of course, certain behaviors have consequences.

And if that's completely ignored on the side of the parent, then eventually the consequences of that type of behavior will come worse. So at some point, they will learn that biting others is wrong. And they will experience the consequences if you don't show them the consequences or make them aware of what they are doing.

We'll talk about how in a second. If you don't, then eventually when they go to kindergarten or school, eventually another child will bite them back, which may be a more painful way of experiencing the karmic result of their behavior. So the more you wait, the more painful the karmic result of your behavior becomes.

Or youngsters who are left free to do whatever they like. And eventually the parents try to shelter them from all consequences of their actions and protect them from consequences. And eventually then they will do something and then society will show them in the form of the police coming to your door that there are consequences to actions.

And then the karma might have worsened by then because the consequences may be... And what they do to others may be far worse than what they would have done at the age of six. So eventually the universe will show you the consequences.

So it's good for a parent in a gentle way to show the child the consequences of certain unconscious actions if only not just to protect them from karmic retribution at a later stage, but also sometimes simply to protect them from themselves because they might get themselves into a very dangerous place if you don't. And I've seen some parents that allow their children to walk along the seawall or whatever and they can go one false step and they would be gone. But the parent just doesn't want to interfere.

So they lose the balance between allowing and showing the child what is not right and protecting the child. Now the important thing is then when you show the child what is wrong, that the showing does not come from a place of fear because if it comes from a place of fear in you and that could be for example when you see the child going close to a precipice or close to the traffic or the road and sometimes I observe mothers or fathers who become almost hysterical because out of fear and then they run up to the child and they shake the child. Don't you ever do that again!

For the child it's a dreadful trauma. It's almost worse than being run over by a car or it's the emotional equivalent of being run over by a car. Can you imagine the trauma inflicted on a little child when a big grown-up shouts at them and there's an outflow of extremely destructive fear energy onto the child and that moment within a space of one minute the child's pain body is growing.

It's absorbing all that and then they are surprised if a little later the child goes into extreme negative emotions and moods and shouts and screams. The child has already absorbed the fear of the mother but of course the mother wanted to do well. It wanted to protect the child but the mother was unconscious.

She doesn't realize that the protection is almost worse than that which she's being protected against. It's almost like using an insecticide that is far worse than the insects. And so the question then, your question, grace is very important that you use that word.

Grace must be part of the showing. Grace is a compassionate space where you recognize that the child does not know yet. You don't punish the behavior.

You simply show clearly that this is wrong in the same way that we have to show our dog in some ways. Dogs also need to be taught that certain behaviors have consequences. So you don't hit a dog.

Well, I don't know. Maybe if you have a put book, what are they called? Pit bull, you might occasionally have to slap because it might have enormous energy but our dog doesn't need that.

Our dog comes, we hold out a little treat and usually the dog will go, ah! And sometimes it gets, you get your finger in there and that is karmically not good for the dog. So we say, we say, when it happens, we go, ouch!

And the dog is a little bit shocked and realizes on some level that she has just hurt you. You go, ouch! And the dog realizes, oh, I shouldn't have done that.

That's a very gentle way of doing it. So the grace when you do that child, the worst response is always the one that comes out of fear because out of fear also comes anger and so on. So when you pull the child back from the road, getting too close to the traffic, then you might have to act fast.

But the important thing is that just enough consciousness in you that you do not put fear onto the child. So you pull back in awareness and then, oh, this is very dangerous. But not the fear, just an alertness rather than the fear.

That's grace. And so that's the, every parent has to walk this, find this balance, of course, between interfering and stopping the child and showing the child consequences and allowing the child. There needs to be a balance.

It's not always easy, not always immediately obvious which one, whether to allow or whether not to not allow. But if you're not allow, the important thing is that it doesn't come from negative reaction. So that's the, might maybe helpful a little bit for you.

Again, self-awareness is the key, especially in a moment of crisis. You need to be doubly alert within yourself. The more critical a situation is, the more alertness is required.

I have a question about relationships. You mentioned yesterday not to have any expectations. And my question is, how do you differentiate between expectations and what you want and what you need?

Because I'm aware they both come from the ego. But where do you draw the line? Okay.

Well, there's nothing wrong with expectations.

Just don't attach yourself to them too much. If you believe in your expectations and you demand that they should be met, then you're setting yourself up. Of course, we have needs and we have desires.

But then you need to ask yourself, where are those needs and desires coming from? Are they coming from the egoic self? Are they coming from the pain body self?

Or are they just coming because that's part of a healthy, successful relationship, to have a balanced relationship? So you have to ask yourself that and then look at that and answer honestly. So are you speaking about like, who does the dishes?

No. Okay.

[Speaker 10] (6:48:14 - 6:48:29)
Give a real example. So for example, spending time together. So me and my partner, we don't agree on the amount of time because we don't have the same needs.

And he tells me it's my ego who wants that.

Ah, that's a good one. So you want more time with him than he wants with you. Okay.

[Speaker 10] (6:48:39 - 6:48:55)
Why do you want more time with him? Because I need to connect and spend time together. That's something I need.

Okay. But the amount of time that you spend together, are you together with him?

[Speaker 3] (6:48:55 - 6:49:00)
Yes. Like really together? Yes.

And that doesn't satisfy you?

[Speaker 10] (6:49:01 - 6:49:03)
No, it's very, very limited.

[Speaker 3] (6:49:04 - 6:49:08)
Very limited. So when you say limited, you spend one minute a day together?

[Speaker 10] (6:49:09 - 6:49:10)
Two evenings a month.

[Speaker 3] (6:49:11 - 6:49:16)
Two evenings a month. Do you live in separate countries or something?

[Speaker 10] (6:49:17 - 6:49:20)
No, separate areas in the same city.

[Speaker 3] (6:49:21 - 6:49:37)
And is this a monogamous relationship? Yes. Okay.

All right. And what's his reason for two days a month or two evenings a month or whatever it is?

[Speaker 10] (6:49:37 - 6:49:59)
So he's very busy, but his main reason is spiritual. Have you been to this guy's house? No.

Interesting. Why not? He hasn't invited me.

How long have you been together? I knew you were going to ask this. Two years.

Two years and you've never...

[Speaker 3] (6:49:59 - 6:50:02)
Is this guy married? No. Are you sure?

[Speaker 16] (6:50:03 - 6:50:03)
Yes.

[Speaker 3] (6:50:05 - 6:50:10)
And he hasn't invited you. So have you invited yourself?

[Speaker 10] (6:50:11 - 6:50:12)
I tried.

[Speaker 3] (6:50:12 - 6:50:24)
Oh, and he says no. Well, this is very interesting. This would put up a red flag for me.

Me too. Well, okay. So what are you doing with him?

[Speaker 10] (6:50:25 - 6:50:26)
That's the question.

[Speaker 3] (6:50:27 - 6:50:39)
So the question... Okay. But my question, because...

No, my answer would be different if you were to say, oh yeah, we spend every day together, you know, but I still want more time with him.

[Speaker 10] (6:50:42 - 6:51:00)
So... But this is putting up a red flag for you. It raises a question for me in terms of which part of me...

How can I differentiate the part of me that wants to spend time that comes from the conditioned self and the part of me that wants to spend time because it's healthy needs? That's where I get confused.

[Speaker 3] (6:51:02 - 6:52:10)
I don't think you're confused. I really don't. I think you're justifying.

You're trying to fit this all in. You know the amount of time that you need. But how do I know?

If you want more, say for example, you're spending almost every day together and you're still saying you want more, this is probably more of the pain body wanting more. But... This one's a challenging one because you're only spending two days out of a month.

So you haven't even yet figured out what your real need is compared to this other thing that's just two days a month. So now I'm not saying two days a month is wrong. It would be good if you were happy with it too.

Then what's the problem? You're both happy with it. But you are not happy with it.

You would like a partner who is able to spend more time with you. So I'm asking you, why are you with him still?

[Speaker 10] (6:52:11 - 6:52:19)
Because I got confused as to maybe it's my ego that wants this. Why can't I just accept what I have?

But you're not accepting your inner self first. You're not accepting the inner calling for you and that divine desire to have a partner that you can spend more time with. Every relationship is a challenge, but we have to find our way to be in relationship with each other.

You're not finding, and he's not meeting you, to find that relationship. You haven't even been to his home yet after two years. Hello?

Wake up. Wake up to yourself. You know the answers.

You know it. But my sense is there's fear there. There's fear.

And you got to work past that fear. That fear of being alone. You're willing to sacrifice yourself and your needs and your wishes, your wants, your desires, human desires.

And take a little crumb and go, oh, I guess, you know, I don't want my ego in a way, so I guess I just have to accept what is. But you're accepting the external before you accept the internal, where it needs to be the reverse. You accept the internal, and then the external will follow.

And that might mean when you accept the internal, it's bye-bye. Unless you can accept the internal, and then suddenly you accept the internal, and you're just like this presence. And he might turn around and want to spend more time with you.

You don't know. But you need to be present first and accept what's in here first. So I will be very interested to hear what is going to happen.

Because the longer that you stay in something that is not feeding your soul, because relationships do and can feed our soul, not that we expect and want it to and demand it to and think that this person will make me whole, because another person cannot make you whole. It just enhances your relationship, your life situation, and challenges it too. So what do you think you'll do?

It's pretty clear.

[Speaker 3] (6:55:27 - 6:55:29)
But say it.

[Speaker 10] (6:55:31 - 6:55:38)
I want to hear what you're going to do. I'm going to look after myself first. Right.

[Speaker 16] (6:55:39 - 6:55:39)
And leave him.

[Speaker 10] (6:55:40 - 6:55:41)
And leave him.

All right.

[Speaker 10] (6:55:45 - 6:55:47)
You got the support behind you, man.

[Speaker 1] (6:56:21 - 7:13:11)
So your task is not only to find moments in your life when you become still, alert, present, and to realize for yourself the possibility of stepping into no mind, not thinking, and yet being fully conscious and alert. It's a wonderful, wonderful thing. It's part of the awakening, essential part of the awakening, to be able to stop thinking.

For example, now, and now, and now. Don't get scared. It's only the ego that might get scared, because it says, I'm disappearing.

There's just a nothingness. You're not disappearing. Who you are essentially is emerging more fully when the mind stops, like now.

And there's not just a nothingness. There is an intense field of alive presence. It has no form.

It has no location. It is within and without. So it's wonderful to be able to step into that state of consciousness, means you're awakening.

The awakening process is happening. Even to say you are awakening isn't quite correct. But the awakening process is happening.

But make sure that it's not confined to moments that you set aside to become still, to become present, or to listen to this teaching. That's wonderful. You need that also until you don't need it anymore.

But it's essential to have your daily life, your working life at work, your relationship life, relationships, family relationships, other kinds of relationships at work, interspersed continuously with the presence of the stillness, so that you have, you don't spend, let's say, where you work in an office, you don't spend nine to five getting lost in doing, and in your mind, and getting upset, and getting angry, and participating in all that. And then you get home, and then finally you sit when you've had your dinner, and finally you say, ah, now I'm going to meditate, or be present, or practice stillness, and then you become still. Well, it's better than nothing, but it hasn't changed your life.

Make sure there's not a separation between your spiritual life and your working life. Some people tell me, well, I can be spiritual when I'm alone, or I can be spiritual when I'm walking in nature, but I lose it when I start talking to people, or I'm back at work. So you need to be aware of that, so that even while you are engaged in doing, so that even while you are engaged in doing, you're still rooted in being.

Be aware of your mind, of thoughts that arise, so that you don't become possessed by every thought that arises. It helps when the mind is very active, and it's being challenged by people or events. It helps to have some attention in the inner energy field of your body, and feel the presence that is in every cell of the body.

It's alive. You need to know and decide for yourself that you don't want to be part of the madness of this world anymore. And when something challenging happens, you lose something, your bank manager calls about something, and then the assumption of the egoic mind is, this isn't the time to be spiritual, I have to deal with this first.

What does it mean to be spiritual? It means to be aware of yourself as the presence. That's your prime responsibility in life.

The very purpose of your life is that. The very purpose of your life is not to succeed at this or that undertaking or endeavor or business activity or whatever. That is not the purpose, it's to succeed on that level.

It's not your real purpose. It's a secondary purpose, perhaps. But your primary purpose is presence.

To know yourself as the presence, as the alert presence. And then deal with things. And then you will notice what happens or does not happen.

You recognize that as secondary. Whether some endeavor succeeds or doesn't succeed is also secondary. You still, you are very active, and yet you realize everything is secondary to secondary.

Something else that's primary. I've told the story before, I haven't mentioned it in a while. On the spiritual teacher, Krishnamurti, who passed away in the, I believe in 85.

He used to travel around the world giving talks for 50 years or more. And in one talk, towards the end of his life, he said, people have often asked me what my secret is. And now I'm going to tell you what my secret is.

Everybody got very alert suddenly, including the people who had been following him for 30 years without getting it. And then he said, my secret is this. I don't mind what happens.

So the people listening, they thought something else was going to come, but that was it. I don't mind what happens. What does that mean?

First of all, in the English language, I don't mind is very different from I don't care. If English is not your native language, you can look up the difference. If English is your native language, you know intuitively that I don't care is a negativity.

I don't care what happens. I don't care what happens to me anymore. I'm fed up with life.

I don't care. That's, you really, you still do care. You're in a negative relationship to the world and to yourself.

I don't mind is a detachment from what happens or doesn't happen, but you can only be detached because you are rooted in something deeper in being. And with that comes a detachment with which you not only observe things and other people and events around you, but also a detachment that comes into your doing, the way you relate and do things. First of all, important aspect of detachment is you are not attached to the result.

You're not attached to the outcome. It creates a lot of fear and anxiety if you are attached. So you do your best.

It works out fine. If it doesn't work out, it's also fine because you are rooted in being. And the strange paradox is, it's more likely to turn out fine if you're rooted in being and you're not anxious about the outcome because the anxiety about the outcome creates a lot of secondary negative energy.

If the outcome is threatened, for example, you got angry. If the outcome is threatened, you get upset. Lost, completely lost.

So that is the secret of life. The rootedness in being. And then enjoy the spectacle of life around you.

Every moment there is beauty. Every moment. And you can even enjoy the doing.

You might not be as hyperactive as somebody who is completely lost in doing, but that you're doing whatever you do do will be more effective because there'll be an unconditioned intelligence behind it and a power flowing into it that is deeper than the merely personal realm of mental power, not separate from it, but deeper. Every moment there is beauty and aliveness around you. You appreciate what is.

So I wish you a happy Christmas and I'm here in British Columbia, Canada, just outside Vancouver. And the beauty here is the trees and the sky. You can perhaps see a little bit of that on the screen.

And wherever you are, it'll be something else. Let's give it attention, whatever is there. Acknowledge it's being.

When you are rooted in being, you can acknowledge not only the being, you can sense the inherent aliveness of other humans, of animals, and even of inanimate objects, of nature, of course, but even inanimate objects. Everything has a beingness to it. It is.

I'll leave you with that. And the contemplation of the trees here that I can see from my place. I wish you well.

Be at peace.

[Speaker 16] (7:13:41 - 7:13:42)
Thank you.

[Speaker 9] (7:14:11 - 7:14:35)
I'm not really attached to things per se anymore, but I find myself being very, very attached to people, even people who abandon me, whether my father or my best friend. And it's clear to me that they don't want me in their life, so why am I so attached and cling on to wanting them in my life?

[Speaker 3] (7:14:38 - 7:14:41)
Is this still happening today, where they don't want you? Yes.

[Speaker 9] (7:14:41 - 7:15:05)
You're alive, your parents? My father, yeah. Your father.

And my best friend. So the two people I thought would never leave me has left me. And whenever I go into a very, very deep meditation, there they are.

And I just get stuck by this complete feeling of suffering, and I don't know why I'm still chasing these people. Attachment, I guess.

We keep chasing something when we haven't fully, really accepted it and felt the repercussions of the event. When did your father leave?

[Speaker 9] (7:15:25 - 7:15:27)
When I was about 10.

[Speaker 3] (7:15:29 - 7:15:31)
And he's still out of the picture. Have you seen him at all?

[Speaker 9] (7:15:31 - 7:15:38)
Yeah, I have, but we only see each other when it suits him. Oh, you're angry.

[Speaker 3] (7:15:39 - 7:15:44)
Yeah, of course. Yeah. So have you ever felt that anger?

Really feel it?

[Speaker 9] (7:15:44 - 7:15:52)
Yeah, I feel it all the time. The problem with the anger is that I latch it on to other people now, people I don't even have any connection with. I find myself being angry with them.

[Speaker 3] (7:15:52 - 7:16:33)
Yeah, yeah. So the problem in itself isn't anger. It's what you do with the anger that becomes the problem.

So you latching, attaching it to other people. But the anger that is inside of you, have you really felt that? Or do you go, I'm angry, but your mind might say, oh, but I really shouldn't be angry.

And maybe on some subconscious level, on an unconscious level, you maybe say, oh, you know, I'm too spiritual for this. To really feel anger? No, that's somehow wrong.

[Speaker 9] (7:16:36 - 7:16:41)
No, I've been a very, very angry person. I think everyone around me knows that.

[Speaker 3] (7:16:42 - 7:16:58)
Yeah, so it manifests outwardly, but I'm asking you, have you actually really felt it without the manifestation of it, outwardly? It's manifesting in you, but outwardly. So in other words, you don't react to this feeling of anger.

[Speaker 9] (7:16:59 - 7:17:03)
Have you really just felt it? I feel I have, but.

[Speaker 10] (7:17:07 - 7:17:08)
But what?

[Speaker 9] (7:17:10 - 7:17:13)
But I think that anger is a cover-up feeling.

[Speaker 3] (7:17:14 - 7:17:15)
Okay, covering up what?

[Speaker 9] (7:17:16 - 7:17:19)
Well, I think that anger is the easiest feeling to have.

Okay.

[Speaker 9] (7:17:20 - 7:17:31)
Instead of being terribly sad, I mean, who would want to say, nobody wants me? Or the most important people that I love don't want me. It's much easier to be angry.

[Speaker 3] (7:17:32 - 7:17:45)
Yeah, you're right on that. Anger is a stage of the grief process. So if you know that, then can you uncover and go deeper than the anger?

And have you felt that?

[Speaker 9] (7:17:48 - 7:17:49)
That's a good question.

[Speaker 3] (7:17:50 - 7:18:03)
You answered it, actually. I'm just saying, can you feel that? Can you go underneath the anger, and what is it that you feel?

Go there now.

[Speaker 9] (7:18:07 - 7:18:18)
Yeah, I feel that. Then there's no point in me being here. Like, if other people.

[Speaker 3] (7:18:18 - 7:18:22)
Talk to me more about that. What do you mean, there's no point in you being here? Did you have that feeling?

[Speaker 9] (7:18:23 - 7:18:39)
Yeah, I mean, if the people you love the most don't love you back, I know I'm supposed to be one of a bigger consciousness and say, well, that doesn't matter. Nobody loves me, but I'm part of a greater consciousness. But in reality, that's very difficult.

[Speaker 3] (7:18:39 - 7:19:58)
So that's the error that you're holding onto is the expectation of what love is and how love should be shown to you. We are only able to love at the level of consciousness that we are at. So I don't think your father doesn't love you.

I think your father loves you. It's just he is more unconscious. He's unconscious.

So he can't love you the way that you desire and the way that you want and the way that you expect and maybe even need because he's just not there. Can you accept the level of consciousness that he is at? It's hard because you have the expectation that parents ought to love me.

Unconditionally. The only real unconditional love unless you're fully awakened is awareness, your own inner stillness.

That's true.

[Speaker 3] (7:20:04 - 7:22:04)
So right now, what I see is a disconnection from your head, your body, your emotions. They're disconnected. You have that thought, that expectation of, geez, a mother and a father should do this, do that, do this and love this way and only this way and forgetting that their level of consciousness might be quite low.

In fact, it might be really low. So who am I now as this adult? Who is going to love me unconditionally?

So long as we are stuck there, we're gonna point and look out there for that person who's going to unconditionally love me and whether it's a male or female girlfriend, oh, there is that girlfriend who I know will unconditionally love me, who will love me and you've had this great friendship for a while and then as all things happen, including relationships, they'll dissolve. We may live together until one of you dies. It's still an ending of a relationship.

So as long as we keep that unprocessed event that happened to us when we were younger and keep that in our consciousness and think now because we have read in books that good parents do this. I mean, maybe the words aren't said like that but basically we read these things, we hear these things and we believe that this is the now new way how parenting should happen. Well, it's a lot more complicated than that because shit happens to everybody all the time.

Where did they come from? What part of the world were your parents from?

They're Danish. They're Danish. So and how old are they?

He's 73 and she's 63.

Let me see, I'm not really good at math but in a sense, what I'm trying to get at is that if they were brought up, say, during the war, they've got that shit. So that shit gets piled. This is where Christ says the sins of the generation be passed on from generation to generation if we're not awake.

So it will get passed on. So he's just passing on his shit but you have awakened, hallelujah, really. And it's a tough call to be that first to awaken in a family because that's what you're still having to deal with.

But then that's where you go through that process and learn that compassion and you learn that compassion by actually then feeling what you're really feeling inside. That sadness, that grief of that little girl who just needed to be loved, wanted to be felt like as if my parents want me.

[Speaker 9] (7:23:25 - 7:23:32)
Thank you very much. You're welcome. It helped a lot.

But that is our work for each and every one of us because we most likely, it can happen, though. It can happen where our parents awaken and then they come and they do that apology bit and it's a sincere apology and then things shift. But a lot of times it's not gonna happen that way and it may not happen that way.

And as we awaken in consciousness, then we feel all that suffering that has happened in our childhood and not only our childhood but that is now in our cellular structure, that of our ancestors, our parents, our grandparents and theirs. It's in us, it's like in our bones and that's the collective consciousness. So that's what we then have to also transcend and transmute.

It's hard work, I understand that fully because I have to do that as well. It's work, it's not only my shit but it's also the shit of my parents and then their parents. And I can sometimes feel that.

When I've worked through mine and I still have this sense of something that is there, I go deeper and I go, okay, is this mine? And I feel it and it's like a definite no but I can feel that it's coming from my family. I mean, we are all connected, all connected.

Just because we appear to be separate, there is a connection on an energetic level and not only an energetic level but on the actual cellular level. So I really applaud you. It is really good work that you're doing and sometimes it feels really lonely to do this work but we only feel lonely because we still have that little bit of expectation that somebody should be there.

But you know what? Somebody is there but sometimes it's not in form. As we awaken everybody here today, there is a connection and even though that you may leave this room after this weekend and we go through our everyday lives and awaken and we may be alone, we are not alone because we are the formless dimension and the awakening consciousness that is you and me, it's one.

And if we can remind ourselves that, that alone feeling begins to dissipate and disappear. I had this sense, this image come up for me when it's like making that leap to cross from that form world into that unknown world and being suspended kind of between that mid-air point and it's like standing on that edge and I'm like, oh, I don't know if I can make that jump. I don't know if I can make that jump.

Nobody is around telling me, yeah, you can do it, you can do it, but it was like this feeling inside where I just felt, oh my God, everybody who has crossed this path was standing there saying you can do it, you can do it, you can make that leap but the only thing is is that they can't do it for you. You are, so which in a way you are alone in this, you are the only one that can finally just jump, nobody else. They can say, go, yes, yes, yes, go for it, go for it and they won't push you.

So this is a critical time in our spiritual awakening. Am I going to make that leap? Consciousness and everybody out there in the so-called awakening consciousness, very patient, very patient, will not push you, just kindly and gently encouraging you and waiting for you on the other side and on this side saying, yes, you can, go ahead, you can do it and when you're ready because we're only going to do something when we are ready.

It's like what I mentioned about the flower. There's a certain point that just keeps blooming and blooming and we can't make it bloom any quicker. This intuitive, natural, spontaneous, so-called action will occur and happen where we will just finally just go, poop, no thought.

It's only while we're just sitting on the edge and our thoughts are still there so there's still that attachment to the world or to the pain body and emotion, something old that's happened to us. So it's not just material items. I'm speaking about emotional items as well or thought patterns or anything that we attach ourselves to.

So long as there's this attachment, we will not make that leap, but that's okay because we are getting ready to make that leap by looking at what we are attached to, by disconnecting from all that we are attached to. And usually it's deep suffering that will bring about a deeper awakening where we just finally cross.

Something you can practice here and for the rest of your life is to perceive things, look and listen. Sometimes even smell or touch or taste without any mental label. This is an ideal environment to do it in, in nature, but you can do it anywhere.

And it's not even a doing, we call it doing. Just you look at something or even just looking around. So either a specific thing or you take in the totality of what's there, either in the room or out in nature, the sky, the trees, or you look at one thing and you don't, you're still while you look.

And that's very important practice. And then you listen, various sounds arise most of the time and you just, then always two things are there. There's that which arises in your sense perception, listening, seeing, and there is the space of consciousness in which it arises.

You can also call it the light of consciousness in which it is perceived without which there would be no perception. And whenever you do that, you are not a person in that moment. You are not a person.

You are what comes to the forefront is the transcendent dimension to who you are, the consciousness. And so you can sense yourself as the consciousness, which is the space for whatever is being perceived. And that's, it's, there's almost a kind of joy in that, an aliveness, a beingness.

You're really, you can sense your own identity beyond who you are beyond the person by just perceiving something. And then at the same time, sensing your own presence, which isn't your own, but let's call it your own, the presence. And that is a passive thing.

It seems seemingly, it's a taking in what's there. The next step is to practice being yourself. Being in that transcendent state of consciousness while things are going on around you.

More challenging. Being in that state while you're engaged in some activity, start with simple activities. And again, there's a, the background is the presence.

You can, you're doing whatever it is you need to do for certain activities. Of course, you need to think and your thinker will start up. That's fine.

When you speak, there's thinking, but you can, if you are, while you speak, you can still be connected to the transcendent. Then you don't speak from the level of the personality. Then you speak from a more intelligent level of consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness.

Very different kind of speaking. When you speak from the personality, whatever you say is colored and determined by the conditioning of your mind as the person. There's another way of speaking.

Even if it's a simple conversation, you're speaking from a truer, deeper level of who you are. And those words are, have a certain quality. They may, you might not be saying necessarily anything significant, but those words have a certain aliveness and quality that is different from what comes from the personality level.

So at any given time, there's, there's the two dimensions to who you are, one could say. Let's, for the time being, let's put it like that. There's the personal level.

And there's the transcendent you. And usually the transcendent in your normal daily life will be in the background. If you can sense that in the background, then you can deal with the stuff you need to deal with in the foreground of your life, to this and this and this.

Even thinking is in the foreground of your life. Think, I have to think about this. And yet, at the same time, you sense yourself as the presence.

So that's the, the depths within you. There's a stillness. There can be a stillness even while you're speaking.

There's a stillness in the background. And when you've come to the end of a sentence, you might notice, you might get, there's a gap and you're not thinking between the end of one sentence and the beginning of a new sentence. And so more and more, the transcendent self comes in, emerges more into your life, comes in more.

And the conditioned self does not disappear completely, but the conditioned self becomes more, less dense. The density of the personality, that many people are in the grip of that. There's a heaviness to it.

I can sometimes see how people carry this burden of a personality without any, not the slightest glimpse of anything beyond. And it's a terrible burden to carry. The only sense of self they have is that conditioned sense of self.

And it's a, there's a heaviness to it and a density. And as the transcendent emerges more, the personality level becomes more lighter and more, one could say transparent almost. So the light shines through more.

You can, the analogy you could use is a lampshade. When there's only the personality, the lampshade is so heavy, there's only a little bit of light shining through, but the layers of the lampshade are so thick that only very little comes through. And whatever comes through is totally formed by the lampshade.

And then the shade gets a bit more transparent and there's more light coming through. The same person is still there, the same lampshade, but there's more, there's a transparency to something deeper. And that's the only way you become more authentic.

You become more truly yourself, the deeper, unconditioned self, which the Buddha calls the no self. And if in spiritual terminology, you could call Buddha nature is arising, Christ consciousness is arising, whatever you want to call it. So you cannot love your neighbor as yourself, as somebody once said, he said, love your neighbor as yourself, but he didn't give that as a commandment because he would have known that that's impossible for the personality.

They missed a little bit when they wrote down what he was saying. He said, when you put the kingdom of heaven bit goes together with the loving your neighbor as yourself. So when you find that dimension within yourself, that is the kingdom of heaven, which in modern terms, I would translate as the dimension of kingdom is dimension.

Heaven is in many languages is the same word as sky in French, in Spanish, in German, heaven and sky are the same word. So Jesus uses this thing, the sky, the vast expanse of the sky as the closest word he can get to describing the inner space, the inner spaciousness. Sky has no form.

Sky, we have a word for sky, but sky doesn't actually exist. There is no sky. There just seems to be a sky because what you're seeing as the blue, if it's blue, is just the light against the background of space, the dark of the space behind this creates that illusion that there is something there.

But if you travel upwards, you will never reach the sky. You may reach the clouds and then you go to the clouds and then there's more sky. And finally it's gone.

Where was the sky? There is no sky. So it has no form.

So he used the best word he could find was heaven or sky, the kingdom of heaven, the dimension of formlessness, which is within you, he said. And that's the most important thing in your life to find that, that's priority number one. And then as he found that, then you love your neighbor as yourself because you recognize the same formless essence in you is the same formless essence in the so-called other.

And then you love your neighbor as yourself. But no matter how hard you try, you can't really, real empathy, real loving kindness, real benevolence, real goodwill towards another. It's not really, you cannot sustain for very long if there's only the personality level, you have a resemblance of that, but it's usually the ego playing a particular role.

This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Hello, my name's Dominique. I'm a doctor in Australia and I work combining natural medicine and Western medicine. Just breathe for a second.

[Speaker 1] (7:44:54 - 7:44:59)
That's good, take your time. We are not in a hurry. Thank you.

Just like, I guess some pointers about how to think about the situation that I've seen in medicine. I'm really shocked quite often by the standard that Western doctors work at. And I see that it seems fairly straightforward to do a reasonably good job, I think, to assist people who are starting to have early signs of sickness and imbalance.

And there's so much knowledge now about how to address that and how to help them feel better. And it's really important to me that for myself and I think for patients as well, that when we're in balance, when we're physically well and stronger, it's easier to be at peace. It's easier to be conscious and to access the transcended dimension.

So it's really important. So yeah, I see this kind of, I don't know, I feel really compelled and concerned by this gap between what's being practised in medicine and this need. Because people do the right thing, they go to the doctor.

And I feel really sad.

You're talking about mainstream medicine, the way it's practised?

Yeah.

Which does not consider the entire human being and the consciousness of the human being, but the symptom only.

[Speaker 8] (7:47:08 - 7:47:40)
Well, yes, but even in that, often I see that very basic tests are not done and drugs are given, like antidepressants, for example. Someone will go to the doctor because they're tired and maybe they're a bit depressed because they're tired. And many, many times a blood test isn't even done, which is really bad medicine.

But that's very normal now because of this alignment we have with drugs.

Yes, yes. Well, I'm sure there's, although I know personally some doctors, even within mainstream, who are practising it consciously, but those are still the exceptions. I just want to acknowledge that within mainstream medicine, there are some people who are conscious and making a wonderful contribution.

Also, before I say anything else, to acknowledge other practitioners like nurses who are doing a wonderful job. They somehow, although some nurses are under great stress, but they provide the human dimension, which is often lacking in mainstream medicine. And having said that, mainstream medicine is, to a large extent, still very unenlightened and creating a lot of, almost as much suffering as it solves.

So a change is imminent in mainstream medicine. And I don't think we will have to wait for too long before it happens. In the meantime, we depend on people like you to do things differently.

And don't focus on what's wrong. You can point out what's wrong, but don't focus too much on what's wrong and focus only on how things need to be done with awareness and you can show the way. You can show the way and then things will change more quickly.

So don't focus on, don't, instead, don't, even criticizing too much can be counterproductive. Just point out certain things that people need to know and make your contribution. Focus on that, show others, explain to others.

And then the change starts with you or you are contributing, important contributing factor in that change. So many things are going to change as consciousness awakens on the planet from science to medicine and many other things are going to go through deep changes so that in a few hundred years, we look back on this age in the same way in which we look back on not just the middle ages, but even much before then, almost the stone age. And we think we know it all right now, but we don't and even science only knows the surface of reality right now.

It's very, it's done a very good job with exploring the surface of reality, but there's far more than meets the eye, far more than Higgs, what was that thing called? Higgs particle, bosom, bosom, bosom. So do your thing and allow the change.

Change starts with you and then it'll spread from you. So don't dwell on what's wrong, focus on what's right. That's very important.

And sometimes if you allow, then people change and sometimes they don't, but they're more likely to change if you bring an acceptance. If you no longer oppose a person who always putting out their old stuff towards you, if you don't, which is her egoic identity, is continuously reasserted by her criticism of you. Her criticism of you, she doesn't know that, but her criticism of you asserts her sense of self, her false sense of self, because every time she criticizes you, she is right.

She is so right. And the ego loves nothing better than to be right, because the more often you are right and the more right you are, the bigger the ego is. You feel more acknowledged in your sense of who you are.

That's why she loves criticizing, but of course she doesn't know what she's doing. It's all unconscious. But if you recognize that this is what she's doing, then you realize that's not your mother at all.

The true being of your mother is somewhere hiding underneath all that stuff. It's obscured by all the egoic conditioning. It's hiding somewhere there.

But you strengthen the egoic patterns by opposing them.

How do I deal with the election of Donald Trump?

I thought somebody might ask that.

But last night I listened to you. I listened to you at my home here in San Diego. And what you told me and what I've done, and Donald has helped me, he's made me go deep very quickly.

Okay? And he is going to be my spiritual practice for the next four years. And you help me with that to understand instead of saying, you son of a gun.

I don't like you. I don't want you to be there. Why are you there?

This is impossible. It must have been some sort of alternative fact. Okay?

It isn't. It wasn't. But that's okay.

Because I'm going to accept it. And it's going to be my spiritual practice for the next four years. Thank God.

It's wonderful. Now, my question. I read your books.

And there's one little phrase that you have that, and I listened to the tape you've done with Oprah, the ten sessions you did, about five times. And you talk about it. But the part of when you say, life is the dancer.

And we are the dance. And Oprah said, isn't it the other way around? And you explained it somewhat.

But I didn't grasp it. And you being here in front of me is the most joyous thing in my life to have you answer that. I couldn't ask for anything more.

This is one of the most special times of my life. So if you could answer that.

I think a lot of people have that question, too. Thank you. And first of all, thank you about what you said about Donald Trump.

That is very helpful. I hardly need to answer any more questions about Donald Trump, because you've said it already. Thank you.

The acceptance of what is, because that's what is. You can't argue with what is. That is what is.

Not being, I'll just talk for a moment about the first part. That wasn't the question, but you beautifully told us your realization. To use any condition, we talked about the comfort zone.

So there's also collective comfort zones that people want to be in. You are drawn, for example, to the news sources that correspond to your beliefs, the conditioning of your mind. So you don't want to be taken out of your comfort zone.

And this happens, life does it to you. It does it to individuals. And then it takes entire groups of people out of their comfort zone, which has happened here.

And this is a relatively minor way of being taken out of their comfort zone. People in Syria are being taken out of their comfort zone in a much more violent way than what's happened here so far. So people experience collectively these upheavals.

And it's also need to realize that, if possible, try to enter the mind space of the other part of America who are in their comfort zone now, who were not in their comfort zone before. So why is that? They are now in their comfort zone and we are not in the comfort zone.

Try to enter what is it that, how do they see the world? I'm not talking about the fringe extreme, because those exist, obviously, deeply unconscious people who, well, there's not much one can do there. But it wasn't just the extreme, the fringe extreme fringe that brought him into power.

There were many ordinary humans who genuinely felt that deep change was needed. And then he happened to be there and represented it. So what is there?

I listened to Marianne Williamson, who is much more engaged in politics than I am. And she even ran for Congress. And she went to some events in Washington soon after the election.

And she talked to some supporters of Donald Trump and in a very open way. And those were not deeply unconscious people that are on the on the fringes. And they said to her, you didn't vote for him, did you?

And she said, no, I didn't. And she had a human interaction beyond the mindset of those people. She was able to reach these people.

So not to demonize half of the population. So because it's not that simple. There is unconsciousness on both parts of the population.

So hold it all in that space of awareness. And do what if you feel you want need to take action, make sure it is not a reaction that comes from anger, because the more you're motivated by anger, the more you contribute to the unconsciousness. If you see the rising of unconsciousness in here, don't contribute to it and become angry because unconsciousness is rising.

Because then you become what you are fighting against. You need to be very careful that you do not become what you are fighting against. And this happens, for example, when people start smashing up places, destroying property and cars, because they're wanting to fight the fascists.

So don't become that. So let's take consciousness and then disseminate information, talk, create your YouTube channel if you feel you have to, and explain how you see it in a loving way. You don't need an angry YouTube channel.

There are enough of those already. So don't need to add another one. And then this is just one example of what you can do.

I don't know much about social media. There's also Facebook. I don't know how that works.

But although I have in the past occasionally posted something by, not personally, but I gave it to somebody to post. I may do so again, by the way. I may even comment on political situations.

So. And then your question is?

[Speaker 11] (8:01:40 - 8:01:47)
Life is the dancer. Yes. And we are the dance, which is the opposite of what we would think.

[Speaker 1] (8:01:47 - 8:01:58)
Okay. I'm not sure if I can answer that question, because that's something that I said a long time ago. So fair enough.

[Speaker 11] (8:01:58 - 8:01:58)
Okay.

If I said it right now, I would be able to tell you what it means. But give me, just one moment. Well, I believe what I meant was, it's always strange when one goes to the past and people say, what did you mean when you said that 10 years ago?

Did I say that?

I'm sorry. I went fairly deep.

[Speaker 1] (8:02:28 - 8:04:32)
The dancer and the dance, this analogy, if that's what it is, that I used is. The dancer is the consciousness and life as this unfolds in the world of form and multiplicity on this planet and many other places is the dance of life. The dancer is who you are in your essence.

The dancer is God, ultimately the one consciousness. You are the one consciousness. And the one consciousness expresses itself as this so-called person or human being.

I love that expression, human being. You remember how I interpret human being? Human is the form.

Being is the formless. Being is the dancer. And human is the dance.

That's beautiful. Thank you so much. Thanks.

Once you've asked a question, while you listen, you direct your awareness into the inner feeling of your hands. And that keeps it there so that it doesn't, your mind doesn't take off.

[Speaker 12] (8:04:36 - 8:04:57)
For someone who's a little bit hyperactive, what's the best way to get a balance between removing content, which is really good, but then not getting annoyed when content comes in and you think, oh, it's spoiling my peace. Is there some way to get a balance?

I assume the question applies to yourself.

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (8:05:01 - 8:05:30)
So that someone is you. Yeah. Okay.

Just wanted to make sure. So you are hyperactive. Yeah.

Now, rather than explaining it to us in an abstract way, can you give an example or one example of where this is problematic and how it manifests in your life?

So, for example, here after the talks, I can go out to the nature and it's, I get a glimpse now of some kind of presence. Yes. And I also want to engage with other people.

But I know once I get on a roll, for example, speaking, how good the talk was, I'm into a, just a torrent. So it's almost, should I just go and sit in the park for hours and hours? But that's too extreme probably.

I'm creating probably more content trying to analyze whether to keep up, stay out of the way or...

[Speaker 1] (8:06:09 - 8:06:15)
So when you engage in conversation, then do you tend to speak fast or...

[Speaker 12] (8:06:15 - 8:06:15)
Yes. Yeah. Yeah.

I just totally lose... The mind takes over and you're dragged along. Yeah.

Yes. Now this being dragged along by the mind happens to many, many people, but perhaps you slightly more extreme form, your mind is even more powerful than the normal mind. And so you're dragged along before you know it.

And so do you tend to sometimes avoid interaction in order not to be dragged along? Yes. Yeah.

So it's either you get dragged along or you sit there and can't interact. Yeah.

[Speaker 12] (8:06:54 - 8:06:56)
It's like two settings, full blast or off.

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (8:07:04 - 8:07:23)
When somebody talks to you, of course, what is, how do you experience yourself when you listen to somebody? What is your, how do you listen to another person? Is your mind already preparing what we're going to say or...

Yeah, definitely.

[Speaker 12] (8:07:23 - 8:07:31)
Whenever anybody tells me the name, never, ever remember it because it's, I'm probably somewhere else when that's coming in.

[Speaker 1] (8:07:31 - 8:07:40)
Yeah. Have you done any practice, meditation, any kind of meditation practice, formal meditation?

[Speaker 12] (8:07:40 - 8:07:49)
Yeah, I try and I'm guessing if I do reasonably well for that first five minutes, when I get up and go outside, it's lovely.

Now, when you're out in nature by yourself, are you able to be present to some extent or is your mind still active while you're looking at the trees or at the sky?

To some extent now I can. So that's progress definitely because I couldn't do that before.

So you find little spaces when you're of presence, when you're not interacting with people.

[Speaker 12] (8:08:21 - 8:08:27)
Yeah. Like wet tarmac for some reason, just, yeah, that works. I don't know why.

It's just a reflection of the... Oh, well, the most unlikely things can help you. That's fine.

It doesn't really matter what it is. So do you, are you in a relationship, married or? No, no, no.

Do you, have you had relationships? Yeah, but yeah, not enough. Okay.

The but is enough, but I don't want to go too deeply into it because I'm not a psychotherapist and don't need to be. Well, I would recommend that you practice here. There's still some time left.

Everybody knows now who you are. And the people here are much more conscious than people you would normally meet in everyday life. And everybody will be very happy to help you and to help you.

And you can also help, for example, by just refraining from giving too much input when you're interacting, engaging in conversation. Be more a listener than a speaker. Make that your practice for the time being.

Just, I'm not saying don't say a word, but be more like 80% a listener than a speaker. And that, for example, you can do by asking questions when you're in a, rather than stating your view or whatever it is, ask questions that encourages the other person to speak more. If the other person speaks more, it forces you to listen, and then make the listening into a practice while the other person is speaking.

Are you able to, let's say, at any time to feel your inner body? Can you feel that?

Yeah, the hands, but then I seem to lose them quite quickly.

[Speaker 1] (8:11:06 - 8:11:12)
Okay, but hands, you can feel the energy in your hands. The rest of the body is more difficult.

[Speaker 12] (8:11:12 - 8:11:13)
Yeah, yeah.

Okay, well, it's a good start. It's a start. So I suggest that once you've asked a question, while you listen, you direct your awareness into the inner feeling of your hands.

And that keeps it there so that it doesn't, your mind doesn't take off. So you ask the question, what, where are you from? How long have you been with Eckhart?

How did you first discover the books? Have you been to other, many questions you can ask, and people will be happy to help you by answering your questions. And they will be happy to help you by not asking you too many questions.

[Speaker 12] (8:12:01 - 8:12:03)
Yeah, no, thank you. That's good. Yeah, that'll help.

So, and so while you listen, have your attention in the inner energy field of your hands. If you can amplify that and have your attention also in other parts of your body, for example, your feet and hand at the same time, that's even better. But hands is fine too.

So you feel your inner, the aliveness in your hands. And from there, you listen and you know, just give it, this will help you prevent the stream of mind from taking you over. So that's the beginning of a little, a little practice.

Another practice you can do is while you listen, you're aware of your breathing.

And so you can even bring the two together. You can be aware of your breathing and your hands, but it's probably better for you to just choose one or the other.

So please help this gentleman and allow him to ask you some questions and give exhaustive answers. And don't ask him any questions except, well, I'll ask you a couple of questions so you don't need to ask him. Where are you from?

Yorkshire in England.

[Speaker 1] (8:13:37 - 8:13:52)
Okay, Yorkshire, England. And so you don't need to ask him that. So that's good.

And have you been to retreats before with us here?

[Speaker 12] (8:13:53 - 8:13:54)
No, it's the first one.

[Speaker 1] (8:13:54 - 8:30:22)
First one, okay. Well, that's another question you don't need to ask. Okay, I believe you can get there.

So, and of course, in addition to this practice with people, go out into nature and be engaged, if necessary, even involve other senses, not just the visual sense, although for most people, the visual is the predominant sense, but also perhaps touch something, see what it, a leaf or plant, pick up a stone or on the beach, the sand or whatever it is, water, give it, be aware of the tactile sense perceptions. All these things help you get out of your mind. At least put aside just maybe once a day, 15 minutes when you check your Tinder.

It's all very important, but there's something more important. And that's why you're here. And a few more practical tips so that you don't get distracted too much while you take your attention more deeply while you're here.

Take your attention more deeply into being or into attention itself, purely practical. Don't turn on the TV in your room, please. I have not installed hidden cameras to check on you.

So, second, limit your interaction, the interaction with your devices. If you cannot eliminate interaction with your devices completely, and I understand that you may not survive if you do, at least put aside just maybe once a day, 15 minutes when you check your, whatever it is that comes through, whatever, text, email, Facebook, Snapchat, Tinder. It's all very important, but there's something more important.

And that's why you're here. If you, so now let's see, I suggest to you that you make an agreement with yourself that not to go there unless any more than is absolutely necessary. And I mean, if occasionally you get it out and to take a photo is okay, but also don't interact with things around you only through imagining what it would look like as a photo on your phone.

And then say, okay, I'm going to fully experience this beautiful thing when I get home and look at my photos. In the meantime, I'm more interested in taking this photo because that's what the, there's a species that has developed out of Homo sapiens, a branch species called Homo turisticus. And they walk around continuously with either camera or things.

You see them every day. They come in buses. And then in the evening, the Homo turisticus goes home mostly.

And then you are left here. And you might notice it becomes quite still outside at this time. And the days are very, very long here.

You may find that unusual if you come from a more Southern place. There's still daylight around even at 1030. There's still light in the sky.

So, and then it becomes very still here. So you can walk along the lake or just wherever you are and just become aware of that surrounding stillness. And as you become aware of the surrounding stillness, of course, you become still yourself.

And if you are still, it means you're not thinking or very little thinking. And it means you're aware. It means you're present.

It means you are living through the deep eye. So use nature that is around you. Live through the deep eye.

And during the daytime, if you're walking and there's lots of, there's a long weekend here and tomorrow is a holiday in Canada here. So there's more tourists, Homo turisticus than usual. And if you get upset by the fact that there are so many tourists walking around, then you just practice this beautiful spiritual practice of acceptance of the isness of this moment.

And immediately you become still too without needing external silence. Complete acceptance of this moment, including the tourists. And you're still, oh, I don't know how tourists will develop in the future as a species.

In Thailand, in, just near Bangkok, somebody, they interviewed some near Buddhist monastery. They interviewed some farmers and farm workers. They would give food to the monks.

That's a tradition in Buddhism in Thailand, in the South, Theravada tradition of Buddhism. The monks come with their begging bowls every morning. They just stand there.

And then the local people come and put food. They are dependent. It's done on purpose.

There's a wisdom behind it. Or the Westerner would say, why don't they work for a living? The monks stand there with their begging bowls and then the poor people who hardly have enough, who hardly have enough themselves, they come and put some food, a bit of rice, whatever, in the begging bowl.

And the monks just stand. They don't say thank you because it's a privilege for you to give food to the monks. That's part of the tradition.

So the Westerners interviewed the farm workers. They, why do you give your food to the monks when you have so little yourself? And they began talking to each other and say, well, because we want a better incarnation next time.

So we are accumulating merit. So next time we come, we are born into a better condition. And then the Westerner asked, so what do you want to come back as in your next lifetime?

And then they talked amongst each other. And finally the agreement was, we want to come back as tourists. Because they observe these people.

They are out of their, step out of their buses. They're well-dressed and some are obviously so privileged that they are quite big bodies, which means they have plenty of money. They can eat as much as they like.

So that's a great thing. And then they do all kinds of things. They seem to have sex all the time.

And so it's a great thing. So wouldn't it be great in my next lifetime to spend my whole lifetime as being a tourist? They don't realize it would be a dreadful nightmare.

Oh yes, one more practical thing. Intoxicating beverages. There's no prohibition here on anything.

There's just a recommendation. And that is to refrain as much as possible from intoxicating. If English is not your native language, it means alcohol.

So refrain as much as possible from intoxicating beverages. However, if you cannot enjoy a dinner without a glass of wine, then you can have a glass of wine. One glass of wine would not unduly interfere with the arising presence in you, but two might and three will, unless you're really already deeply engaged in presence, deeply rooted in presence, in which case you wouldn't even want to drink too much and you certainly wouldn't get drunk.

So as little as possible, I recommend none at all would be great. But since everybody here is spiritually advanced, if you do have a glass of wine, you will not be judged. I'm not one of these spiritual teachers who are very unconventional ways of teaching.

I know of two or three that did that. And they give their students as much alcohol as they want and said, drink, drink up, in order to observe if they can stay conscious even while they are intoxicated. A very questionable practice, but I won't do that here with you.

I think one or two are feeling sorry now. I don't know. So we've talked about the distractions on the external level, television, devices, intoxicating beverages or other intoxicating substances.

I would advise against it, at least here, and never indulge even when you're not here. As you probably know, I've already mentioned, I tried it a couple of times. I have to because people ask me questions about it.

I cannot answer if I haven't tried it. It wasn't that great. I prefer my normal state of consciousness.

It felt a little bit almost oppressive. But I can see a person who is tortured on a daily basis by their mind. It can be a relief to have a smoke, but here we have something better.

We are not falling below thinking. We are rising above thinking. And that is the next step in human evolution.

When you rise, as you rise above thinking, you don't need to fall below thinking anymore because you become liberated from your mind in the dimension that is transcendent to thought. So, and another practice, of course, here is the daily, the moment-to-moment practice of accepting the is-ness of the present moment. Just that's a powerful way of, and a quick way of going beyond the surface self, the egoic self, which means stop complaining, either internally or externally.

Of course, if there's something that needs to be changed, of course, you go to the reception or you make a phone call if suddenly there's water coming through the ceiling. Hopefully, I'm not manifesting it by talking about it. But if there's water coming through the ceiling and the mattress and you are on it and getting drenched, you don't say, well, accept what is, stay.

But it does mean that when you finally go to the telephone and tell them what happened, it's not done in a complaining manner that says, how dreadful this place is. How can you allow something like this to happen to me? This is dreadful.

That strengthens the ego. No, you just explain what is and what can we do about it. And in the meantime, you surrender to the fact that you're wet.

So that's what is.

So just being present with your sense perceptions. Some people tell me that sometimes I have to demonstrate the arising of the inner space without thinking.

I sometimes go like that. So in between the left hand and the right hand, there's a space of no thinking. So normally in the unconscious thinking state, there's no space, just one thought after another.

And then you become alert enough to create a space between thoughts. And some people have told me that they actually find it helpful occasionally in daily life when nobody's looking to hold your hands like that, because that's an outer representation of an inner state. And it can be helpful to have the outer representation as an anchor, at least as you practice the thoughtless state, to have that as an anchor for thoughtless.

So you're holding that space of no thought, both externally, so to speak, and internally, more importantly, of course. So eventually you don't need it anymore, but some people do find it helpful. I will talk just a little bit more, but with lots of spaces between the words so that you can practice meditative listening, which means you're aware of the words that you're hearing, but you're also aware of the spaces between the words.

And while you're aware of the spaces between the words, you may notice you're not thinking. If you are thinking, you cannot be aware of the spaces between the words.

And this is good practice to be aware simultaneously of form and formlessness of things and of space. And you may notice when you are aware of that space, you're really aware of yourself as the presence, because that presence is in a space. And you may notice when you're aware of space, you're not waiting for the next thing to happen.

You're not waiting for what I'm going to say next, no need, because you know that what I'm going to say next, whatever I'm going to say next, cannot add anything important to the realization of your presence.

And so intentionally, I'm not saying anything very interesting right now, because if it's too interesting, you will get drawn back into the words and into thought and into form.

[Speaker 2] (8:38:32 - 8:38:35)
So it's good that this talk is boring.

[Speaker 1] (8:38:38 - 8:39:23)
That leaves more room for the awareness of space. Music, when it has a spiritual dimension, also has spaces in it or an underlying spaciousness.

[Speaker 5] (8:39:36 - 8:40:02)
Some visual art also has spaciousness in it. And when you look at it, you may find there isn't much there.

[Speaker 1] (8:40:08 - 8:40:46)
For example, certain Asian paintings, a little tree in a corner, a little distant mountain, a tiny human standing somewhere, and 85% of the painting is empty space.

[Speaker 5] (8:40:48 - 8:41:38)
It might be the sky or just empty space. And you look at it, and if you really look at it, you become aware that the essence of the painting is not what's there to be seen, but the essence is what's not there, space.

[Speaker 1] (8:41:39 - 8:46:38)
And so looking at that can be a realization of your own spaciousness. It's so liberating to realize the essence of yourself as stillness, space. You are so much more than the little me, more than your personal history, successes and failures, the successes that turned into failures, the failures that turned into successes.

One little practice I would recommend, take five minutes or so. You can practice here, of course, but at home, everybody has five minutes. Don't believe your mind when it tells you you don't have five minutes.

And the practice is sit somewhere outside or indoors for five minutes and practice perception without interference of thinking, which means you just look around wherever you are. You may look at occasionally your gaze rests upon one thing for a little while, and then you look on. Then you take in the totality of whatever surrounds you.

And as you do, you're aware simultaneously of what you are seeing, but without calling it anything. And you're aware of the stillness that is your essence. That's the background to the visual sense perceptions, like a canvas.

And so this is a blank canvas. And whatever you see is the painting on the canvas. It appears and disappears, appears and disappears.

But the canvas is the spacious stillness.

It's a beautiful way of perceiving the world.

[Speaker 1] (8:46:48 - 8:51:44)
And another practice similar to this, is particularly good when you're outside, but also indoors. Sit for five minutes again and be very alert. Pay attention to whatever you are hearing, alert listening, the slightest sounds.

No sound is better or worse than another. Just every sound is received. Beautiful bird song, a motorbike driving past.

But you are again the canvas for the sound this time. And it's all just register. And you have no preference, any sound is fine.

And you're aware of yourself as the presence, the listening presence. The alertness that makes the hearing possible. And again, as much as possible, no mental labeling.

The subtlest sounds are the best that wake, because they require your greatest alertness to some distant sound. So if you sit in a very still place, in nature perhaps, see how far you can hear. Do you remember the story in a new earth, the Zen master walking with a disciple, and they sit down, have something to eat.

And then the disciple says, can you explain how to enter Zen? Which means, can you explain how to enter the state of consciousness that is Zen? And the master says, can you hear that distant mountain stream?

And the sound must have been really distant. And the disciple at first can't hear, and then he becomes more alert. And of course, as he becomes more alert, he stops thinking because you cannot be really alert and think.

Thinking implies a certain degree of non-alertness. So the disciple listened.

[Speaker 2] (8:51:47 - 8:51:49)
Can you, yeah, I can hear it now.

[Speaker 1] (8:51:54 - 9:08:59)
And the master says, enter Zen from there. In other words, that's a portal into presence. I've been working for 13 years in an office, and I feel that my job is boring and useless.

I learned to surrender, but I'd like to change my job, but don't know where to apply. How can I find out what will give me joy and happiness and a feeling of meaningfulness? Well, start with where you are.

Rather than trying to get away from where you are, you start with always the present moment. And you say you have surrendered, but have you surrendered enough? Have you truly surrendered?

So I suggest when you travel to work every morning, enter the state of presence rather than drifting off into thinking so that you're present every moment, whether you're driving or taking public transportation or walk to work, be there, absolute presence. And when you're at work, do one thing at a time and bring in spacious moments as much as possible. They can only be a few seconds, as one spacious breath after you made a phone call, two spacious breaths.

And then when you go to have lunch, wherever it is, either you eat the lunch that you brought with you or you go to the restaurant or the canteen, or again, present with every moment. So you use what otherwise would be a boring situation and just use it as the background for presence. So you're not ultimately, you're not looking for some satisfaction in the work, but you bring a different state of consciousness to it.

So in a way, your work situation becomes like a canvas. It's just an excuse for practicing presence. And you're lucky that you have a relatively boring job, gives you a great opportunity for practice.

If you had a very stressful job that kept you in a state of excitement all day long, it would be more difficult. So be thankful that life has given you something relatively boring. And then you make it interesting, not in the conventional sense of interesting, but you bring that, the alertness to it.

So you're not working at the stock exchange, shouting like a mad person, sell, sell, buy, be on the computers. Now, if there's any stockbroker wanting to ask me a question, please do. That'll be a different answer.

I don't know what I'd say. There's a way there too. What it is, I don't know until you ask the question.

But yes, use the situation. And so that as you do that, discontent disappears. And so, and that is true surrender.

You say you practice surrender, the questioner says, but if there's discontent, of course there's still not complete surrender. You're still, I'd rather be somewhere else. Or the mind telling you in 13 years, how many more years to retirement?

Oh, and then you start counting the years to retirement. So you're losing yourself in past and future. And you're carrying the burden in your mind of past and future, missing the opportunity of the present moment because it's not interesting enough, says the mind.

So that's good practice. And you may find if you come into such an alignment with the present moment, you feel more alive, even within the routine activities, there is then an added dimension of aliveness that comes in. And you perform even the routine activities with a greater sense of aliveness.

And it is often then that change comes into your life when you align with the present moment, instead of trying to get away from it, internally align yourself with it so that any kind of no to the present moment dissolves in an inner no. And so you're so aligned that actually power begins to flow through. That's why I call that the power of now.

It's the power of life itself begins to flow through you. At first it flows into your routine activities and the way in which you relate to your colleagues at work becomes more present, different, somewhat different. Some people may notice it, others may not.

And so, and gradually the universe or life notices that you are in a different state of consciousness. And often it is then that change comes into your life. Either through a chance event or a chance encounter or a sudden idea or realization that comes into your head one morning.

In whatever form it comes or some drastic thing like suddenly your company goes bust. The company that you worked for for so long, suddenly they close down. Everybody loses their job.

Wow, you're free. But you were free already because internally you already became free. So in what way change comes into your life, we don't know.

It is much more likely to come in but you no longer depend on external change for your inner state. That's the main thing that you don't depend on it anymore. You already, and even if nothing else came into your life you would continue practice until your last breath.

And your last breath would be a conscious breath. And you would have fulfilled your purpose on this planet in this form, which is to be a vehicle for consciousness to come into this world. So you don't need to depend.

You don't depend on anything. Change is more likely to come, yes. But this, the presence practice is not a means to an end.

You're not practicing. You say, okay, I'll practice. But if nothing happens within six weeks, I'll stop practicing.

Or the lady, do you know the lady who, a church going lady who saw, she lived in a house and outside her window there was a hill that blocked the view of the ocean. So there's a little hill. And of course, if that hill hadn't been there her house would have been worth much more.

So because of that hill, her house wasn't worth that much. But in church she heard if you only have face of as big as a mustard seed, you can sell to this mountain, move from here to there and it will move for you. She heard that in church, Jesus said.

And then she said, oh, okay. I only have a hill there so I can let's see. And said, okay, I'm going to believe that this hill is going to move.

And then tomorrow morning I'll open the curtains and see what happens. So she, in the morning she got up and opened the curtains and the hill was still there. And she said, oh, I knew it wasn't going to work.

That's the faith. So to all of you who are bored at work, there may be quite a few, make it into a spiritual practice, a consciousness practice. Bored at work also means you're not particularly challenged at work.

And in the absence of life challenges, there's always a danger that you fall below thought and you come into a routine where you, what you think it's acceptance, but you're really falling below thought and you go to work and there's a decrease in your sense of alertness and aliveness and you become dull and you go. And sometimes you see people who've been working in the same place for a long time. They have not, it's not surrender or presence.

They've just gone below thought, not risen above. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Many questions have come from people asking about feeling drained after working with people for a long time. For example, I work in a healing capacity and often find helping professionals come to us asking for help when they find their energy to be drained by those they support. Health professionals, social workers, even hairdressers who spend much of their time listening to the problems of others can feel exhausted at the end of each day.

Any advice from you would be welcome. This is Sally asking and several, quite a few other people. The energy loss mostly happens if you engage too much with the mindstream of those people.

Now, this is for people who listen to people, talk like counselors and so on. If you engage with the mindstream that comes through the words and follow it, that tends to take energy out of you. So the art is to remain, while you listen, to remain aware of your own presence so that you don't allow the mind to link in with your mind and then pull you along.

And this is why you may remember I mentioned when I used to work with individuals, I would sometimes, a smile would come to my lips when I was listening to them, their problems. And the smile comes because the presence is so peaceful and beautiful. And it knows that that person also, their essence is also that presence.

So you allow the, you listen to the words, but they, instead of being drawn into that mindstream, you allow it to go through you. So to continue to have your awareness in your inner space while you are engaged in listening. So it's the, so that I would almost say at least more than 50%, if one could even quantify it, more than 50% of your attention, 70% of your attention needs to be in the energy field of presence, your stillness, and then you listen from there.

Then it's not draining to listen. But if you listen with, then it draws you, it draws your attention and you link into the other person's mental stream. Your mental stream unites with the other person's stream and then you get dragged along.

So that almost looks as if you were a little detached and I don't know if detachment is the right word, perhaps it is, but detachment is a, limits it because you're not only detached, you're on a deeper level, you are more at one with that person than you could ever be on the mental level. So on the mental level, there is some detachment, but on a deeper level, there is a sense of some, there's the unifying field of awareness that is there between you of presence. So there's no separation.

Yes, attachment on one level, detachment on one level, but on another level, there's the realization of oneness beyond the conceptualized identity. It's again, it's a practice. It's an art.

This is not a conventional meditation. You can do that by yourself easily by using a meditation method and focusing the mind and coming still. I haven't planned this session at all.

So I have no idea how it's going to unfold. It's much more interesting and alive. I'd like to mention for those of you who are new to this, to be aware as you sit here and listen and watch, to be aware that I don't talk continuously.

There are short gaps in between words or sentences. And as part of our meditation, please just notice that there are gaps when I don't speak. Notice means pay attention.

Just note, oh, one could even say the gaps are more important than the words. You need a certain alertness to notice the gaps. I could say what you notice is the silence in between words or sentences.

And to the mind, the thinking mind, that is something silly and absurd because the thinking mind is mental noise. So it doesn't know what to do with silence. It's not high on your list of thinking minds, your list of priorities.

And the thinking mind says, I've got other things to worry about than silence. But that's the problem. It worries a lot.

The thinking mind is not ever silent. But to find that dimension is very important. I would even say the most important thing.

Now, what happens inside you when you notice the silence between words, the gap? You become silent. When you notice that there's a silence, a silent space, like now, in that moment of noticing, whether it's two seconds or five seconds, in that moment of noticing, you're not thinking, but you are conscious.

And that's meditation, to be conscious without thinking. In addition to noticing the silent gap, gaps, you could also become aware that you are breathing. The breath flows in and out, flows in and out.

So it may help you to be aware, not only of the silent space, spaces, where it's only ever one space because there's only the present moment, to be aware of the one space, the gap between words. It may be helpful while you're aware of that space to be aware that you're breathing also, you're breathing. You feel it, sense the air flowing in and out.

So there's a knowing in the background that's not thinking, a conscious presence, but you're not thinking. It's vitally important to be able to access that dimension, not just when you sit and say, okay, now for the next 10 minutes, 15 minutes, half an hour, one hour, I'm going to do my meditation. That's fine, can be very helpful, but it's more important to access that dimension in everyday life.

That's stillness in a word for it. And in that stillness, you are there, but not the historical you, the person that thinks about his or her problems and fears and desires in the past and the future. It's all connected in a stream of thinking.

Me and my life, think about that. Think about who I am as defined by thinking, the judgments about myself, things I'm proud of, things I'm ashamed of, things I regret, things I'm anxious about might happen. All that usually gives you your sense of who you are.

But when that comes to a stop, there's a cessation in that stream of thinking that usually provides you with your sense of identity. Then, now, you become aware that there is another dimension of consciousness in you that's, one could say, deeper than thinking. One could say, higher than thinking.

Awareness, presence, stillness, spaciousness. And you can sense that there is something there that has no form. When you think about your life, your problems, your anxieties, so on, so on, it's all form.

Every thought is a thought form. And yet there's another dimension in you that most people don't know about that is formless. One could say you become aware of your own, your being, your beingness, your presence.

When there's a moment of no thought, is there nothing there anymore? Well, there is undoubtedly a conscious presence left, the light of consciousness. And that is you, more essentially than the story of your life.

That is the universe of which you are an intrinsic part, the universe becoming aware of itself. It's conscious. You are conscious.

And suddenly you know that you are conscious. You sense that consciousness, that presence. That underlies everything.

Your entire order of thinking couldn't happen if you were not conscious. You couldn't have any emotions if you were not conscious. You couldn't have any sense perceptions if you were not conscious.

It underlies everything. It's the foundation for everything. It's the one thing that is totally beyond any doubt.

And maybe your entire life is a kind of dream, could be. So you can doubt the absolute reality of your so-called life. What you cannot doubt, because the evidence for it is here and now and immediate, what you cannot doubt is that you are conscious.

The essence of who you are is that presence, that consciousness. I want to leave aside today for our meditation the question that may have arisen in your mind, whether the brain, the physical brain, produces consciousness, or whether the brain receives consciousness, like a radio receives the signals and translates them. I would suggest the second is the case, but we don't need to explore that here now.

Our session here is practical and direct. We don't need to go at the moment into abstract speculation of philosophy, although it's interesting. The fact remains that that presence that's there is the essence of who you are.

Most people are not aware of their own presence. They are only aware of what arises in that presence, in that consciousness. Sense perceptions, the look, the hear, the touch, thoughts, and emotions.

Those are the things that arise in that light of consciousness. So, most people's attention is completely absorbed by those things. So, they're totally drawn into, identified with, those three things that constitute your so-called life.

Sense perceptions, thoughts, and usually sense perceptions are perceived through the filter of your thoughts, which are conditioned by the past. So, you don't really see that clearly. Sense perceptions, thoughts, feelings, emotions.

So, that is your life, it's a kind of hypnotic state. It's like going to a movie, see it in the cinema, and you watch it, what's happening. You're on the screen, and you're completely drawn into it, and you forget yourself completely.

Identify with the characters, or with one of the characters. And that's how most people live. They live in that, oh dear.

Sometimes, almost accidentally, moments arise when thinking subsides, and they go, and they perceive, but they're not burdened by sense perceptions. Sometimes spontaneously, that spaciousness, or stillness, or presence can arise, and suddenly life feels good. It's good to be alive.

There's a joy, an intensified sense of aliveness.

The French writer, Albert Camus, wrote this one sentence, that's the best sentence he ever wrote, because it's based on a spiritual realization. And he wrote, in the depths of winter, I finally learned that there was in me an invincible summer. And obviously, winter and summer are used metaphorically.

I finally, in the depths of winter, I finally learned, finally means, he spent quite a long time in the depths of winter. I finally learned that there was in me, or maybe he said there is in me, because that is the timeless. If he didn't say is, he should have said is would have been even better.

In the depths of winter, I finally learned that there is in me an invincible summer. And of course, summer refers to the inner state of transcendence, of spaciousness, where a sense of aliveness, a peace, not an asleep peace, but a vibrantly alive peace, emanates, and goodwill, lovingness, a sense of connectedness, all emanates from that transpersonal, to use that word, transcendent, perhaps, but it's transpersonal too, because it transcends the person. This was the entire, our days here, that's the essence of what this is all about, as you know, the realization of the transcendent dimension within yourself.

And so, you live, your life is then a balance between dealing with things on the personal level, being a person, using the person, it's a, it's your form, identity, it's fine, you have to honor that also. It has its shortcomings, and you become compassionate with that. I, my form identity has lots of shortcomings, not answering emails is only one of them.

But they are, those shortcomings, once you connect with the deeper dimension within yourself, they are not seriously dysfunctional anymore, in the sense that they would create suffering for yourself or others. But there are certain idiosyncrasies and things that could be better, and perhaps you can improve on the level of form, there are many things you can do, but if you add something here, you might lose something there, so it's never, you're never full, that, that completion on the level of form is just not possible, and not necessary. And there's always something else you can do, to explore, to acquire, to learn, and yet the essence of you is already absolutely complete, and you don't need time to be yourself, you already are yourself, fully, on the level, on the formless.

I call that essence identity, your form identity, your essence identity, the invincible summer, in this sentence by Camus, okay? That metaphor refers to the, your essence identity. The winter is the suffering that the form identity undergoes, but if he hadn't spent a lot of time in the depths of winter, as he calls it, he probably wouldn't even have found the invincible summer in him.

And just as many of you, if you hadn't spent time in suffering, and had not had deep challenges, you wouldn't even be here. I know I wouldn't. You, one thing you need to be careful about, the moment you start to speak, you remember last night, we looked at ways of interacting to bypass the mind, which quickly can bring up the ego.

The ego is mind-based, a mind-based sense of identity, and we saw these video clips where people just looked at another human, so you bypass all that, so it's easier, if you're not even engaging in any dialogue, so you're not even attempting to connect on the conceptual level, which can quickly, completely pull you into that dimension of thought, and back into ego. The moment you completely identify with the thought, it becomes part of your ego. Thought in itself is not ego, it's just thought.

Complete identification with a thought that arises would be part of your ego. Emotion is not ego, but complete identification with an emotion that arises will become part of your ego. So the ego is complete identification with form, which in this, and the primordial form is thought form.

Of course, the ego also identifies with a physical form, but more importantly, underlying that is identification with thought forms. So the danger is, yes, to be present when you are not being challenged by other humans, and interacting with other humans on the verbal level, it's easier. The challenge comes the moment you start to engage in a conversation with someone, and then the challenge is to have some of your awareness in the underlying awareness, stillness, to be aware of that underlying spaciousness, so there's not complete loss of stillness, even while you speak.

That's a skill you can, it requires vigilance to see that you are not dragged along with a mind stream as soon as you start to open your mouth and words come out. So you can, you're very present, and then somebody says something, and then you're, well, well, and you're gone. And then it gets worse, because the other person has a slightly different opinion, and then it amplifies your mind stream, and then what it's all, you're just totally in your form identity, and something is terribly important now, something has become so important, much more important than anything else, like your essence identity just, it's disappeared completely within three minutes, two minutes, it's gone. Because there's a, there was, for example, there was a difference of, slight difference of opinion that became so important, you needed to show that your viewpoint is absolutely the right one, and then all your energy flows into that assertion of yourself, ego, you don't know it, it's the ego, you want to, the opinion doesn't really matter, I mean, who cares if you are right or he is right, it's just a game of thought, and it makes no, in most cases, it makes no difference to any situation, but it is the desire of the egoic identity to assert itself, and to emerge victorious. It's unconscious, it's an unconscious movement, but you can see that even in relatively insignificant exchanges between two people, even if the viewpoint slightly differs, there's a force behind the way in which you express your mental position, your viewpoint, it's not just presenting your perspective, your viewpoint, or your mental position, if you are vigilant, it's of course much easier to observe in another, you can start by doing that, the force behind what people say is completely superfluous, unnecessary, but there is, so there is another dimension, this is not just what people are saying, they are, they may be doubting what you've said, and they express, it's not just that, because that in itself would be a neutral thing, it's a neutral, you put forward your perspective and said, I believe your viewpoint is not quite right, here's mine, but in itself, it's neutral, there's nothing, there's no egoic involvement, it's just that there's an awareness behind it, in the way in saying that the android data last night in the video clip, in the same way that he presented his viewpoint, there was no force behind it, because he's egoless, he's not human, he's egoless, so in that sense, there was no, there's no force behind what he said, he just presented clearly the situation as he saw it, and with humans, that is not, not easy, so it requires great vigilance, I'm always surprised when I observe humans interacting, my initials are ET, so I call them human, I'm always surprised when I observe humans interact, how quickly this, this force flows into what they say, so there's not just whatever their opinion is, whether they question yours, or whatever it may be, it's not just that in itself, it's completely harmless, but there is a force behind it, that as an, is aggressive in a way, even if it's not obviously aggressive, there is that element in what they say, why? Because it is a, you have identified with the arising thoughts, which means lack of awareness, awareness has been lost, or a better way of putting it perhaps, awareness has been obscured, or covered up, and all there is to you now, is that movement of thought, and therefore, you've identified with it, your consciousness has completely been hijacked by thought forms, and then you identified, and then you're really not defending, or any more your position, or you are fighting to triumph as an, as an form identity against the other, who has a slightly different opinion. So that is the, the presence, that has no form, that is a, something opens up within you, that is very deep, and far transcends your form identity, it connects you with something vast, it's not even something, it connects you with a great depth, and therefore, I often use the analogy of the ripple on the surface of the ocean, and every human being is that ripple, in this analogy, as long as the ripple is not aware of its true nature, it only knows itself as a little ripple, and it looks to other ripples for fulfillment, or wants to protect itself from other ripples, or to compete with them, or compares itself to other ripples, it's a very problematic existence, because it only knows the surface of reality, it's an entire, experiencing entire reality as a surface phenomenon, and continuously trying to find some kind of ultimate fulfillment, happiness on the surface level, through other ripples, or other situations that are also ripples, and it's frustrating to live as a ripple, because you're just a little, this little thing, and, and some ripples manage to get bigger, they might, they might gobble up a few others, and then they grow into a wave, in this analogy, it means, you have your private jet waiting nearby, it's a clear sign that you have grown into a wave, you're no longer just a little ripple, but you're just as short-lived as the ripple, and now you have to compete with other big waves, so it becomes problematic again, and a moment may come when the ripple, or the wave, suddenly, perhaps becomes frustrated with that surface existence, and says, hmm, is that all there is, that I can't take anymore, because things continuously, obstacles continuously arise, and there's always things that are unfulfilling, and even the most promising things that you enter into.[Speaker 1] (0:01 - 2:03:52)

Relationships, situations, places, all kinds, even the most promising things, there's always, sooner or later, some flaw appears in it. What's wrong with the world? Why is there always this not, this ultimate, the fulfillment is always kind of short-lived, because you're still on the surface, only.

And then the moment comes, hmm, and perhaps accidentally, or because another ripple close to you, who has gone beyond its mere ripple existence, says something, or you can sense something, and then perhaps for a moment, there's a cessation in the stream of thinking, without loss of consciousness, and the ripple goes, the ripple goes, oh, there's more to me than I thought. It doesn't know what it is, it doesn't have a name for it, but it can sense the depths, suddenly. And as it senses the depths, that is, suddenly the vertical dimension has come in, it's no longer just the horizontal dimension, there's the vertical dimension of consciousness, where there's only the present moment.

Past and future exists in the vertical dimension of reality, and there's a transcendent reality, there's the vertical dimension, and the ripple suddenly discovers that it is a manifestation, a temporary manifestation of something vast, and it is not separate from it, it is a manifestation of it. So it's no longer just a little ripple, it senses its origin. In Buddhism, and sometimes in Zen, you have strange expressions, your true face, before you were born, all kinds of expressions to point to it.

It discovers that it is the ocean, or it probably doesn't have a name for ocean, it discovers its connectedness to something transcendent, that transcends its ripple existence, and then gradually, that's the first discovery, and then it occasionally loses it again, but gradually it is able to have some attention in that depth, even when it is occupied with its surface ripple existence, and operates there, it does that, and yet there is a depth, there's a rootedness in being, and that transforms the way in which the ripple, we'll let go of the ripple in a moment, as you know, the ripple is you, the ripple existence then becomes no longer as problematic as it was before, a little bit more sane, the dysfunction that has created an enormous amount of unnecessary suffering, the reactivity that amplified every challenge that the ripple encountered in life, that amplified it and made it a huge thing, and then through reactivity, that challenge actually grew even worse, because you amplified it, well, the ripple, sorry, it's not, the ripple amplified it, it's easier, we can bypass the remnants of ego in you by talking about ripples, and then the ego doesn't feel offended, that's the power of parables and stories, so the ego doesn't realize that it's about me, so it listens to a story, and whereas before, the ego would have created a barrier, without knowing, it's a little bit like a sugar-coated pill, so you give to a child, and it tastes good, and then you swallow it, and then it begins to work, it's called, I believe it's called the red pill, before I forget, I would like to acknowledge all those people who are with us, not physically, but in other parts of the world, and apparently, if I look straight ahead, there's a, into the camera, then I can connect with them visually, it's nice to have you with us, wherever you are, whatever time it is where you are, of course it's the present moment, there may be more people there than here, but it doesn't really matter, I have a feeling that we may have questions and answers in this session, it's no more than a feeling, so we'll see, remember, being here in this environment especially, the sensory perception, not just visual and auditory, have you noticed that there's a fragrant scent in the air, a very wonderful freshness and scent, be aware of that, there's a breeze coming from the sea, you can feel it on your skin, so you have all the senses simultaneously, that should bring you into the present moment, can't do a lot of thinking when you're aware simultaneously of visual, auditory, tactile, and I suppose olfactory senses, very helpful, and have you noticed that there are quite a few ancient olive trees around here, which these must have been here, of course, before this was built, there must have been a olive groves or olive tree plantations here, and you can see that some of them are of an enormous age, what perhaps you may not know, I know it because I googled it, it is, olive trees can reach an age of two to three thousand years, so it's not impossible that you look at a tree here, it may be 2,500 years old and was a young tree when Socrates walked past it or sat or looked at it, or said what a lovely young tree that is, or some other ancient Greek philosopher might have already been sitting, leaning against this young olive tree and giving philosophical discourse, they have almost a presence, they have a presence almost like an old, even almost a personality in addition to an invisible presence, one last bit of information, there's a tree apparently on the Isle of Crete, not that far from here, that is supposed to be the oldest or one of the very few olives that is probably 3,000 years old, olive tree, that was 500 years before the Buddha, but that tree continuously lives in the timeless dimension of now, deeply rooted not only in the earth but also deeply rooted in being, if I start speaking now, there may be no end to it, so I won't say too much in order to allow time for questions in case any questions have still survived in you after being present here, some questions you may notice dissolve at some point because they're not important, because the mind had a curiosity, I wonder Eckhart, how many incarnations have you had, what did you have for breakfast, questions like that tend to dissolve in the presence, and other questions, an answer may suddenly arise from within you because you became still, there's a story of, I believe it was a British writer, Paul Brunton, I think it was, who in the 30s visited the guru spiritual teacher Ramana Maharshi at his ashram in India in order to, he was preparing a book on the spiritual teachers of India, the book was later published under the title In Search of Secret India, and he visited Ramana Maharshi, the guru at that time was not too well known outside his immediate circle, and he had a list of questions, very important questions for his book, so he came into Ramana's room and Ramana looked at him in a state of thoughtless awareness, and Paul Brunton looked at him, and he didn't ask a single question, all the questions dissolved in the presence on that particular occasion, that was the first time he met him, he may later have asked him questions, another little anecdote connected with Ramana Maharshi, the famous British writer visited the ashram, Somerset Maugham is his name, and again he was preparing a book, a novel that involved an Indian spiritual teacher, and just before he was to meet Ramana Maharshi, Somerset Maugham fainted, probably because it was so hot, so they carried him into a room and he was lying there on a bed, and when he came to, Ramana Maharshi was sitting there next to his bed looking at him, and he was confused, he didn't know what to say, and Ramana Maharshi said something like, silence is the best speech, and that was the end of that encounter, and later on in a novel called The Razor's Edge, Ramana Maharshi appears as one of the characters. This meditation period is always an opportunity to connect with who you are at a level deeper than the person, the surface self, and not only connect with, but realize that that deeper self is the essential self, and the person, which is the surface self, is the non-essential, temporary, conditioned, time-bound self. They are not entirely separate, the conditioned self, the person, of course, could not be without the deeper self, which you can sense at this very moment by becoming aware of the presence, or the life presence, whatever you want to call it, within you.

One way of doing it, as we sit here together, is to be aware of the spaces in between my words, and realize that when you're aware of a space, whether it's short or a little longer, at that moment, you are not thinking, you're simply present, like now. And you can then sense your more essential being underneath the surface self, which is the physical body and the mind, and emotions. No thought, no thinking, is the essential self, you can only become aware of it when thinking subsides, without you going to sleep.

Thinking subsides, and an alertness remains, an alert presence. One could almost say a kind of nothingness, and yet it is evident that it is only nothing in the sense that it is not a thing, it has no form, but there is clearly a presence there, which you can sense with your entire energy field. So you become aware of yourself as a space of consciousness, the sense of an underlying sense of aliveness, of beingness, which has nothing to do with your past or future, or who you are as a person.

And then you also may become aware that there is a presence that pervades the so-called external world, that the entire universe is pervaded by a sense of alive presence, although in you, so to speak, it becomes focalized, and in you, it can become aware of itself. Another way of putting it, of course, is to say that you become aware of yourself. And gradually then your daily life becomes interspersed with moments of presence.

That's how your life begins to change, which means the conditioned mind, with its habitual thinking, thought patterns, reactions, reactive patterns, mental positions, likes, dislikes, is no longer all there is to who you are. So you become deeper. The more your life becomes interspersed with the presence, you deepen.

It's not really the person that deepens, but the opening up of the dimension of depth in you, so the person remains the person. So it's a welcoming the challenges, we talked about it before, welcoming the challenges of everyday life. Without that, first, you wouldn't get the reflection of where you are at as far as your state of consciousness is concerned.

How upset do situations, how much power do situations and other people have over you and over your state of consciousness? How often do you get upset, irritated, reactive, and so on? That's a good reflection of how present you are.

Not, although this meditation is a wonderful device, a wonderful tool, but how deep you can go when you meditate is only a small part of the transformation of consciousness. You can't really tell the state of consciousness unless you go into normal life and then get reflections of yourself there. Human beings, it's not the case that humans either have an ego or are totally free of ego.

The ego manifests in human beings to varying degrees. Most humans have a lot of ego that determines their thought processes and their emotions, but a little bit of awareness also in between. They may still be capable of empathy, sometimes with a limited number of people, perhaps only as empathy with your family members or empathy with the people who belong to your particular group, your collective.

And there are, when you look at, you can see the, understand the ego more deeply. If you look at the extreme manifestations of ego that a certain percentage of humanity suffer from, where it's actually labeled as a mental disorder, then you see that many mental disorders are actually just a more extreme form of what is the normal egoic state. And when you see the normal egoic state in a more extreme manifestation, then you can recognize it also when it appears as a normal state.

An example of that is paranoia. Paranoia is the belief that there are people who are plotting against you, enemies who have spent most of their life following you or plotting against you. So it's a delusional system that is the result of the egoic state of fear on the one hand, because there's always fear in the background when you live through a false sense of self.

And so the mind tries to explain the fear and then it creates a story. And then you believe in the story. Secondly, another reason why the mind creates paranoia is to give itself a heightened sense of significance.

I am so important is the implication that the CIA has 55 people whose full-time job is to control, try to control me. Now I'm not saying that CIA don't, they don't, I'm not saying they don't do things, they do sometimes as you know, but I don't think they have 55 people or even one in my case that try to, who knows, I may be wrong. If you work for the CIA, please raise your hand.

But you can see if that is a story that your mind believes in, how important you suddenly feel. So sometimes paranoia arises because the egos need to enhance its sense of existence, its sense of significance, its sense of importance. And if life doesn't tell you that you are important, then you have to create a story that you are important.

And paranoia is one way of creating a story that gives yourself importance. There are slightly less extreme forms of that are people who believe, for example, believe they are great geniuses, but they are so, so superior to everything that they never even try to create or do anything because that's beneath them. So you can have, occasionally I've met people who tell me, oh, I'm a spiritual teacher too.

They tell me, oh, I see, that's great. Have you written anything? No, no, no, I don't write this.

The true teachings are all beyond words. I don't bother with that. Oh, that's fine.

But that gives you a sense of you are actually superior to most people, all these insignificant people who are so, in their sense, in their insignificance, they have to write books. Many stories that one creates to give oneself a sense of importance, stories that have, in the more extreme cases, little relationship with external reality. And then there is the talking about narcissus.

There's another extreme form of ego that when you look at it, you can see that it has all the elements of the normal ego, but greatly emphasized, and that's called narcissistic personality disorder. And people who suffer from that are totally obsessed with themselves, with their appearance, and the way they are perceived by others. They live for that.

They are totally incapable of empathy. In fact, they're hardly aware that other humans exist. They only see other humans through how they can help, how they can amplify their own ego.

So what they want from other humans is attention or other forms of so-called narcissistic supply. They are always looking to enhance their self image through being told that they are awesome, they're wonderful, they believe they know everything. The moment you question their opinion about something, they will become very angry and aggressive.

You see quite a few of them on Facebook. But there's still a human being underneath that dysfunction. It's just an extreme form of ego.

Nobody knows how many people suffer from narcissistic personality disorder, but the estimate is three to 5% of the population. Now, that means three to 5% of the population suffer from this very extreme form of ego. And perhaps you've all met somebody who can think of somebody to, oh, I wonder if that was my dad, or that was my ex-husband, my ex-wife.

Hopefully not your present husband or wife. So continuous vigilance so that you are there in the background as the awareness. When you become aware of your ego operating, it's not really ego anymore.

The real ego exists in complete unconsciousness, in complete identification. When you notice something in you that's egoic, with the need to be right, the need to be superior to somebody, whatever it may be, by noticing it, that means you are there as the observer, the awareness. So, strictly speaking, it's not even ego anymore.

Once you notice your ego, what you are noticing is a deep-seated pattern in you. And it's only really ego if you are completely identified with it and there's no awareness whatsoever. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Partners evolve sometimes at different speed, the evolution of consciousness, and some may not evolve for a while at all. So it's possible that suddenly the awakened consciousness comes into you and your partner remains where he or she is, and you go into enormous presence and aliveness and newness, and you still see he or she is still no change.

And then wait a little and see. It's quite possible that your state transmits itself. It says even the slightest degree of readiness in the other, the fact that you do not strengthen his or her mind anymore by opposing his or her mind, the vital thing, don't oppose the mind.

Can express your viewpoint without opposition. Something may happen, an opening may happen. Often it is, or it is possible that you may have to separate and it may be that this, the other partner will leave you because it is no longer satisfying to live with you without the drama.

The pain body, of course, many of you know about the pain body and hopefully not only know about the pain body, but have direct knowledge, immediate knowledge of your own pain body. The pain body, of course, is the favorite place for the pain body, which is the old accumulated pain, which is an energetic, almost an entity that lives in you, that lives on emotional suffering. It loves its vibrational frequency.

It thrives on relations, close relationships. That's where it gets its food, most of its food. There isn't much you can do with, if your pain body needs food, it can't do much when you go to the supermarket and only see the cashier for half a minute or one minute.

Even there, it could happen. I've been standing here for 10 minutes and you've been talking to this customer instead of serving me. But favorite place for pain bodies to renew themselves are families and intimate relationships.

That's their place. And so you will know your partner has a pain body, which occasionally takes them over and makes them say and do things that one could say they're completely out of character. Well, yes, it's unconscious.

It comes as a surprise when you've started living with a person and you've experienced their pain body after perhaps two or three weeks for the first time. And that used to be the big surprise when people got married. Nowadays, often people live together for a while before they get married.

So they already know that the other has a pain body. It's good. And you haven't committed yourself yet.

You can still get out. But what a dreadful thing when you have to, when you marry somebody, start living with that person, and two or three weeks after the honeymoon, a totally different person is suddenly there. A person who is in a deeply negative energy field, says hurtful things, misinterprets what you do.

You say, who did I marry? And you think this must be the real person. Maybe I married, this was all a disguise.

The real person is coming out now. That's of course not the case. It's not the real person.

It's the pain body. And where's yours? Oh, your partner's pain body wants yours, wants your emotional reaction.

Pain body is an emotional aspect of ego. It's part of the egoic consciousness. Pain body needs to be recognized in yourself and the other as it arises.

It's not usually there all the time. That would be dreadful, but it comes periodically. And then you go back to normal for a while, and then it comes back.

And so you need to recognize it, be there as the space for it, be the presence in the other and in yourself. Perhaps the most destructive thing in relationships is the pain body that people carry around with them, that takes them over and makes them, even sometimes people who are already awakening, they still periodically get taken over by their pain body and completely lose consciousness and then completely identified with that energy field. It uses their mind.

It rises up when the pain body needs to renew itself, feed on somebody else's reaction. It moves into your mind, and every thought you think is the thought of the pain body. It completely, the emotional energy field takes possession of your mind, which is probably, if you're not conscious, is probably problematic enough as it is even without the pain body.

But then the pain body rises into your mind, and then if you observe it in your partner, because if it happens to you, you can't observe it anymore, the presence is lost, but you can observe it in another more easily. Every word they say to you is the pain body speaking through them, as if an entity, and in a way it is like that, has taken possession of them and is now using their mind and speaking through their mind. You need to know that so that you do not react as if that were who they are.

So that is where a degree of compassion comes in when you recognize that they are being possessed at that moment by this entity called pain body. That helps to know it. But this entity is very cunning and knows exactly how to get an emotional reaction from you.

It will accuse you, blame you, mention, it knows your weakest points, and it will go in there and press all the right buttons until you finally go, and your own pain body has awakened, and you're in the grip of it, and you start shouting, and whatever form the pain body takes. Or you may be present enough so that you don't get taken over by your own pain body. But even being in the grip of the pain body, if you're awakening, if the new consciousness is arising, there is a good chance that at the back there is still an observing presence, and you are able to say to your partner, I think my pain body has just come up.

I can feel it. There it is. And if your partner's pain body has not come up yet, then he or she can help you to stay present with it.

You can address it, see it happened just at this moment when you said that, or that happened, that, and now I can feel it. Okay, let's stay with it. You may also point out to your partner that the pain body has come up when you observe it, and if you're lucky, there's still enough awareness there to recognize it.

But the pain body is very cunning. It may even be that your own pain body is coming up, and you're accusing your partner that their pain body is there. Whoa, very cunning.

And, of course, the interesting thing is if somebody says to you, there's your pain body, if there's a reaction, then he or she was right. What do you mean my pain body? If there is an open looking, you say, that's my pain body?

Okay, let me just feel into this. Then probably wasn't my pain body. Well, that's strange.

Didn't feel like a pain body, but maybe. We feel a certain aliveness pervading the body. It's very simple, but some attention has to go there.

Otherwise, you can't feel anything, which means you have to take some attention away from thinking. If you're fully in thought, you can't feel your body at all. You don't feel alive anymore.

Just abstractions. So the beautiful thing is, it's not only that your body loves being acknowledged and getting your attention. It's a very healing thing to do.

And most importantly, it slows down your thinking considerably, if it doesn't stop it completely. Because if you have your attention here, you can't have it there. And this is the embodied state.

It's quite nice. What you're feeling is not ultimately the physical body. It's already halfway beyond the physical body.

Qi, life energy. And I call that halfway between form and formlessness. It's a bridge.

Qi is a bridge between the formless dimension and the form. So it's wonderful to sense that. You can do it anywhere when there's enough room.

You don't need to focus on externals 100%. Have some attention in the body. Boredom disappears, for example, when you have attention in the body.

You're not bored. You actually enjoy feeling alive. And that can serve as an anchor for staying present.

And that can be one way of looking around at the world without unnecessary mental labeling. There's clarity of perception. And looking at the situations that arise in that clarity of perception.

And from that clarity of perception, you know what you need to do or what needs doing in that situation. It's a higher intelligence that you contact via the body, a higher intelligence than the quiet knowledge of the human mind. And then you know what to do.

So you have an insight or spontaneous doing. Or if there's nothing to do, being is enough. You can enjoy just being.

Sleepless nights are a wonderful opportunity for going into the body. I can't sleep. Why don't you do something useful?

Go into the body. And then you lie there and feel the aliveness. And before you know it, you've gone to sleep, perhaps.

And then you wake up in the morning. Perhaps you still feel a lingering sensation there in the body. And if you don't, as you wake up, put your attention into the body first before you start thinking about the day.

Or just a couple of minutes, three minutes, two minutes. It's a good start of the day to feel alive. It can't be a bad start of the day.

I'll tell you what a bad start of the day is, is listening to the news. It's a grounding, but not a heavy grounding. It's rooted in being.

Oh. Welcome to our Christmas meditation. Lots of people are joining us today from all over the world.

Let's start with a moment of silence. And so we can be aware of our breathing, breathing consciously in and out. I was reading the other day about something that happened at Christmas in the year 1914, in the middle of the first world war, when the soldiers, I believe it was in France or Belgium, the soldiers were in their trenches, French, German, British soldiers.

And then on Christmas Eve, the fighting spontaneously stopped. And the soldiers could hear from the opposing trenches singing of a Christmas song that everybody recognized. And that song was Silent Night, Holy Night.

And gradually they came out of their trenches. And in the area between the trenches, so-called no man's land, they shook hands, started talking to each other, exchanged gifts of food and other little items. And they sang together that song, Silent Night, Holy Night, each in their respective languages.

They talked to each other, showed each other photos of their families. And that became known as the Christmas truce of 1914. Somebody even wrote a book about it.

And then the superiors, the officers, the command in the command centers were informed that this was happening. And they said, oh, we must put a stop to this. Fighting must resume as soon as possible.

And of course, a few hours later or the next morning, the craziness, the insanity continued. And in a way, that event that happened spontaneously the instantaneous arising of ultimately is what is only sanity between human beings. That seems almost miraculous.

And the insanity seems almost normal. So if you believe that our present political discourse, not only in the United States, but also in other countries in Europe, if you believe that's crazy, then of course, just think back to the first half of the 20th century and the insanity of all that. So that moment and that song, which triggered it, that Christmas songs, Holy Night, Silent Night, brought about a shift in consciousness.

It didn't last. And that's an interesting song to me. That song embodies something that transcends anything cultural or anything belonging to any particular religion.

It transcends all that. Because the song Silent Night really embodies the essence of spirituality, which is inner stillness. It was composed in the early 19th century by an, was the lyrics were written by an Austrian priest in a village in the mountains in Austria.

He had written these lyrics a year before and then Christmas Eve arrived. And he had to present a piece of music in the evening service in the church. So he had the lyrics and then he went to the schoolmaster of that village.

I believe he was. And he, in the last few hours before this, the church service composed the music to it. And then that evening, they both performed it together in the church.

And then it's gradually over the years, it spread all over the world because human beings recognized something in that, that went beyond any particular culture or even religion. All of the words point to something specifically Christian, the birth of Jesus, the spirit that this song embodies goes beyond that it transcends or that it goes very deep. And so it was actually declared by UNESCO as something, I don't know what the official designation was, world, an intangible world heritage.

So in many ways, Christmas, of course, has degenerated into consumerism and so on. Although there's nothing wrong with buying gifts and giving gifts. That's a beautiful thing.

But it has degenerated into that. So it's important to rediscover the essence of it. In the English language, Christmas in English speaking countries, many people don't use the word Christmas anymore.

They call it holidays. The intention behind it, I suppose, is to not to exclude people who are not Christian. And I can see the reasoning behind that.

But there is something there that is of great value. And somehow, to me, the word holiday does not, although originally that word is also beautiful because it refers to a holy day, but it's been used in so many other contexts that it no longer really has that, does not carry that sense anymore of holy. But Christmas still has the Christ in it.

And that's a very interesting word. Christ. In English, it's pronounced when it's only in its by itself, it's been of course pronounced Christ, Christ.

It's usually associated with Jesus, of course. But we need to remember that Jesus, Christ was not his name, Jesus or Joshua was his name. Christ is a title that was given to him later.

In the same way that Buddha was not a name, it was a title given to somebody. And Buddha means the awakened one. And Christ means literally the anointed one.

It refers to anointing with sacred oil, which a holy person, you could do that to a holy person, you would pour sacred oil over them. It's the anointing. That is a literal meaning.

But I believe there is a deeper meaning behind that word. And I also believe it's no coincidence that Christ or Christ and Krishna, the deity, one could say in Hinduism, the most important figure in the Hindu tradition, those names are so uncannily similar. Christ comes from the Latin Christus, which comes from the Greek Christos.

And then we have Krishna, Christos Krishna. Now, is that just a coincidence? Or are they etymologically related?

I believe they are. And if it's just a coincidence, it's a very interesting coincidence with a deeper meaning. Because what that Christ refers to, in its esoteric sense, is a particular state of consciousness.

In mystical Christianity, that's called Christ consciousness. And in some traditions, even the term Krishna consciousness is used. And a similar term in Buddhism is called Buddha nature.

It refers, all these refer to a particular state of consciousness that is possible for humans to realize. Not to achieve, to attain, to acquire, but to realize. Why am I making that distinction?

Because that state of consciousness is not something that is not already here. That consciousness, which we could call the awakened consciousness, Christ consciousness, Buddha nature, is a potential that's already there, dormant in many humans, but already there. So you don't need to acquire it or go somewhere else or find it in the future.

It's a realization that within you, there is a deeper state of consciousness than the one that you experience mostly in everyday life. And that's the realization of, in mystical Christianity, it's called the realization of the Christ within. In Buddhism, it's the realization of your own Buddha nature, which is your deepest sense of identity, of being.

So you are, on the one hand, a person or a personality, and the kind of personality that you are is determined by your past, all the things that have contributed to the arising of that particular personality or person. And beyond this person, which consists of mainly of mental and emotional conditioning, beyond that, you are something deeper. And Jesus pointed to that in his teachings when he said to his disciples, disciples, you are the light of the world.

And somewhere else, Jesus also said, I am the light of the world. I believe the I am the light of the world is in the Gospel of John. You are the light of the world is in one of the other Gospels.

In other words, the essence of who I am, is also the essence of who you are. The difference between us, this is the implication. The difference between us is only that I know, I realize the essence of who I am, and you have not yet realized it.

That's the only difference. And therefore, Jesus also said, all the things that I do and greater things you will also do. So ultimately, we are one, the essence of who we are, Jesus said, is the same.

You just have to recognize or realize that essence within you. But how do you do that? Now, I could use examples from Buddhism or examples from Christianity that point to the possibility of realizing that dimension within you.

Let's look just at one saying of Jesus again, because this is Christmas, our Christmas meditation. Jesus talks about the kingdom of heaven. That's perhaps the very foundation of his teaching.

Seek and find the kingdom of heaven, which is within you. That's the foundation. Some people believe that love your neighbor as yourself is the foundation.

But I would suggest to you that that is not the foundation, because that cannot be a starting point. It is pointless to tell anybody who has not realized the essence within themselves to love their neighbor as themselves. They won't be able to do it.

Not for long, because if they have not recognized their own essence, they cannot recognize the essence in the other and realize that who I am in the essence of my being is one with who you are in the essence of your being. And when I realize that, then I love the other as myself. But I cannot tell somebody, you must love the other as yourself.

They live totally trapped in the mental emotional conditioning of their personality or their ego. They may want, genuinely want to be a better human being and try to love the other, but they will always fail again and again. And so the foundation is finding the kingdom of heaven that is within you.

And then as a consequence of that, you will love the other as yourself. In other words, it'll change your relationship with other human beings. There will be a goodwill, a benevolence coming into your interactions with other human beings.

Your interactions with other human beings will no longer be dysfunctional. The dysfunction that we see on every level, not only when we listen to the news, but in our personal lives, in every level, personal to collective, within nations and between nations. So what is this, the kingdom of heaven that is within you?

What does that mean? Well, of course they read it in the churches, have been reading it for a long time. And mostly it's been misinterpreted, although Jesus clearly said it is within you.

Christians traditionally have believed that it is somewhere else. It's going to come when you, when you die, you will enter the kingdom of heaven or it's come at the end of times. Or the kingdom of heaven and so on.

Disregarding what he said about, don't look for it here or there. You can't say, oh, there it is, or here it's over there. That's what he said.

It is here now. So that we can relax into being, let's go of the idea that we are doing meditation here. So let's get rid of the idea of doing anything right now.

Become comfortable with being. No next moment to look forward to or to fear. No past moment that you need to think about right now.

So the now is enough for being. Awareness of being implies transcendence of thinking, compulsive thinking. And if there are spaces in yourself right now where you're not thinking, just, then it's working for you and you're not doing anything.

What's left of you when you don't remember your past and are not thinking about the future? Because the future is always something that you think about, never an actuality. So what's left of you when you don't remember the past, don't refer to a memory of the past, don't think about the future, just this.

Now what is left is the essence of who you are. But you can't call that anything really. The being, perhaps, the presence, the space, the consciousness.

You can use all kinds of pointers. They're all just pointers. The light, the light of consciousness.

Becoming comfortable with that space in which there's no conceptual knowledge, just a presence, formless presence. You can't name it. The moment you name it, you give it form.

It is who you are beyond form. And it is deeply fulfilling. There's a joy in being who you are beyond the form as which you appear.

It's the joy of being, very subtle at first. At first you may not notice it as joy, it's just a space, a spacious presence. It is being.

In India called sat, it is consciousness. In India called cit, and it is joyful. The consciousness of being is joyful, ananda.

It's the Indian description of that state of realization of who you are underneath the form is sat, cit, ananda, being, consciousness, bliss, one single realization, not three realizations, one realization. And then in the truest sense of the word, you are enjoying yourself. Not in the superficial sense when people say, go and enjoy yourself, have a good time.

This is different. You're not having a good time, you're having no time. You're in joy in yourself, regardless of your life circumstances right now.

It's not your life situation, it has nothing to do with it. It's life itself. Something that may prevent you from dwelling in this beautiful realization and being consciously rooted in being is the compulsion to think, even when it's not needed at all.

When life would be more clear, more free, more enjoyable, more life without the interference of useless thinking. Thinking. Now in this world, in our culture, very few people as yet know about the possibility of not having to think all the time.

When they speak of not thinking or no mind, the word is used mindless, it means you're falling below thinking, becoming unconscious. And here we are going beyond thinking or rising above thinking. A few thousand people in different parts of the planet at this moment, transcending compulsive thinking.

In a few thousand human beings at this moment, a new consciousness is arising. Transcendence of thinking, presence, which is awareness of being, awareness of awareness, self-realization. And it's happening at this moment.

Nothing to do really with the person, the different persons that are here on the planet or this person or that person. The person has made room for this to arise. The person has become transparent.

The person being complete identification with thinking, an illusory identity, a form identity, short-lived form identity, me, the person. My personal past and my personal future makes me have to think about that. And here the person subsides, loses its density because spaces are rising in between thoughts.

In that space the person is transcended and something else flows through this form. The form becomes an opening for that. A little analogy, let's say you are an actor on a cinema screen involved in the usual personal dilemma, various dilemmas that are part of being a person who is unaware of the transcendent dimension.

If you're only a person unaware of the transcendent dimension then your entire life is a dilemma. The dilemma takes on different forms but it's always problematic, conflict-ridden. So let's say you're an actor on a film screen acting out preconditioned roles according to the script in your mind, which is the conditioning of your mind.

Of course the only reality an actor or any figure or anything that happens on a cinema screen is the light that is shining through the film in the camera. And what is perceived as persons running around the screen getting anxious about this and that are really various ways in which the light is being obscured that's behind the film in the camera. So let's stick for a moment to this analogy.

The various forms that you see on the screen are ways in which the light is being obscured. It's being obscured in different ways and so they are doing whatever they do. The only reality is the light.

That is what gives it life, animates it. Now we're coming to the end of the analogy but you're not quite there yet. Now the end of the analogy is say one or several of the figures on the screen are becoming aware of that light that makes up the essence of who they are in the midst perhaps of acting out the drama or the short-lived happinesses followed by unhappiness in the midst of all that they're becoming aware that in essence they are that light and the awareness is not a thought it's a realization.

And the very realization comes because there's a moment of not thought when they've stripped the learned script the conditioning of their mind a moment has made it parted and spacious awareness is there which is the light and suddenly they're no longer totally identified with the role they're playing. They're in touch with something that transcends the limitations of their role and their person and they feel that light that they are the light of consciousness in the background of their being as a spacious stillness or awareness and then they go about doing what they do perhaps for a while nothing much changes the conditioned script still being acted out but then they notice little changes happening even the script isn't is changing because space is there in between the lines and then the next line suddenly there's something new in it suddenly they say something that they themselves didn't know before something new fresh alive it doesn't conform to the script the conditioning of their mind and then perhaps where before they would have reacted to another character in the usual pre-conditioned way suddenly instead of the reaction there's a there's a space a non-reaction and something totally different happens so as the as they're becoming aware of their essential nature even the way in which they deal with the world of form in the way in which they are here as persons changes it's the end of our cinema analogy so this is very much what's happening here awareness of the transcendent dimension without that it's a little bit pointless to go on with just the limited conditioned actor or actress just again same thing being acted out the same reactions the same opinions and viewpoints and identification with mental positions and me and now of course the secret is to sustain that spacious awareness as much as possible in everyday life which means even when you do things here we are not doing anything we're just going into being now what happens when you start doing again doing includes thinking that's the primordial doing when you start doing again is there still an awareness of the background awareness so to speak of spaciousness presence you're doing here but not completely lost in it there's a while you're doing there's an awareness of being what is that awareness of being you're aware of yourself the fullness is consciousness aware of awareness you may be going through an awakening spiritually and when the ego comes in through the back door you begin to feel very superior to ordinary people who are not awakening on a collective level then as humans awaken there will no longer be completely pointless conflict between nations but it must begin with the absence of pointless conflict on an individual level the way in which you experience life is a kind of mirroring back to you your predominant state of consciousness so if you're engaged in continuous conflict and unpleasantness year after year with people if you're engaged maybe in countless court cases with all these nasty people who want something from you who are all if you find that when you talk about people you may find that the strange thing is that those people that you talk about they are always wrong and you are always right isn't that strange that's an if that is still the case with you you might have to it's very unlikely because you're here but you might just be when you talk to others to third people about others this this is what he said this is what she said and then he did this and then i said and then and he never did he should have but he didn't and if you find the strange phenomenon that you are always right and others are always wrong that's an important realization how is it possible i must be super human and in the eyes of the ego of course that's kind of the case because the ego which is that which is perhaps the major obstacle towards the realization of that deeper dimension in the the ego strives incessantly for some kind of superiority and so this is what you are condemned to when you have not yet awakened even to at least to some extent to the deeper essence of who you are the awareness the presence the stillness then you are in the prison of your own personality and it's not a pleasant place to be i sometimes watch people and they are so burdened with their personality so in the grip of that thing what is personality it's the sum total of their mental emotional conditioning from the past mental emotional conditioning mental conditioning means certain thought forms mind structures that become repetitive certain narratives concerning your life my life says the ego a certain narrative concerning my other people in my life what i did what they did to me my victories my defeats many things form the the egoic conditioned self and one important aspect of the egoic conditioned self is it it talks about my life all the time in the head and out aloud and my life is what concerns me obviously it's my life and what is my life it's a story in my head but they don't know that they think it's the reality but it's a story in my head it's a narrative it's the predominant narrative in my mind and it's a narrative through which i interpret everything that coming that i come into contact with it becomes a screen through which i interpret other people situations places events i don't know that because i am so identified with that mental emotional conditioning that it has become me it has become me and my life it's i don't know anything else that's the fate still of the majority of humans on the planet although they the minority that is awakening is growing it is still a minority most humans are still totally in the grip of their egoic self and probably most of you are moving still in and out of your egoic self this is usually how the awakening process happens sometimes you're drawn back completely into it and it it talks and and there's the search for superiority and you compare yourself to others and you need to be right right in any argument being right is more important than the truth and you're always right that's a good sign that there's ego so the egoic entity i'll just say a few more words about it because it can be very deceptive it can use you come back in sometimes through the back door but that i mean you may be going through an awakening spiritually and when the ego comes in through the back door you begin to feel very superior to ordinary people who are not awakening and now what does that mean it means and this is always ego there is a conceptual sense of self and you derive your identity you derive your sense of who you are from a conceptual mind-made self um if for example let's take myself in the the world tells me now you are a great spiritual teacher now 25 30 years ago so he didn't tell me that the world basically was saying who are you nobody nothing has changed if i walked around with an image of myself this is requires a lot of awareness because what i'm describing now has happened to some spiritual teachers the spirituality is only one example if i had a mental image of myself as a great spiritual teacher i would be lost again lost in ego and so anything that you do let's cut stick with spiritual detail some of you i know some of you are already spiritual teachers in whatever capacity perhaps you're your therapist perhaps you are working with people in some capacity and many others of you are destined to become spiritual teachers it's either directly or indirectly either formally or non-formally of course you're destined because the world desperately needs awakening and awakened humans and so a danger no matter where you are but right now we're just talking about becoming a spiritual teacher or being a spiritual teacher in whatever way anything that becomes a conceptual sense of self means the ego is coming back in through coming in through the back door and so is it not true then that at this moment i am a spiritual teacher yes but only in the sense that it's a function and while this function is happening right here now one i could say i'm a spiritual teacher but when i walk off this stage and out the door if i then carried a mental image of myself as a great spiritual teacher i would be walking like that and of course everybody else would be inferior in my mind and i without knowing it i would be walking around with a huge ego and sooner or later the ego would contaminate or obstruct my ability to teach it could contaminate the teaching with egoic falsehood or it could completely block the intuitive teaching that happens when you which means the ego when you get out of the way when you get out of the way something that transcends the limited you i call that sometimes the surface eye that gets out of the way and then the deep eye emerges as the unconditioned consciousness and it can use your mind and that's the way to ultimately use your intelligence in a way that no longer puts the intelligence in the service of madness so spirits being a spiritual teacher is a function when i when i go away from here i need to immediately relinquish the mental image a narrative in my mind that tells me who i am that is a conceptual sense of self but of course this not only applies to spiritual teachers it applies to anybody in any situation where do you derive your sense of self from what is it that gives you your sense of self i know of course it on a on a purely surface level spiritual teacher works it so can solve problems when you can tell a person who says what do you do you could say this and that usually i don't say spiritual teachers if i go to a foreign country and sometimes at the border or at the airport a custom thing what do you do why are you here and usually i say i'm a writer i'm an author okay that solves the problem i don't go into i don't advise you to do it either saying i have no conceptual identity they probably won't let you in we don't want people who have no conceptual identity all morning i've been looking for something that i lost i wonder if you know what it is i don't know if i found it or not i've been suggesting various ways of becoming present stepping out of the mind for the first part of our questions i'd like to invite you to address specifically what we've been talking about and that is your practice your ability to step out of thought into awareness into presence or your inability or whatever what obstacles you encounter or whatever your experience is of practicing of being present rather than involved in thinking so this faculty one could say there is a dormant faculty in everyone that is just waiting to come to life in you it has already awakened this faculty and that is the faculty of being aware being present it's like it's been waiting inside humans for thousands of years like an egg incubating inside the collective human consciousness and that's the potential for the next leap forward i'm talking almost like mouths i don't but this is the that was a pseudo leap forward it didn't quite work the great leap this is a now humans are ready not all humans but we are beginning to be ready for for this faculty to come out of its dormant state and actually begin to grow and blossom so for the first part of our questions and answers uh i'd like you to specifically address questions that are to do with stepping out of thought how you what is your experience with that good or bad maybe if it's not a question i'd also like to invite anybody who wants to just simply briefly not don't need no need to go on for 10-15 minutes but briefly just share your your experience of are you one question that i'd like to i'm wondering how how it is for you whether you're already able to by choice step out of thought and simply take your attention out of to the word we could use is reclaim the reclaim your attention your consciousness from where it has been for a long long time in always in thought reclaim it and so that you suddenly have the consciousness in its undiluted unconditioned no form that the formless unconditioned undiluted consciousness so the impractical terms it's the ability to simply relinquish when you're when you wish to to really relinquish thought and that is the ultimate renunciation all the other renunciations are really substitute for that now i'm going to renounce coffee well that's fine but there's some more important more fundamental this is lemon and honey and hot water by the way can't get it at starbucks the renunciation of thought is also the renunciation of ego because without thought ego immediately dissolves so it is a big renunciation it is not just the renunciation of thought because it wasn't just thought there was an entire mind-made entity involved in thought the self so it is not just a renunciation of thought it is a renunciation of the entire false self that for not throughout your entire lifetime but many lifetimes has claimed to be you

and so no matter what you renounce if you're a spiritual person they may practice different kinds of renunciation and very often you just exchange one thought-based entity for a slightly different one so if you indulge in alcohol and sex and orgies for a few years and suddenly you get tired of it and you say i'm now going to be a spiritual person i'm done with all that and then you you live a very pure life no more substances uh celibacy no more wild parties and you get up at 4 30 every morning for three hour meditation and you begin to feel very good about yourself and but it's very very cunning this little this egoic entity because without knowing it you may have exchanged one egoic entity for a more subtle one and the more subtle one is um your sense of self has now become a spiritual one me the one who has become pure me the one who has renounced as opposed to all these others who are still drinking coffee and then you can walk starbucks and feel very superior let alone bars and nightclubs so again you have an a mind-based entity the me the self because you haven't renounced it's kept going by identification with ideas in your head about who you are and you can get together with other spiritual people and then you can strengthen that idea you can mutually strengthen the idea of who you are and then you get a group egoic group identity um it was very comforting you feel really oh now i know where i belong and it's i'm not saying don't go to any spiritual group there's just a danger in that that you then partake in the collective egoic entity which is usually becomes revealed because it starts to reject others oppose others to define its own collective identity more clearly so you find many spiritual groups actually believe they are the only ones who really have got it they are the only ones who are really in possession of the truth and all the others are not in some more extreme forms of that you are the only ones who are actually going to be saved the rest of humanity is going you are we've all seen these these are collective egos that develop when you join a group it may not be that every group falls into that trap but most of them do and why again because they derive their sense of identity and now it has shifted from a personal sense of identity to a collective sense of identity at first when you look at the individual that makes up the collective it looks as if the individual had become free of ego because he's totally free of the personal sense of ego he has totally identified with the collective ego and of course as i might have said before if there's one thing that's more insane than the personal ego it's the collective one political parties it's not just spiritual groups religions little groups within churches within religions they are that disregarding others of the same religion as evil they're the same religion and you might even want to kill them that's what happens on a daily basis if you're listening to the news within the same religion it's a different this group they call themselves this because they have some different beliefs of what once happened hundreds of years ago others don't quite agree with those beliefs of these things that happened a few hundred years ago they believe in somebody else all insane it's more my stuff it's all just thoughts so they haven't renounced anything they could have the most pure lifestyle they haven't renounced the most basic renunciation which is identification with thinking so and the collective ego it's just unbelievably can be unbelievably insane it can also cause the individuals that make up the collective to do things that as individuals they would not be capable of doing in the service of the collective they can go out and kill people it's happened even i mean nations do it look at 20th century history of the 20th century one nation is a it becomes a huge ego just so you can see how vital it is to renounce but foundation the the true renunciation is thought that's that is the true shift without that you can play around for many lifetimes am i spacious to even ask the question can immediately bring about that opening of the moment of cessation of thinking because to check within your attention goes am i spacious well it's almost inevitable that after asking the question you are spacious because after the question mark there is an inquiry non-conceptual there is a looking there is a field of attention that arises and you go am i spacious yes now probably before you ask the question you were not so you remembered to ask the question because something was going on you were upset about this or that or stressed or anxious or many of the so-called normal states and so then suddenly you are spacious it's so easy a little space opens up and then you remember no matter how important the things of the world or your world pretend to be nothing is more important than being spacious another version of this question refers to relationships whether it's an intimate relationship or whether it is just a short or superficial relating is there space in this relationship is there space in the relationship between yourself and your partner or family member or whoever it may be a friend so again all related without the space it gets taken over by stuff without the space your life gets taken over by stuff

so another good practice is when after you just do something anything whether it's even getting into your car once you get in instead of getting in and turning on that engine right away and putting it in drive and go just get in and just take a break just a moment just one moment and become still so the practice is keep coming back in keep coming back inward to draw your attention inward okay

we're talking about identity which is the most fundamental thing just where where do you get your sense of self from this is the most fundamental thing in your life because if you derive your sense of self from a fiction in your mind which ultimately is what the ego is your whole life will reflect back to you that this is a fiction and it will color all your experiences it will create a neediness it will create all kinds of emotions that are completely unnecessary that are manufactured by your mind and the identity in the mind that we call the ego the almost like a little entity that doesn't want to go away it wants to i want to suffer a bit more i need my enemies i need to complain what can i complain about now well why does he talk so much he's been going on talking for so long i can't stand it anymore so the words are pointing to something in you if you then of course you cannot undo your personal history of course you remember your personal history and you there's your life situation everybody has a life situation you have relationships you have a work situation probably or you or you have lost your job then you don't have a work situation but that's similar you have a living situation you have a health situation you have a relationship situation a huge source of suffering and occasional happiness those things make up your your life you have those situations but is that all there is to who you are so you need to to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation the essence your essential being is the aliveness of presence consciousness and you can only get that in the gap between two thoughts this is why stillness is an important point pointer to it stillness does not mean you fall asleep it could mean you fall asleep because humans the habitual level where humans exist is thinking then the only time when you are free of thinking is when you fall asleep if you haven't awakened yet when you move towards sleep thinking gradually slows down when you get very sleepy there's very little thought going on in your head and you go and you might even like that because suddenly you can't remember what your problems are anymore and you feel the pull of sleep which is so delicious what we call tiredness it's it's so normal we accept it but if you really look at what tiredness is something absolutely delicious is pulling you to come this way you must come this way it's so delicious and at some point even if you're trying not to go there the attraction attraction of that place becomes so overwhelming that you have to go there and in the last moment when you still have some consciousness you feel ah even if you were out in the cold and know if i fall asleep i'm going to die in the last moment you would still feel the deliciousness of going ah it would the rest wouldn't matter anymore you're moving towards the source you're moving to to regenerate you're moving but you don't know it anymore you're moving below thought towards sleep another way of moving below thought is having a few drinks and that can free you for some people it frees you it frees them of their unhappiness and they become jolly suddenly suddenly they can enjoy life because they're not thinking much anymore they're just it's a way of being present too in some way and then you think i need another one because if i feel jolly now i'll be even more jolly with the next one but that's not the case because the more you drink the more you move towards unconsciousness so you're falling again you're falling below thought until finally you fall off the chair so we are not going there below thought yes that can free you also but as we awaken spiritually as consciousness awakens in us universal consciousness awakens in us we become conscious of being conscious and the moment you are conscious of being conscious you have risen above thought and you are still you have transcended thought which means you're able to think but you're no longer trapped by it or in it you're no longer at the mercy of your thoughts you can use them they can still operate but you can also by choice and this possibility is coming to many of you already and to many more of you i would say after this evening to realize it is possible for you and even desirable in many many instances to transcend thought and simply be aware that is by the way the state of that is the entire teaching of zen is contained in this it then teaches you that you can rise above thought become free of thought and just be aware this is why the zen master often looks so fierce because he's in that fierce awareness and he goes in the old drawings of zen masters or they might one zen master when asked please explain zen he would the only thing he would ever do was raise his finger and look at you that was his teaching and became famous famous teacher some people got it others didn't if they didn't get it they said please explain zen to me and he would go and some people went wow and others didn't get it they said did you hear my question there's in zen for those of you who are interested in zen or might even have spent a decade in a zen monastery there is nothing to understand in zen you cannot understand zen because there is nothing to understand zen is about transcending thinking not falling below thinking but rising above thinking this is why that is then oh oh now many of you especially after this evening will discover in yourself the ability to step beyond thought when you don't want thought not perhaps always sometimes the challenge is maybe too much and you fall back into thought for a while it's fine but from time to time and you can actually invite it into your life in many many situations that are relatively neutral step out of thought and lose the illusion that in order to hold your life together you need to think all the time about you and your life and if you stop thinking about you and your life it's all going to fall apart it's not going to it's going to fall apart if you overthink which most people do overthinking is a disease overthinking means you are completely identified with thinking you are in fact addicted to thinking a lot of which is not only completely unnecessary but actually harmful to your health to your well-being and to other people it's harmful to you also because you're making yourself unhappy through it and if you are making yourself unhappy the chances are that you're making other people unhappy too so overthinking identification with thinking that is all part of the unconsciousness the old or the old consciousness as i call it now there a certain percentage of humans has reached a point of readiness where they are able to transcend thinking become aware of themselves as awareness as presence as consciousness and that becomes their sense of identity or sense of self their presence it doesn't need there's no longer any superiority or inferiority in it there is in it a recognition when you now look not just the dog it's easier with a dog or the baby but when you look at another human being and you can you're not trapped in the conceptualizing judgmental mind you are looking at another human being and you can sense the the background to your perception of this other human being the sense perception you may be looking and may be listening the background to your sense perception is the space of awareness you're looking as a conscious presence and not as a person at this human being because for a moment your mind is still while you're looking and listening or just looking at another you into the eyes of another human being you either somebody close to you or somebody you only meet casually in a shop or whatever but for a moment you're looking and there is a recognition at that moment when you know yourself as consciousness the wonderful thing is you recognize that essence in every other human being or any other living thing and that recognition you recognize that there is something of the same essence that is in you also in the other and you are able to so to speak look through the personality which is there which manifests through their words whatever they are saying the conditioned personality which is their mind their egoic mind that of course will be there but you're able if you are still and present you can look at them and and then for a moment you sense their essential beingness or consciousness because you know your own consciousness and that's the one the recognition of oneness and it is only there out of that state of consciousness that that which frees you from eternal conflict with other humans which is ego condemns you to it is only that that can free you from the eternal conflict and out of that emanates that which makes you truly human or more than human almost empathy a loving kindness towards another arises this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation i don't know if anybody still experiences that he awake you wake up at two or three in the morning and you're thinking and it's not pleasant it's about my problems and if you then suddenly you discover the futility of it and then you also have a choice at that moment you have a choice and then you can say i choose to place my attention on the inner energy field of the body and from one moment from one minute to the next you're suddenly you enjoy being awake at night and feel the intense aliveness in every cell of the body that's one simple way it's a kind of meditation practice it's one simple way of taking attention away from thinking when it you realize it is not only futile it's also destructive so that's a and that needs to be then practiced in a day if you have a meditation period that's wonderful of course daily meditation period but in addition i always recommend mini mini meditations throughout the day which could be a simple thing as taking two or three conscious breaths while you're waiting for the elevator or do something consciously with full attention that usually you do unconsciously something anything that is usually a means to an end make it into an end in itself washing your hands be totally present you're getting out of your mind walking down a few steps be totally present rather than needing to get to the bottom be there in every step so little mini meditations gradually help you to disidentify from the movement of thought so that's i would this is what i would recommend to our questioner and to anybody else who is still burdened by their minds or tortured

by their minds so for those of you who like formulas here's one stop okay it's an acronym s stands for stop t stands for take three deep breaths as Eckhart just told us to and while you're taking those three deep breaths smile everywhere in your body from head to toe o stands for observe observe your body as you said and p stands for proceed with love and kindness we break the break the response okay so it's it's nine o'clock and our live stream is ending so i want to bring wayne we don't want to lose this opportunity at least um so you know i've known wayne now for 25 years we've grown up together he just looks a little older but we are brothers

what else is absolutely essential that you don't learn at school well it is also connected with awareness and that is awareness of your thoughts if you do not learn that you can be aware of your thoughts then you are trapped in your thoughts and by your thoughts and that is the fate still of many millions of humans on the planet they are so identified with their thoughts that that's all they know of the world and of who they are so there is a dimension of consciousness in every human that is beyond the thinking mind and why don't they teach that at school it's so basic and simple so you can think a lot of the time you think many humans think almost without interruption they have a voice in their head that never stops talking in other words thinking and yet there's the possibility of realizing another dimension of consciousness that's one could say it's behind all your thoughts or it's a canvas for your thoughts or can say it's the space in which your thoughts arise and into which your thoughts subside whatever you call it it's the dimension of awareness or presence and we live in a civilization that has been one could almost say being completely taken over by thought by mental concepts and there's been a loss of a tragic loss of that deeper dimension that is in every human being in that sense it you do not need to achieve it you only need to discover it there's a big difference between achieving and discovering to achieve something you need time obviously but to discover some discovery is of something that is already here so you discover that dimension of consciousness in you that is awareness in between two thoughts for example at this moment when i stopped speaking and then i speak again so there was a gap and that gap was you were just aware and it's happening again in that gap if you are alert you are not thinking in these these gaps you notice you're conscious but you're not there's no conceptualization and again now and this is so natural and so but so vitally important to have to be in touch with the dimension to be rooted in that dimension uh it's amazing that it it is not common knowledge that that this is the most vital thing that there is in any human life the great teachers pointed to it it's the the emptiness of the buddha the kingdom of heaven of jesus that is within you here now different words and it can happen naturally it's perhaps more likely to happen when you look at something natural again a tree the sky in the first moment of looking at the sky in the first moment of looking at a landscape or at a tree or at a flower you may find in the first moment of looking you're not conceptualizing it there's two or three seconds when there's just sense perception and an awareness of the sense perception look at the sky two three seconds then usually the mind comes in and says something about it it conceptualizes it that's fine but kept if you can catch so to speak always the first moment when something arises in your in your sensory field sensory perception catch the first moment and then you will notice for brief two three seconds there's no conceptualization you're just there's a perception but what is behind the perception awareness the light of consciousness without which there would be no perception so you know whenever you look at something new or you begin or there's a sound that suddenly arises and you may not know what it is so you have to listen carefully a sound is arising the mind may want to interpret it but in order to first you need to be alert and listen and there's a sound and for the first two or three seconds the mind is not saying anything about it because there's only the perception of it then comes the interpretation uh now if you are completely trapped in the conceptualizing mind these these moments are so short when you're just perceiving you're hardly aware of it and whatever you're almost immediately labeling it or you're not even aware of it or just peripherally aware of it because all your attention is absorbed by the voice in the head by the by mind activity so the there's a consciousness you are this consciousness the consciousness gives rise to thought in the same way that the ocean gives rise to a wave and that's fine it's been it's an incredible thing that conceptualization happened in human beings it was a an evolutionary step forward but there's great danger associated with it and the danger is that you lose yourself in it there's a power that came with focused thinking is a great power being able to memorize and anticipate and all these things are amazing we could make amazing things then science developed just as an extension of the of the human mind the focused application of human mind and that created new incredible things but then the something dangerous happened we we got increasingly we got taken over by that which ultimately is only an instrument and we got taken over by it completely so that many humans are basically in present in present in their minds which is the conditioned mind which is all the content of your consciousness conditioned of course by the past and most humans are still completely in present in that so you derive your identity from the movement of thought so you don't know who you are beyond the move whatever thought is telling you about yourself whatever the story of you is telling you about yourself that's where you derive your sense of self from and that's normal in this world but it's extremely limiting and then it happens that quite often certain thoughts invade your mind can easily happen so you your mind becomes colonized by certain thoughts that take over sometimes almost the totality of your mind and obsessive thoughts it can happen to individuals where your one obsessive thought suddenly takes over and then you perceive the whole world through the veil of one obsessive thought which has all the answers but it can also happen to collectives it can happen to a collective civilization that collectively certain thoughts arise in the collective and they invade every individual's mind and take over the way in which you perceive they perceive the world that can that happens for example with totalitarian regimes when wonderfully described in the writer who took it to an extreme or well described in 1984 where you get completely taken over you have a thought police you're only allowed to think certain things it's a collectively the collective mind becomes completely possessed by certain thoughts now thoughts are it's perhaps helpful to look at thought as they are little beings they are energy forms everything like you are and everything is an energy form and thoughts that arise are energy forms so imagine them as little little entities you can't see them they have a relationship with your physical brain but you can't see thought they're little entities that arise and there they come and one entity can act like a virus acts on a physical level which can invade the body and take over the body and live there as a parasite can even kill the body even you can also have a mental virus that enters your mind and then begins to proliferate and create thoughts that are in alignment with those with one central thought which may be a total delusion but you have one central thought attracts other related thoughts and you have suddenly a gross this you have a viral infection on a mental level now this can happen to individuals in one case and when it reaches a certain point this infection of a mental virus can be recognized as clearly disease a disease a insult insanity when it's but until it reaches this point in an individual we may not even recognize it as a mental illness a met complete mental dysfunction then it reaches a certain point and you can suddenly when you listen to this person saying let's for example in the case of paranoia then everything is interpreted as enemies are everywhere they're following me they're listening to me they're listening devices and they're going into my mind and the entire world is conspiring to to destroy me and follow all these it starts with one thought and then so your mind gets totally infected by thought this can happen to an individual it can also happen to a collective when the minds of millions of people or whatever number it may be become taken over by certain thoughts viewpoints or opinions and sometimes they can be very much divorced from anything that's real any reality but once you've taken being taken over you don't even know it you cannot nobody can question it because you have you are not really there anymore only the conditioned mind is there pretending to be you and so you cannot question it nobody it's if you believe if somebody came to me with a delusion and said they are what's what's a common delusion i am i am napoleon so their mind has been taken over by a delusion i wouldn't it is not wise to tell this person this is a delusion you're not napoleon or it's better to just to be present and to listen to that person not to say yes or no just listen that's how you experience the world and it may be possible to connect with that person so that a little bit of awareness comes in then that there's a possibility of healing and a little bit of awareness comes in but if you deny a delusion then there's there's immediately a disconnection so i don't talk about things that i perceive in this contemporary world as collective delusions there's no point the most important thing is to bring about the discovery of the dimension of awareness in humans and then that is how they become immune to the viral infection on a mental level so the only way you can become immune to being infected by all kinds of strange thoughts that come at you in these days through the devices that you have the media mainstream media social media and all these kinds of things or we are being flooded with thought forms continuously if you're not careful i highly suggest you reduce the amount of time you spend there and look at a plant instead or at the sky so the immune the the immunity the only immunity you have is awareness so that you're not taken over by thoughts and the otherwise the the ability to think even although you're still thinking but the ability to think rationally and it diminishes the more you get taken over by by dysfunctional mind patterns you can no longer deal with situations rationally and so you're on a downward slope so the important thing then is the realization that apart from thinking there's something a more vital in you and that is the dimension of awareness or presence from that dimension you can know what your mind is doing and the likelihood that you that you get taken over by certain thoughts decreases the more aware you become you still have thoughts of course you still have opinions which are thoughts you still have viewpoints political viewpoints whatever viewpoints you still have viewpoints but this but they do not give you your sense of identity anymore there are viewpoints and you may believe that this is the truth when the other viewpoint is not true but your identity is not no longer invested in it your sense of self because your sense of self has shifted to awareness you are consciousness and then you know the other the other human who holds a different viewpoint is no longer your enemy because your identity is not derived from your viewpoint your opinion your thoughts if your if your thoughts give you your identity then the others who hold opposite thoughts or very different thoughts become your enemy it's it's mad but that's how it is it's the basic human dysfunction which operates on a personal level and on a collective level so the most vital thing that to learn which again should be the very foundation of all of everything that is done at school is that there there is this dimension of consciousness in you that you can access and discover you can access it by becoming alert and observing your thoughts become aware of frequent thoughts that frequently go through your mind but most importantly becoming aware of yourself as conscious presence rather than as a mind-made entity so very often the practice to be engaged in is to realize that a lot of thinking that happens in your mind is not only unnecessary some of it is necessary and great but a lot of it is not only unnecessary but is actually destructive to your health your well-being your happiness a lot of thought is destructive of happiness of well-being of the ability to feel alive the ability to feel joy your ability to be creative a lot of mind activity is destructive so whenever you you're engaged in worrying worrying worrying is completely purposeless nobody has ever found a solution to a problem by worrying about it worrying means that you don't even want a solution you want to worry but when i say you at that moment you are your mind the mind has its momentum and the momentum wants to carry on the worrying thoughts don't want to cease they don't want to die they want to continue to be worrying thoughts so or other destructive thoughts when you have very you're deeply negative let's say you are trapped in deeply negative thought patterns and every therapist knows that often in therapy you reach a point where human being there's a possibility of going beyond and then the enormous resistance arises they don't want to go beyond because there's the thought patterns are they don't they don't want to die they don't they want to stay so worrying destructive thoughts useless thoughts it's what they take you come always out of the present moment that make it impossible for you to even appreciate beauty and aliveness around you that's always there so you you need to have some minimum of awareness to realize that this is what's happening to you oh in the middle of the night you wake up three o'clock in the morning anxiety rises why does it arise are you confronted with the problem you're in bed a relatively warm bed anxiety rises not being confronted with a problem but the mind is creating it the mind is creating the anxiety and so when you realize that you can then learn to let go of thought that is recognized as not only unnecessary but actually bad for you and everybody else around you you don't want it you don't need it but it but it has a momentum so how do you break the momentum of the thought it doesn't seem to want to get go away once you recognize it that you it has no useful function except to make you miserable so you've recognized that this thought pattern has no useful function but it's making me all the function it has it's pretending to be useful worry always pretends to be necessary but worry is not necessary it's unhelpful focused thinking you become still then you begin to think what is the situation what can i do about it this and this and this okay if i do that focused thinking that's great worrying is something very different completely unhelpful and self-destructive once you've recognized it you become free by first by recognizing its dysfunctional nature then direct your attention elsewhere it's a conscious choice and that's that's possible and it's not that difficult so you withdraw energy from the thoughts and energy in this case is consciousness you you withdraw the lifeblood of the thoughts which is consciousness and you direct consciousness somewhere else for example sense perceptions especially things of nature or breathing you become aware of breathing and breathing makes you aware of the inner body the that the the alive presence that that pervades your body but the moment you become aware of your breathing you've taken the lifeblood from thought and placed the attention the conscious attention into the inner body so you connect with the aliveness within and immediately thought begins to subside it cannot survive if you take away attention consciousness from it it then will try many times it will try to get consciousness back and so it will come up again the moment you you you you lose connectedness with the inner body or your breath it will try to start up again and then you have to catch it again so you and then you learn to keep thought at bay but not by suppressing it simply by being so alert and directing your attention elsewhere that it begins to subside so vital practice is to keep thought at bay when you don't you real you recognize it is unnecessary dysfunctional and creating that it creates a lot of unhappiness so that's a wonderful practice just take your attention into your breath you breathe into the body even down to the abdomen and out and breath awareness means you're no longer trapped in your mind you have taken attention away from the mind simple practice of breath awareness and breath awareness can take you into body awareness and the two can go together your awareness of your aware of your breathing and you're aware of that your body is alive and that becomes a single thing the breathing and awareness of the inner body and so and this when you discover that you have that power that that year you are more powerful than your mind it's a wonderful liberation to the discovery that that is not actually that difficult but you just have to know that you have that power to become free of dysfunctional thinking just breathe be feel it feel the aliveness that's who you are not the narrative in your mind that's consciousness the consciousness the end the intelligence that pervades your body that is consciousness that keeps the molecules of the body together for a while that's the consciousness that is a totality of who you are that's who you are not the story in your mind it doesn't matter on the level of the story that becomes secondary you can try to improve your story that's fine make your life a bit better on the surface of things that's a good that has its place too but not to do ultimately to look for your ultimate identity on that level of this better story that doesn't work your ultimate identity is here and now when you step out of the thinking mind but you don't become unconscious you become more conscious of the essence of who you are and become one with the essence of who you are wow and so the the power of awareness grows in you it's so to speak you become more aware of it the power of awareness of presence grows in you and then the you can still your thinking then becomes more constructive more focused and it's no longer the important thing i sometimes put it like this the mind loses its ability to make you unhappy the mind loses its ability to make you unhappy because then you realize a lot of your unhappiness did not come from the circumstances of your life but from the way in which your mind the story your mind told you about the circumstances of your life a great deal of unhappiness comes from the narrative in your mind and not from the circumstances and so that's enormous liberation if you've been whenever you're unhappy right where does the unhappiness arrive where does it come from is it actually the actual situation or is it the story that i'm telling myself about it and in most cases you'll find it's the story the unobserved mind creates the unhappiness the unobserved mind creates the unhappiness the unobserved mind also creates what we can call evil in this world because the unobserved mind is the mind of very unconscious people unconscious means the unobserved mind and the evil in this world is perpetrated by deeply unconscious people complete lack of awareness and so our our step now is to go beyond the dysfunctional state of humanity and so that we begin to awaken to that higher or deeper level of consciousness and the possibility is here now the possibility is here now because the if we don't awaken things will get worse and worse we have reached a critical point and humans only evolve when they reach a critical point when there's no way forward in the old state of consciousness so change happens when it actually absolutely needs to happen and it needs to happen now and that's why it's happening well it's true that the most important things that a human being needs to know to lead a life that is conscious and does not create unnecessary suffering those things are generally speaking not taught at school or university there are some exceptions there are certain alternative schools where some of these things i believe are being introduced or are being taught and there are individual teachers also who bring in these important teachings into their classroom although they're not part of the official curriculum but on the whole i believe it is true that all those essential things for a human being to know how to live skillfully and consciously these things are not yet being taught on a large scale so what's with what's lacking is wisdom in our contemporary world and wisdom of course should not be confused with intelligence or information or even education you can be highly educated and completely lacking in wisdom or you may have little education but be connected to that inner realm where wisdom arises which is the dimension of awareness or presence so the most vital thing to learn is to be in touch with this inner dimension of presence or awareness and that certain things you can teach that are purely conceptual you can teach mathematics or historical information facts those things you can teach easily all it is required is that the teacher has sufficient knowledge to be able to teach these facts then there's another type of teaching which would apply to subjects such as music or dance or anything creative even even cooking those things require more than conceptual knowledge so there's something that you need to absorb that goes beyond conceptual knowledge and so you wouldn't go to a teacher to taking music lessons and the teacher doesn't know how to play music might only have conceptual information about music so that would not be a good music teacher the teacher needs to have absorbed the practice of playing music on a deep level before he or she can teach it and that applies to other subjects even as I said even cooking you wouldn't want to take a cooking lesson somebody who has only read 500 recipe books but never done any cooking themselves so a teacher in order to teach awareness to students the teacher needs to have some access at least within to that dimension to even know what what he or she is talking about and so that's it's vitally important then to realize that this is not an academic subject that is added to the other subjects that you learn in school but it's something that should underlie all teaching at school something of a foundation for everything that is taught and done at school should be that everything arises out of that so it's not an added on not it's not even it's not a separate subject that can be taught but something more vital and so that also then applies to adults who are beginning to learn what really matters in life or already practicing it so the question being asked was to perhaps isolate three areas that are of vital importance that we don't learn at school that but that every human being needs to know and practice and I would like to start with the fact that many humans alive nowadays seem to be disconnected from nature and this is especially important for children who live in big cities inner cities it is a huge handicap for children not to be in touch with the natural world and that of course not only applies to children but also applies to every every human being so the I'd like to talk for a while about the importance of connecting with the natural world of bringing awareness to the to the way in which you experience the world of nature and how important it is to make that connection how nature can keep you not only keep you sane in this almost increasingly insane world how going back into nature periodically and connecting with nature can keep you sane and can help you to stay present so I would recommend as a not as a spiritual practice but as a normal way of being to as much as you can to go out into nature and whether it is a city park whether it is actual nature outside of the city the seashore the forest the open fields the desert whatever it may be whatever may be closest to you go out there and spend time as much as you can regularly in the natural world and if you might even just be your backyard if you can't get out there may be something in your the little garden that you have if you have one um it doesn't matter if you can't get out into wide open nature nature is everywhere around you important thing to realize is when you look at the world around you it can easily be this fact can easily be overlooked you can it's divided into the things that humans have made that surrounds you and then another part of reality is the things that humans have not made that came into being and all that is nature and even where you are sitting where I'm sitting or you are sitting there is part of what surrounds you is human made and another part of what surrounds you unless it's night time you might not but wherever you are is the natural world for example where I'm sitting here I'm sitting in a room and I see the furniture in the room and whatever is here and then I'm looking outside and there's the sky and there are trees very fundamental two different other different realities the human made world and the natural world and whenever you go outside of your house immediately you go into you realize this on the one hand you have this there's the street it's paved probably or unless you live in the country and then there you have cars and you have buildings and but then also there's trees perhaps there's a tree and then there's always the sky and you can always look up the sky even if there's no particular nature around you you can look at the sky there's nature the ever-changing sky is incredible just awareness of the weather I'm always I love weather I loved different kinds of weather no matter what it is and that changes well sometimes it doesn't change for several days here in the winter it rains a lot not today but but that's fine too I love the rain I love the sunshine I love the sky it's just it's a whenever you look at the sky it's a it's a it's a new painting every every day sometimes every hour there's a new painting that appears it's all this is a non-human made world should you become more aware of all those things that have not been made by humans but the natural things and so the so even just that little awareness that whenever you're outside even in a city there will be things all in a city the majority most of the things that you see in the city will be human made but there's always the sky and there may be some trees or some patches of grass so there's always this there's always something there that is not human made and then of course you may be able to get out of the city or go into a city park where the you have more we become aware of more things that are natural than those that are human made so you become aware of those and now you are out in nature whether it's a park let's say you're in a park or in out in actual nature then the question arises are you actually there or it's only your body there and your mind is still somewhere else because you're thinking about your problems or some mental dialogue or monologue is going on in your head and you're peripherally aware of nature you say oh how nice and then again you go and you and you're walking on and you're not you're not you're not present in nature so you're not really there so that doesn't help you that much it might be give you a little bit of relief but you're not really connecting with nature there's another thing that people do and there's nothing wrong with that they go into nature with a specific purpose they have a specific purpose in mind and the purpose might be they go jogging in the on the forest trail or out in the fields or on the beach they go jogging and so they have that they have their watch on and then they go yes that's great there's nothing wrong with jogging it's good for the body you're breathing but are you really there connecting with nature no because the purpose that what you're doing is more important than connecting with with the ocean if you go let's say on the on the beach you're jogging your main thing is the timing and the jogging that can be exhilarating there's nothing wrong with that there is a place for that but but there's something else to if it's not jogging it could be you go into nature in order to achieve some some other purpose you go with a specific purpose you go bird watching or something and then you can identify birds into that's there's nothing wrong with that either but these so you can this is all you can you can bring doing into nature and there's nothing wrong with it there's a place for it climb a mountain fine but so that there's a doing element that you can bring in and modern humans are more obsessed with doing they are obsessed with doing and not connected with the being dimension they've lost the being dimension because they're always doing and they bring that into nature they're always doing something then so then they're doing nature the important thing then to more deeply connect with nature is to bring in the being dimension you could call it if you like yin and yang so if you go into in a yang state into nature you're there's something there's a doing element or in you bring in the being which is the simple fact of awareness now you can be aware even while you're walking perhaps you can even be aware of even while you're jogging but i would recommend that that you bring in this element of quiet perception of nature so that sometimes you walk you walk slowly or you stand or you sit and then an alertness arises in you an alertness and this alertness is the rising of presence and then you begin to see whatever it is that surrounds you that is there and so this alertness then becomes the background to your sense perceptions and this is a different way of being in nature this is the beginning of connecting with nature at a deeper level so you bring in that element of could call it awareness so you begin to look at something and you see a tree sometimes you see you you may find that your attention focuses on a single object that you see in nature occasionally you look at one tree or you look at a branch or even the leaf of one tree or you look at a fern in the forest here i go for walks lots of ferns they thrive even in the winter because the winters are not very terribly cold here so the ferns continue to survive the ferns have been here very early plants have been here for a hundred million years they've been the same and they're still there they're there and they're beaut their quiet beauty so you and you look at sometimes you look at single things in nature and sometimes you look at the totality of whatever it is the forest you take in the totality but you become still you become present and then you're fully there and then you and then you connect with that there is a field in nature there is a field of aliveness or presence that underlies whatever it is you perceive with your senses and at the moment i'm only talking about the visual sense but there's also the other senses can come in and should come in when you're out in nature there's the auditory the perceptions what is it what are the sounds of nature and so there may be occasional birds there may be the the wind in the trees you hear or you can go there might be a brook or water trickling water is an amazing sound the sound of water if you pay attention to the whether it's rain or a brook or river or the ocean the sound of water in any form if you give it attention it's a wonderful way of just connecting there's something incredibly soothing and and and healing just by directing your attention to the sound of water and i'm just taking water as one example it could also be the sound of birds it could be the sound of the wind uh whatever it may be so you can be aware simultaneously of what you see and what you hear and then there may be of course you're breathing there may be certain smells of nature so it's the ocean the ocean has a particular smell or here the forest going to the forest it has a you feel the the moisture and the aliveness of the of the soil where there's decaying matter but out of the decaying matter new life continuously arises and you can smell it's all vitally it's so alive everything is alive and but when you're not really there when you're in your mind you don't you have no idea you don't know you don't know you're not there so when you're there you can sense this this this aliveness of what surrounds you and so nature whatever it could even if it's a city park you might still hear noises of traffic and so on and yet there you are there's grass there's trees there's the sky uh that's beautiful for i lived for many years in london for example and so the the great redeeming feature about london which otherwise can i mean as great city can really grind you down having to go to work on the in the underground the subway the tube and every day and or can really ground you down but london has these open spaces the parks reed and spark hyde park and a little bit in the north my favorite hamstead he's would go out there almost every day and immediately stillness descends and you know ah and then there's a the appreciation of nature then grows in you and this is not connected with knowledge about nature that has its place too you don't need particular knowledge of what these trees are what how they grow and what they do that's another way of but there's a deeper this is a knowing that is not conceptual you know nature in this is unitive knowing that's you know nature but not conceptually you have a deep relationship with nature and nature can help you to not get lost in your mind but you you have to take the initial steps always the initial steps is your choice to be present to direct your attention to your sense perceptions in nature what that's how you could begin to connect with it and then you may sense an underlying energy field that it goes beyond that which you perceive with your senses and people have used different words to describe what that is but this is there is a sacredness that's the the most appropriate words that occurs to me there's a sacred a sacred presence there and i'm not romanticizing nature by saying that i know very well that nature can kill you less like everything else the water is a wonderful thing what you physically you are like 75 percent water but water can kill you too the heat of the sun is is the same heat that's in your body but of course the heat of the sun can also kill you that's the there's enormously powerful energy there it's not a romantic view it goes beyond that and if you cannot go out you might be just at home and maybe you have a plant at home a potted plant i have quite a few and even that it's how but how after you've had plant do you do you really give it attention by the way there have been books written i don't want to go into that but if you give attention to a plant it thrives more than another plant that is not given attention and this actually is a fact because the attention that you give is an outflow of energy towards the plant but not only that something comes back at you to it there's a connection there here i have one for example that's a jade plant in a pot and i have several jade plants now again you look at a plant you're not only looking you have to give it attention and become still and then you can sense its aliveness you can sense it's kind of one could almost say it's surrounded by a field of stillness and sometimes i like to touch it you touch the leaves are firm and very alive and they're shiny that means the plant is happy when the leaves are shiny the plant is happy i have lived with jade plants for many years and observed them very closely not only as potted plants here in california they grow outside in the garden here they would not survive in the winter just it's love and in the garden they grow quite tall taller than me some of the jade plants with trunks that are like massive trunks like a little like bonsai tree trunks some jade plants grow in the sun they're exposed to several hours of sunlight and the leaves are very small and light green those who are exposed to a lot of sun other jade plants out in the open california they grow under the oak trees and the leaves are much bigger and dark green but they adjust the any climate they adjust to and therefore i mean any temperature except when it gets too low but these are this is just what i've observed so that each plant is uh is like an individual being the important thing is to connect without labeling it or i'm talking about it now but these are just pointers i want to point to the possibility of connecting without mental labels so just look and give it attention the fullness the aliveness of it and it is still there's no doubt about it that everything is every plant is very very still very it's rooted i say it's rooted in being and the more attention you give it the more rooted in being you become it teaches you one could say the plant teaches you to be more rooted in being and teaches you to be free of unnecessary conceptualization and here i have the forest and i often sit here and just look at the forest this is a we've got that some transparent blind here because otherwise the light doesn't work but um and that's a wonderful meditation just to just to sit and every day i spend a period of time looking at the trees it sounds um it's deeply peaceful and so again if you go out into nature bring in other senses it's not just the visual there's also the auditory and there's also the what is the word olfactory olfactory smelling and there is the you can your skin you can sense the air on your skin when you this might be a slight breeze so you come you're you're in your you become you come to your senses and this is a spiritual practice then to go into any natural environment and direct your awareness to your sense perceptions of nature and if it's as i said if it's only the sky that's wonderful give attention to this to look at the sky don't think about it you just you just look and it's like a people going to art galleries to look at paintings if you look at the sky it's a painting every and it changes constantly it's an it's an incredible artist seems to be doing it it's the abstract paintings every time you look in sky it's a new abstract painting now the most important thing about this is the realization that you do not live in a world that is dead but vitally alive humans are so disconnected from nature that nature is not perceived as intensely alive let alone sacred because humans are trapped in the conceptualized mind and this deadens everything you cannot even sense your own aliveness because you have a mental concept of who you are and that gives you your sense of identity that's a terrible disconnection the disconnection from nature is cannot be separate from the disconnection with with your own deeper nature so humans are disconnected from nature because they're disconnected from their own nature the the who they are who or what they are in their essence they come together so to give more attention to nature can also help you to awaken the connectedness with your own nature with because everything is the pervaded with as i see it pervaded with spirit there's only the one the one the one consciousness that's manifesting this world manifesting as life forms in this world and so especially at the present time it's vitally important for you to connect with nature and deepen your connectedness with nature and use use these little practices if you want to call it that until these practices become second nature to you so to speak these are no longer practiced they're a natural way of being in nature you do not need your conceptualizing mind when you are in nature let go of that use this opportunity to be present and uh then nature will can heal you on every level even if you have an animal in your home that's also nature and we know that how healing it is to have an animal presence in your home a dog or a cat and even mainstream science have figured out that it's not only soothing and healing to have an animal it's even good for you physically it helps people it's they've they've done studies that people who have an animal have a have better health and live longer you can you can but that well it's not was no surprise to me yes an animal is nature didn't when you and you have to again give it give attention to give attention to the animal look into the eyes of the animal and realize what the animal that you love what you ultimately love in the animal is invisible everything else is lovely to touch yes to look at but there is a presence there and that present in the cat in the dog there is a presence and that presence is what you love and there's also a presence in the tree and in the flower that is you cannot see but you can sense that presence and that presence is the sacredness of every life form it's the essence of every life form and it's inseparable from the essence of who you are so vitally important go as much as possible into nature and let's say if you are in prison well there are some people who are virtually in prison these days if you are in prison and some are actually in prison if you are in prison and you can hardly see the sky you cannot even see the sky in extreme case you still have your body your own body and you become aware of the aliveness in your body and that's also nature so that is always there and again the that's a vital thing that on the spiritual path is to sense the aliveness within which is the in that is the beginning of the invisible presence that you are that is inseparable from who you are look how still the trees are i'm getting i should be getting out of the way and just let the trees speak and there's the sky too ah wonderful and again something vital that children should learn at school is how to recognize their emotions because children have very strong emotions and without the ability to recognize your emotions the emotions take you over completely what that means is the emotions when emotional influx comes it takes you over it controls what you say it controls what you do it controls what you think then the emotion is in charge of you and what is an emotion and again like a thought is an energy entity in emotion too is an entity that is an energy form you cannot see it but you can only see how it manifests in the external world but an emotion is an energy form that lives in you it's a little entity and if you recognize it then there's an awareness there without awareness often you can easily be run by your emotions and that means the emotion whether it be let's say it could be anger it could be sadness could be anxiety whatever it may be deep regret jealousy envy whatever whatever it is the the emotion the this energy invades which at first you might feel in the body it then rises up into your mind and then it controls your thinking so when you feel deeply negative then or angry then the emotion rides into your mind and every thought reflects the emotion that you feel because the emotion is sinking through you and the emotion is feeding on your thoughts so the loop happens the vicious circle the emotion creates thought and the thought amplifies the emotion so in the case of anger you get more and more angry the more you think about it the more angry you get until finally you lash out completely lost and of course if it's a child also experiences that sometimes very some children have temper tantrums and or they may other very violent emotions uh some children have learned that the only way they can get attention from their parents is by displaying violent emotions because otherwise parents don't give them attention so a child would say as you know if you're probably aware of the time i use pain body pain body is the time i use for an accumulation of old emotion that still lives in you it's unrecognized as emotion it lives in you as an entity it's an accumulation of of negative emotion or often goes back to early childhood an accumulation of negative emotion that hasn't left you that dwells in your body somewhere and i call it the pain body and i it's helpful to look at it as a little entity almost an entity that lives in your gremlin that lives in you and sometimes it's dormant for periods of time but it cannot stay dormant forever it has to occasionally rise up into your mind and then suddenly you get taken over by this old emotion sometimes it's triggered by an event uh and you do usually know it's the pain body when the reaction to a triggering event is out of proportion to the triggering event the reaction is far greater than would be warranted by the triggering event and that usually means it has triggered old latent emotion in you the pain body it's come to life and then it takes over your mind and you are no longer you then you are the pain body you are the old emotion that lives through you if you have a partner the partner if it the partner doesn't know you well yet you've only just moved in together or got married and then the partner is suddenly surprised that you that you're no longer you you're some weird awful jerk that's what is this uh you may not know it's the pain body because you just think you made a terrible mistake but your partner's pain body may awaken yours and then you have a wonderful drama that and the pain body loves not only negative thinking because every negative thought feeds it thought is energy it feeds the emotion and the emotion gets even stronger then you have another thought and feeds this is the loop and so if you're it is also when you feel very bad about your life you're very unhappy about your life what you call your life these are it's a narrative what you call your life is a narrative it's it's a sequence of thoughts in your mind that are repetitive a repetitive sequence of thoughts is what you call your life and for many people this this thing that they call my life is a huge a burdensome dreadful thing that they carry around that is a very unhappy thing my life whenever i start thinking about my life i get more and more unhappy i'm not i'm not talking about me i'm just whenever i think about my life i get more and more unhappy and uh and the more unhappy i get the more i want to think about it it's it's i call it the it's what arises here is the addiction to unhappiness it's it's actually addictive no more why is it addictive because the emotion wants more of it the it's more of itself it wants to be fed by the thinking that reflects the same energy with it's the vibrational frequency so to speak of the emotion so every negative thought feeds the negative emotion a positive thought cannot feed the negative emotion a thought that oh what a beautiful sky isn't that this gives the emotion doesn't want that that doesn't feed it or my life is so wonderful no it's not the emotion loves the thoughts but it's not only the thoughts what it loves even more is to get the same emotion from others and this is how the pain body operates it then goes to whoever is around you at the time your partner or at work or family member and the emotion will then speak through you and say something negative in order to provoke a similar emotion in the other person it's all unconscious it's crazy but it's normal and so the and again here we have it's the the unobserved mind lack of awareness the unobserved mind gets taken over it gets taken over by toxic thoughts it gets taken over by emotions that arise they could be we could be your old emotions from the past the pain body that come up periodically and then subside once if you're once you've had a drama in your relationship lasting for an hour or two or the whole day then the pain body subsides and the next day you wake up you're a bit more conscious again and the emotion has subsided your mind is not is not quite as crazy as yesterday it's still not very not conscious but not quite as crazy as yesterday and you wake up and then oh you can't even remember what it was all about the drama that you had with your whoever it was you think what was how did it all start it didn't matter how it started the pain body needed it wanted it so the again lack of awareness through lack of awareness you are at the mercy of your emotional fields so the the moment awareness comes in the emotion may still be there but you're no longer totally possessed by it or trapped in it it's still there but at least there's an observing presence there and that's an enormous step forward so whenever you feel emotion arising that is of a very negative kind let's come back to mom for a moment to what i said about telling yourself how unhappy you are or how awful your life is or how awful other people are whatever this narrative may be then recognize that uh there is this very strong energy in you the emotional mental energy they you know they've come together and suddenly be the observer say oh for the past hour i've been thinking bad things about my life but is it really that bad because i'm sitting here breathing looking at the plant and the sky and feeling the aliveness in the body you're beginning to get out of your narrative and into the present moment the only way where there's free the only place where there's freedom from the past from the conditioned mind conditioned by the past is the present moment so it's always to become aware is inseparable from present moment the power of the present moment arises the moment you become aware and where is you but you're the observer of your inner states and then you're no longer at the mercy of your inner states freedom arises and so the emotion for example cannot renew itself anymore through using your mind because then you say there's no i don't want that you recognize a dysfunctional way in which the emotion is linking up into your mind and you come into the present moment and again breathing and deep breathing deep into the abdomen a few times and your attention follows the breath that's the important part and then you feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body and there may still be an emotion in there it may not have gone away immediately there's still whatever it is the anxiety the fear the heaviness or the anger you can still feel it somewhere in you but you're not consumed by it anymore it's it's still there and not it's you can it's you can live with it it's not that bad because you are the awareness that's all that's around it and and as the and as the awareness deepens it begins to the way i put it transmute the energy that was trapped in the emotion it was energy that got trapped in early childhood very often and through the awareness it gets because the awareness also means that you you allow it to be there in this moment it's not renewing itself in through your mind but in this moment this is what you feel awareness allows is space gives it space is the space for it that is i feel this can can still feel the anxiety but because you're aware the anxiety does not rise up into your mind and controls your thinking anymore that's an important difference and so you you feel it and then it it gradually diminishes it doesn't renew itself anymore but you allow it while it's there you say well that is and you may be able to feel other parts of the body that are actually fine anxiety might be here in your chest area and but in your hands are fine you feel the energy in your hands and your feet and your arms and a lot of the rest of your body you feel that aliveness let's see how you begin to be free of the pain body or any no longer at the mercy of emotional energies and that again children could learn that easily at school by the game playing for example and children parents can teach their children if children have ang bouts of anger for example sometimes some children do it's not uncommon this this could be already the young the the pain body in the child after it's happened talk to the child and say what was it what did what what happened yesterday when you started screaming and throwing things what was that what what did you feel what what can you paint it what would it look like if you make a picture of it what color is it does it have a name that thing that comes into you from time to time and makes you throw things what does it have a name what if it had a name what name would it have and by asking these questions the the awareness in the child grows awareness of it could be done as game even as playing it out in games at school and so on so that the fostering the awareness in children as the most important subject in school the founder foundational subject at school of course should be awareness i mean is that so difficult to understand the most consciousness is the primordial subject that underlies all other subjects it's at school and then it's so that's how it it starts so now we we most of us do it as adults we do we but what could have perhaps been done in a more enlightened civilization at school we do it as and that's fine at least it's happening now and eventually um it may even reach politicians and media people eventually even they may be destined to become conscious so in the meantime i recommend that you don't that you're very careful with linking into the collective at the present time especially be very careful when you connect with social media mainstream media whatever media it is because there is it in many ways it is toxic and very unconscious so you wouldn't voluntarily expose yourself to a virus that's that's quite dangerous you wouldn't go out and say okay well i'll go to to an environment where many people are infected with this virus and hope for the best i wouldn't do that in the same way we be very careful when you link into those forms of media because a lot of what's going on there is what is a viral infection of the collective so yes a minimum to know what's going on that's fine you want to know what's going on but beyond that you do not need to listen for one two or three hours of five people on the screen talking to each other how dreadful the situation is and you because you absorb that it don't expose yourself to unnecessary risks of catching collective mental viruses or the of course the more present you are the the more immune immunity you have but still you wouldn't even want to even if you have the immunity why expose yourself to that it's more important that if you contribute to the discourse through social media or whatever if you use any of these things whatever they're called facebook twitter instagram snapchat or whatever just make sure that everything you put out is conscious it's not a reactive thing not attacking anybody don't confuse the virus in that mental virus that people get infected by with who they essentially are so whatever you put out make sure it's something of a constructive nature that does not contribute to human unconsciousness but diminishes human unconsciousness um so it's a wonderfully challenging time we live in but that's a good thing so emotions awareness catch the emotion as it arises especially if old emotion pain body emotion uh detect it and recognize it for what it is that's then you've already won half the battle so to speak recognizing it for what it is emotion or emotion stay present as the observer the witness so you're here to bring sanity into this world that's a good life purpose to bring consciousness one could even define this as your main life purpose to bring consciousness into this world the light of consciousness you be the light of course that reminds me of the famous saying i don't know who first said it it's attributed to various people whether it was nelson mandela or somebody else be the change that you want to see in this world so that's very true so be the light of consciousness because that's the change that we need that the world needs

now there is a new mind emerging emerging maybe a new human species and there are signs for this that would fit contrary to what we are learn or learn or being told about evolution um like darwin said nature doesn't make jump well the evolution of life proceeded in jumps it made jumps and the jumps typically happened when the earth got in stress like in an ice age life survived not because some life forms were better than others and ate everybody else no because they cooperated and you can see how now the earth is beginning to be under stress you see at the same time how the world is globalizing there is more and more support for international cooperation rather than making another war we may be at the beginning of a new leap and out of it would come a new human being it's possible yes yes and you have also written about this yes yes that's i believe that's how it is and us talking here and us being here together is perhaps already part of that emergence the new human being will believe

in cooperation not in competition will believe in kindness and support not in in violence and war and all that yes so that's what i believe and it's in a way an optimistic yes yes but i would share that but it's it's it's not stupid it may actually be the only way you can look at how things are developing yes

i have been looking for happiness for 20 years now i've done everything correctly everything i was supposed to do but i can't find happiness or joy please help i'm glad you asked the question the answer of course is very simple you have to give up your search for happiness because it hasn't worked in 20 years so it's not going to work in the next 20 years yes the very search for happiness prevents you from finding the happiness that is available to you already because the search for happiness implies that you are not fully inhabiting with your conscious attention this moment and you cannot fully accept it because it is judged as in some way lacking the present moment is judged as something lacking here always and the search for happiness implies you're looking for some future state you imagine yourself at some point in the future when you're going to be happy happiness as such is also a strange term i don't use it usually to really point to the state of connectedness with your essential identity in the present moment that perhaps a more suitable word for that would be joy a joyous sense of aliveness a quiet but intense sense of aliveness and joy and peace some people may call that happiness ramana mahasi the indian spiritual teacher a great teacher who lived in the 40s 50s he used the word happiness to talk about this but when he uses the word happiness he does not mean the happiness the conventional way in which this word is used so he says happiness is your true nature so you just have to find your true nature and then you find happiness and what he means is find the essence of who you are and then you have that state of joyous aliveness that some people call happiness at least peace an inner peace not a dead peace not the peace of unconsciousness or drunkenness are you peaceful yeah not that one the peace where you have risen above thought not fallen below thought to the vertical dimension again so what to do you give up your search for happiness and give more attention to the present moment and don't look for happiness in the present moment don't look for anything just be with the present moment and make it your friend you might as well since there's nothing else ever and since your entire life is experienced as the present moment you might as well have a friendly attitude towards it it is your entire life it can only be experienced in and as the present moment even memories you remember you remember something that once was the present moment and you remember it in the present moment if it hadn't been happened in the present moment when it happened it couldn't have happened and you couldn't remember it if it weren't the present moment now don't try to work that out mentally so everything is the your entire life is only ever now and so by appreciating the now becoming friendly with the now aligning yourself with the now you live your life unfolds differently and you appreciate the little things instead of thinking of the big things that would make you happy if you could only achieve them including the idea of enlightenment or whatever else it is those big things that are going to make me happy instead appreciate whatever is here in the present moment and then you may find one day that the that listening to the the leaves of a tree moved by the wind that sound suddenly makes you happy and you may find looking at the sky suddenly makes you happy to become aware that you're breathing and to feel the aliveness within the body makes you happy touching paper that has been in the sauna for a while and the soft touch of it it's everything suddenly is fine and good and if something unpleasant arises as it sometimes does of course if action is possible you take action towards changing the situation or removing yourself from the situation if that either is not possible or not possible yet then you simply practice acceptance of what is instead of generating unhappiness about what is and even if action is possible the basis is well this is what is now what can I do about it well this is what is there's still an acceptance of what is and then that acceptance of what is that before would have been judged as highly undesirable instead of making you unhappy produces more depth in you because more acceptance means more depth a greater depth in you vertical dimension so you appreciate the good things even all the little good things they're continuously arising around you so you practice that gratitude for all that appreciation of all the little things and then happiness arises and when something not good happens or the mind says it's not good or it is actually unpleasant really unpleasant acceptance and that can take you even deeper than the little good things one big back one big bad thing can take you quickly deeper than many good things by accepting accepting means the egoic structures that create continuous resistance subside and this gap opens up and you as a person the ego lives in and through resistance in one form or another you as a person suddenly give way dissolve become transparent and then something deeper arises is there and that is what Jesus called the peace that passes all understanding because you cannot figure out the relationship in your mind between this so-called bad event and the peace you feel the reason of course being now i'm explaining to you so you can actually understand it the peace that passes all understanding is this relationship normally a good thing produces inner peace or happiness and here a bad thing produces an even greater much greater inner peace and happiness and that is because it through acceptance it causes the ego which is a mind-made self to get out of the way dissolve become they're much weaker become transparent instead of dense and and then your essence identity as consciousness itself shines through in other words the ripple which is the ripple on the ocean lives on the horizontal dimension all ripples are on the horizontal dimension but when the life becomes too unpleasant for the ripple that may force the ripple to become aware of that which is beyond the vertical dimension oh so more present moment awareness instead of looking for happiness appreciating the many beautiful things and then also gradually becoming aware of your presence which ultimately is what the now is it is the presence of consciousness the space in which everything happens and you are that of course that's the sense-perceived life there is deeper life too that is not sense-perceived but we start with the sense-perceived life and as we go deeper deeper during our retreat we will see that the sense-perceived life although beautiful is only the surface of reality but you have to start with that and it's beautiful and if you give it your fullest attention even then you already begin to go deeper than the surface because then you sense an aliveness in everything you can sense that the life in this flower i'm just making sure it's not plastic even if it were plastic there is some life in plastic too but not as intense life as in the natural flower the life that is expressive that expresses itself through this flower is the life that expresses itself through this form this body this mind and millions of other other forms and so you go around in a state of astonishment because there's so much that you had not really acknowledged before it's easier to be astonished here at the multiplicity of life perhaps than if you were in uh what's a boring place well there are many boring places i'm not going to name any it's easier but even if you're in a so-called boring place a suburb somewhere there's beauty there too you might have to look more and even if you were in a street without any vegetation there will still be beauty there too and there comes a moment when you actually see beauty in everything even in a simple pavement a window the surface of a table how light gets reflected of objects the colors and when for i also suggest so look for be aware of the little things because that requires that brings your alertness up big things are fine that's nice to be aware of the little things and go go when you walk around here in between sessions you go a bit like a little bit like as if you as if you had just arrived on this planet in some sense you have because these surroundings here may be so unusual to you if you live somewhere very different it's almost as if you had arrived on a new planet and how would you be if you arrived on a new planet you don't you go and you don't you don't do a lot of thinking you just you're just there as an aware presence perceiving like a child before a child learns the names of things but you're not regressing you're transcending that level of conceptualization that which most that most humans are trapped in you're not regressing to the child stage you are transcending but as you transcend the conceptualization level there is there certain things that are similar to a child or that's deeper than the child perceives because you've been through that growth you have transcended conceptualization there's a deeper knowing that the child does not have but in other ways there are certain similarities with how a child perceives the world and it's not for nothing that jesus said truly i tell you if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven you must be like a little child that's a very important pointer and how is a little child before the child can name things when the child does not happen to be crying the child is going he takes everything in without naming it and there's a clarity of perception and then the naming stage comes and then the problems start another thing need to mention for to be aware of here i highly recommend that you do not switch on your television if you have one in your room and if you find that difficult it means you're addicted and so if you find yourself going to the tv or the remote and you go i can't stop myself oh that's a good way of realizing that you're addicted even more addictive these days are the little gadgets well from laptops to pads ipads and similar devices phones which are much more than phones these days which absorb many people's attention a lot of the time so much that for many humans their interaction with reality 50 or more of their interaction with reality is through a little screen that they hold in front of their eyes and they live for it they live for the next facebook post so you may find that you are addicted to some extent to that also i would recommend to keep that to a minimum the devices if you absolutely have to set aside 10 minutes 15 minutes a day when you actually do interact or you look at your emails or facebook posts just to see what other people are eating or what they're wearing and you can say oh that looks great or you may compulsively take a selfie of yourself here look where i am and then hopefully everybody will feel jealous about you we may talk about those things a little bit more at a later time but in the meantime i would recommend that you break the habitual if for many of you what is habitual interaction with these devices while you're here in order to fully benefit from being here so that your attention is not absorbed by that because that really amplifies the mind unless you have something that you're looking there that promotes presence you might see a present moment reminder uh oh i have to remember to put in a as a present moment reminder it needs to come up on the screen says put away your phone we'll have to write that down for the next one stop looking at the screen look at the sky oh what else oh alcohol i believe you can buy alcohol here and there's nothing wrong with a glass of wine or beer occasionally but at least how i see it but but it can easily pull you out of presence into unconsciousness especially if after one glass of wine you cannot stop if you feel you need one glass wine to enjoy your meal fine fine but if you're one of those many who cannot after one they need to have a second because and then they don't they don't realize it but when they started drinking their one first glass of wine they were totally determined determined only to have one glass of wine but by the end they get by the time they get to the end of the first glass of wine they forgot that they were totally determined to only have one glass of wine say oh one might as well have another and then you're gone so if you are one of those don't don't have the first one or beer if you cannot enjoy the meal without a beer you must have your beer before the meal okay but if you if you cannot stop and you must have another one after that this is not this is would prevent you from benefiting from being here if you can avoid alcohol altogether it would be preferable while you're here so that is only there no this is not a boot camp retreat there are retreats like that where you get strict instructions no alcohol you're not watching television you're not going to talk to anybody you're not going to look at anybody and we're going to meditate for 10 hours a day okay some of you may have been on that retreat now sit and close your eyes there's a place for that kind of retreat too if it's right for you if it's right for you you've already been to it or you're going to go to it so i'm not mentioning other drugs because i don't think i need to here i don't think you will indulge in those things here there's something much better than acid or pot and that's called presence it's not a drug it's true that some of these drugs can give you a little glimpse of of what it is to perceive the world without the intrusion of the habitual mind and this is why people who take some of these drugs have an experience that goes a wow experience and you look at something you look at a simple object and suddenly see its beauty and aliveness and you go wow and wow look at that look at that glass of water i can't believe it and the truth is it is miraculous and the truth is we don't see it because of the habitual nature of the mind if you if you suspend thinking and look at this glass of water water is an amazing substance it's a miracle and what is a glass it's a solid thing and the light shines through it it's amazing it's completely solid but the light travels through it and yes you can go wow without any drug if you're real if you're present really present so and you again do this occasionally you can do it here people won't think you're mad if you do it out in the world they would think oh he must have taken something or she but if you go to really appreciate an object any object a natural object or even a man-made object pick it up give it your fullest attention feel it see it this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation when you can sense the essence of yourself as consciousness there's a vast power in there which has nothing to do with egoic power power over somebody but sensing that is really the only thing that can free you of fear so you can know a very old illustration or example to explain it i believe it comes from india is they use they could you could use anything but they use honey so you can know honey by examining the structure of honey and where it comes from and how it's produced by the bees and the molecular structure and the chemical composition and you can write several phds about honey and you can know everything there is to know well perhaps that's even impossible because there's always more to know but you can know a lot about honey so there you are a doctor of honey after you have successfully defended your thesis and one day somebody asked have you actually ever tasted honey no that's not part of my phd so if you taste honey you would know nothing about it necessarily you just but there's a different knowing there that is more immediate direct nothing to do with concepts but you know honey on a level that is deeper in a way than this person who only knows honey through concepts and now we can apply that first to yourself and also of course we can apply it to other people how do you know somebody else but you have to start with yourself so in addition to knowing yourself as this historical person which really is knowing about yourself you know all kinds of things about yourself and you can talk about it for a long time you can write your autobiography and perhaps some people will be interested in it or not everybody has their own autobiography in their head and it consists of things that you can talk about so an autobiography consists of stories this is what happened to me or this is what i did i let me tell you the story and this is what i experienced that's what i suffered but do i know myself at a deeper level am i able to let go to relinquish when i choose to to relinquish all conceptual knowledge about myself all narratives and stories and not live through the narratives and stories although i'm able to remember them when i need to but am i able to know a deeper essence that enables the narratives to exist to be you need to be conscious to have a narrative a story you need to be conscious to perceive things with your senses is you need to be conscious to have an emotion all these arise they are objects that arise in let's temporarily call it your consciousness but it's not yours they are all objects that arise in consciousness so your life consists on the and except on the deepest level your life what i call your life situation is the term i choose to use consists of the arising of objects in the space of consciousness or the light of consciousness so perception it's a it's an object that arises in consciousness there it is and then it disappears and then another perception replaces it a thought arises a stream of thoughts they can take over your consciousness almost completely they they gobble up they suck up if thoughts can be so overpowering if you're in the absence of awareness as a stream of thoughts can take take your whole conscious consciousness and manufacture thoughts out of it and so you're completely unaware of yourself as consciousness you're completely you're just completely identified with a thought it takes up all your consciousness and makes it into thought and emotions the my continuously manufacturing more thoughts cook i need more and you can see it when people talk to each other sometimes how they are taken over by taken over by a stream of thought and confuse it with who they are and then they have to defend that stream of thought whatever that stream of thought is saying whatever position it's whatever perspective it has it people become mortal enemies because your stream of thought does not agree with my stream of thought and groups do it because there are collectives that are dominated by certain commonly held jointly held beliefs there are some collectives that are held together by belief systems ideologies and everybody takes it on board and then their other collective have conflicting ideologies and they become your mortal enemy and really all this happens because you don't know who you are you only know yourself as an object in consciousness so the deepest meaning of knowing yourself is knowing yourself beyond concepts not through concepts not knowing yourself as an object in consciousness but as the eternal subject which is consciousness itself and so the mind subsides and a sense of still alert presence remains i am and now you don't need to add anything to it you just know that you are the beingness of you and if that can be sustained in the background so to speak then you could have a discussion with somebody and you can put forward your point of view which are thoughts without making that person into an enemy because he or she holds opposite or conflicting points of view and you can have a conversation and while you're having a conversation you remain spacious inside but you can still clearly state your point of view without having a self-identification with your point of view this is how i see it but you don't derive your sense of identity from that mental position but you can still you don't have to give up all all mental positions you just recognize them as thoughts you happen to this is how i see reality this is how i see that but there's always something else in the background something deeper and then it is more likely that the awareness of the that which is deeper which is awareness itself may enable you to think in a different way so that you you're not just take on board what the collective that you happen to be born into tends to think you don't adopt if you're born into what a certain political system or whatever it may be you don't necessarily adopt all their beliefs and make it part of your sense of identity but you're able to and even our civilization will perhaps our western civilization is not dominated by any one particular ideology as for example communist russia wars or china wars which still is to some extent just getting mixed up with other things but even here if you you may not realize that how many of the thoughts that you think are your thoughts you have absorbed through a screen either the tv screen or the ipad screen or the samsung screen and or some people still read newspapers and you have absorbed certain viewpoints that most of the media tend to agree on with certain relation to your country or a group of countries in relation to other countries certain and you just absorb that and that becomes your viewpoint and you may not realize that perhaps it's a quite a distorted way of looking there may be other ways of looking but people think these are my thoughts they are not they're not your thoughts and it's not just with reference to the media but with everything these are thoughts that you absorb from the from the collective but if you are aware if this this awareness is in the background it is more likely that you are able to think creatively that you can look through certain forms of almost hypnosis that if you live in a collective you are hypnotized into that you become part of that particular way of looking at the world and you can see things more clearly and have creative thoughts so you can actually think better when you're able to step out of thinking and then when you think don't lose yourself completely in the thinking then you can you can see more clearly and another strange thing that happens when you can sense the essence of who you are it's not just although the buddha called it well as it's commonly translated emptiness is not i don't think that's a good translation of certain terms he used like sunyata spaciousness i would prefer some call it nothingness but there's more to it than that when you can sense the essence of yourself as consciousness there's a there's a power in there there's a vast power in there which is nothing to do with egoic power power over somebody but sensing that is really the only thing that can free you of fear because fear means oh you're the little the little me and you feel threatened and fearful of what's going to happen to me and all these other me's around me the others but to be free of fear if you can sense that deep within you there is a silent power and perhaps that is the the deeper and original meaning of the term faith faith is to sense that power it's not an intellectual thing belief i would say is an intellectual thing because the term belief as a noun means you you believe in the uh veracity of certain things that are being told as it could be a story you believe in this particular narrative that's a belief faith is something the way i interpret the word or use the word is something deeper that is not connected with concepts faith is a deep trust that's perhaps a better a better translation of to a better pointer a deep trust in life which you cannot arrive at through telling yourself certain things i really should be trusting because the universe is going to look after you i just need to believe you're still stuck in your head and you're saying i just need to believe that the universe is going to look after i'm just going to look after okay well as maybe that is a that is a bridge or maybe that is a sign post that can take you to the actual realization of what you're saying but it's also possible that it remains a sign post and you never get to where the sign post points to i'm trying to have this trust in the universe but i still wake up in the middle of the night and in a state of panic i don't know why i keep telling myself that i need to trust the universe now even it's on my bathroom mirror and a piece of paper written stuck in there god loves you quit well is it a thought that you believe in that does not free you from fear or if it's a sign post and then it takes you to a deeper place where you realize your connectedness with the source ultimately your connectedness with the source of all life that there's not a separation that you're not an autonomous entity thrown into out you come through into thrown out of the universe or fallen from the sky so the to sense your connectedness with the source is the realization that god loves you but you can let you don't need the words anymore you there's just a trust and there's no duality anymore because you're an extension of the one an emanation of the one so faith really is trust but the trust is not something you can think yourself into ultimately you need to let go of all these concepts although when you later talk about it you may take them up again but for the experience of it you let go of concepts and you can sense in the space between two thoughts in the space of awareness you can sense the stillness the presence and you can sense it as a silent power silent that's the dao it's chinese the silent a silent power and that silent power is inseparable from who you are it's you and much infinitely vaster than you both at the same time but it's almost as if a ray of sunlight that arrives here suddenly realizes its source it is a ray of sunlight suddenly realizes its own source where it comes from and it also realizes that it that it can never be totally separate from its source because there's the ray of sunlight somehow is still connected to the sun which in this analogy that's the source so the ray of sunlight then could say my fear has disappeared because i realize that i'm connected to something much vaster and this vastness is sustaining me it could say that it could also say and some have some rays have done that i am the sun ecstatic translated in this analogy there have been mystics in various traditions who said i am god it's not advisable to say that people don't like it so that power is something that you can then have in the sense in the background and it can it's not just a passive thing always in the background it can it emanates intelligence so to speak it uses it can use your mind and it can inspire it out this is the dimension of creativity which is this prior to form but it's where form arises out of the formless so all the great creations that humanity has been able to achieve over the centuries and millennia anything truly creative comes because the human being who created that had some connection with the silent power within perhaps only in the act of creation perhaps not in their private life but in the act of creation there was suddenly that connectedness and many many great composers and artists and even some of the great scientists who had breakthroughs say that it came to them almost full fully formed as a revelation it already arrived as if it had been already formed at a deeper level and then suddenly they just received it and some report that they are overpowered almost by the sudden influx of an amazing thing that then becomes perhaps a work of art or an amazing insight or a piece of music that comes from that place and those things that come from that deeper place are the things that remain because although most humans are not sufficiently connected to be able to to create any of these things there are quite a few who have at least have some connections or they are able to recognize the greatness in something when they see it and so the humans value for example the great classics of literature there are some books that have survived for two thousand and more years it's miraculous because a book is a very fragile thing and for cent many centuries it can only survive if there were always people who valued it enough to copy it again and then a few more copies and then they got damaged and burnt and then maybe one copy survived and then some other people saw how valuable it is they could sense the there was something something transforming transformative in it and so they copied it again so books such as the Tao Te Ching or the Bhagavad Gita they met one of my favorite books the meditations by Marcus Aurelius two thousand years old somehow they survived even the dark 80s when almost nobody could read and write except a few monks in monasteries and they kept it alive but our the main purpose is not to produce necessarily produce some great thing or have some great insight that may come as an addition the main purpose is to bring this state of consciousness into into your life and then

whatever happens through it happens it's a question about personal and romantic love if one is in the surrendered state of consciousness can they i've heard teachings from my own experience and from just reading with romantic love there can be i need you behavioral expectations and then there's like the selfless kind of love where there are no behavioral expectations and you still love the person my question is if you're in the surrendered state of consciousness if you're if you're completely surrendered to what is do you still have that kind of selfless love for a specific person romantically or does that kind of dissolve or do is it just only the universal which is wonderful the universal love it's amazing it's wow you know but can you also have that specific kind of love for okay thank you

so the question you're basically asking would you then love everybody equally so there would not be one person singled out as special as the course in miracles calls it special relationship which of course america says of course it's of the ego to single one out as special now if you single one out as special and you what you see in the other is the form only and you're attached to the form which doesn't doesn't just mean the physical form of course that's an important part of it because there is part of the sexuality and all that which is part of the attraction but it includes also includes the psychological form of the other who you think that person is their psychological makeup how they behave and speak and act that is also form that's a psychological form and there can be strong attachment to those aspects both the physical come together with the psychological which includes also emotions there's an emotional link also there and those coming when they all come together you fall in love and aptly it's called fall because it's a fall in consciousness but but that's okay if that's what you experience and that life wants you to experience that it's part of your learning that fall in consciousness now it's not immediately of course experienced as a fall it's experienced as a high and only afterwards do you realize oh that was a fall and afterwards can be after a year it can be after three months it can be after the honeymoon it can be soon after you move in together and so and then the suffering starts what before was the love now becomes the suffering and then for a while it can happen that you fluctuate for the next year or two or three between still feeling the love and and the suffering and then usually it comes to an end after a while or you you compromise and for some other reason stay together so that's the now if you are able to feel in the other well first of all in yourself and that which is beyond form the essence the stillness the presence whatever we want to call it and by by sensing it in yourself and being it then you recognize it in another and that recognition that in this in the space of stillness is true love which doesn't need the other because the other only reflects to you who you are but even there it can happen that the form of the other because you are not just the formless temporarily you're also the form temporarily you are either a man or a woman temporarily you have this body and this form this man or this woman and this body and the emotional field may find a certain resonance with on different levels be it sexual emotional psychological levels a certain resonance with the other form and that resonance that is what in the unenlightened romantic love makes up the entire relationship but now when you are when you know who you are in your essence all those factors are still there but they do not make up the entire relationship beyond the resonance between the sexual or emotional or physical resonance there is a deeper level present so you can go through the motions of romantic love with the transcendent level also present in yourself and recognizing it in the other so romantic love may after a while of course for the relationship to be truly deep in any relationship some transcendent element has to be there because it's never it's not going to last otherwise it doesn't mean necessarily that people need to be totally awake already totally awake knowing who they are but some element of the formless must be there eventually in the relationship for the relationship to survive and be a true relationship otherwise all you have left in the relationship is your judgments about the other and physical attraction and just mind emotional and that's ultimately it's not enough it's not enough the added element the transcendent element needs to be there and if the transcendent is there you can be quite content even without the romantic relationship you no longer say i need that and it's when it's there it's beautiful but you don't need that yeah pull so the the mind it is often in relationships the mind prevents the deeper level the transcendent level from arising in the relationship so the mind destroys the relationship identification with the story in the mind which you is about yourself and the other obscures love it might even say love well it's no such thing as love i read a lovely in a novel last year by a british writer it does mack ewan he's a well-known contemporary writer ian mccune and he wrote this book about it's called on chesil beach it's about two young people falling in love in england in the 50s and these two young people they feel this the pole towards each other and they begin to fall in love and but sexually they are completely repressed and very fearful about they haven't it's in the 50s so the sixth revolution hasn't happened yet about sex so they're but they're both extremely fearful about that and then they they get married and their first night they stay in a bed and breakfast on on near chesil beach in the south of england and they're they're trying to have sex for the first time and it's a disaster dread dreadful disaster and and she she is so shocked she runs out of the room to the beach oh they don't realize it's actually quite funny i don't explain what disaster you can probably imagine it the so she runs out and the next day so they don't see each other that night that's their honeymoon their their wedding night and the next day he tries he goes to the beach chesil beach and she sees she's walking on the beach they start talking to each other and both feel still the pole is still there but both their minds are bringing up stories why it's no longer why it's not possible it's dreadful they are projecting things onto the other what she's and so the the pull is there but they're all they both create stories in their minds that cuts them off from the other and they separate and then they spend the rest of their lives doing other things the rest of their lives in the no risk is compressed to five or six pages and that shows how how destructive the mind can be of true relationship how the mind imposes interpretations on the other total fictions but there's so much as don miguel ruiz would say there's so much faith in these fictions that they there's it's an impossibility for the human being to see what the mind is creating is a fictitious judgment on that that creates a barrier between yourself and the other this writer is not spiritual at all he just observed human nature and he presented it and and that is the ultimate lesson is spiritual thank you very much the good practice is not always to feel you have to fill up the present moment with something but in actually enjoy a present moment that is not filled up with anything by filling up i mean external activity or internal activity so both are kind of filling up the present moment and on the external as we mentioned before of course you have all the devices that humans have invented to help you fill up the present moment to make it easier not to have any space whatsoever uh so whether it's your television or radio or cell phone or text messages or emails or facebook or twitter or the old-fashioned magazine that you consume weekly magazine gossip or maybe a little bit more elevated and you can there's a when you do it you can sense the addictive nature of needing to fill up your inner space it's an automatic thing and people are actually afraid of the to have a moment they're afraid of having this a moment that's not filled up then they feel there's something very wrong and they might interpret this as some people even feel anxiety i should be doing something or thinking something or something wrong or they may feel unbearable boredom even after two minutes not doing anything or they have something in the head a mind form that says you should be doing something how dare you just sit there oh there's so much to do come on do something somebody beating you up in the head you lazy so-and-so but you're missing out on something very precious and very vital and that is experience the depths of life rather than the continuous horizontal extension of life and you don't have to overdo it just become make it a habit from time to time to enjoy the spaciousness of the present moment and everything at this moment just is the way it is and you come to an acceptance and then the compulsive need to fill it up with something may subside for a moment and then there comes perhaps for some people a moment of unfamiliarity with having the space now then you accept that then it's actually quite pleasant this moment you might occasional thoughts may come in but they're no longer occupying your entire space and then you this is the first step of appreciating what's around you which is a manifestation of life also and if you're in the mind you would call it uninteresting everyday things are happening around me but if you don't interpret you might see that there's a certain aliveness and beauty in everything so the appreciation comes can only come there thankfulness is a term often used in spirituality in new age especially and of course it's important but the real thankfulness isn't through words although a word can point you to it you could say thank you for this moment and don't wait for some spectacular moment because they're not that many they'd come when you say finally thank you for this moment some people think something spectacular has to come along you have to stand on the mountaintop oh i've made it thank you for this moment but it doesn't last that you can't stay on the top for too long you have to come down and then you have to look for another one some people look for a wedding or something like that it's a great thing but that doesn't last that long either preparations can go on for months and months and it's all exciting and building up towards it and finally it happens and if you're lucky it doesn't get spoiled by something by relatives getting drunk or pouring pouring with rain or whatever could happen but then it's over and then ordinary life starts with one ordinary moment after another and if you then become dissatisfied because you can't appreciate the ordinary moment and why can't you appreciate the ordinary moment because you're not going deep enough into it you're not allowing yourself to settle into it a danger when you come to the moment of settling into the present moment and you're not used to it in order to stay there and it doesn't matter how long one two minutes of being feeling comfortable in the now is fine it's a good start one minute or you can start with half a minute of just ah if your mind comes in and says something it's not necessarily true and says you can't afford to just sit here and do nothing well i think anybody can afford to sit for one or two minutes and do nothing if the mind tells you you can't it's not true there might be an emergency situation that's a different matter but i often tell people when you get into your car why immediately go into automatic mode but give it use the opportunity when you shut the door to have 30 seconds or so and you don't have to count the seconds because then you're filling up the present moment again 30 seconds or so of just spacious being and you look out of the window whatever you see there feel yourself breathing and you for a moment you break the momentum of the mind that otherwise pulls you along so you shut the door and you go 30 seconds unless there's a real emergency 30 seconds don't really make much difference although if you believe the mind you will believe that you can't afford 30 seconds it's too much to do there's a dimension in you a dimension of consciousness one could say where ultimately these artificial divisions of reality that we call minutes and hours and days weeks months and years well these things don't really matter anymore there's a dimension where that's not relevant including how old you are and unless you find that dimension which we could call the inner spaciousness stillness presence awareness whatever term or pointer works best for you of course as you know the word isn't it unless you find that dimension and it's there in your daily life consciously then the new year just be another one more thing same thing as before basically more of the same happy one day unhappy the next if you're lucky or even more unhappy than happy for some people mostly unhappy except when they're getting too tired to be unhappy or i've taken a few drinks now some people especially spiritual seekers believe that at some point they are going to realize that dimension sometimes this is called self-realization or awakening or enlightenment they think they can at some point hopefully come to that self-realization and there are many spiritual seekers who have been seekers for a long time who are getting quite frustrated because they haven't found it yet despite the search and there are some people listening to this watching this who may be getting quite frustrated and saying so when do we start meditating and they have missed the most essential dimension here which is a space of stillness in between and underneath the words that's the dimension where the year or how old you are or what your life situation is doesn't matter anymore not relevant and the moment you notice that here in addition to what you see and hear the words and the image on the screen there's also dimension of stillness the moment you realize that there it is inside of you you can't realize that notice let's say notice an even simpler word realize still sounds a little bit complex but notice can you notice that they are the words and what you hear and see there's something that you don't hear and see that's even more vital this is why we call this a meditation because as i speak to you that dimension is there the words come out of that stillness that is one could say is in me but the moment you notice that it's also arising in you because if it were not arising in you you wouldn't be able to notice it because only the stillness in you can notice that same dimension in another or around you so instead of waiting for one day when you're going to be self-realized or enlightened why not notice pay attention to that dimension and this is a good opportunity here and now but it's always there in your daily life it's easier here to notice it but you're just training here in this protected space but wherever you are you can notice that in addition to whatever your life consists of which comes down always no matter what what's going on in your life it always comes down to sense perceptions thoughts and emotions and the mixture of how these things arise vary from person to person so every person has his or her life situation sometimes good sometimes not so good but there's always another dimension there but most humans overlook it continuously this is why we're here to realize that the immediacy of self-realization how close it is to you and you don't have to wait for some day when you're going to be realized that's an idea in the mind that is a huge obstacle notice whatever is going on in your life what i call your life situation whatever it is it's sense perceptions thoughts and emotions but there's always something else and you overlook it as i said you overlook it because sense perceptions thoughts and emotions have cast a hypnotic spell upon you one spiritual teacher called dole goldsmith had the expression for that the universal hypnotism i think he called it and so that is the most powerful for contemporary humans the most powerful hypnotic spell out of these three sense perceptions thoughts emotions i would say is thoughts and you could even reduce those three that i just mentioned sense perceptions thoughts emotions to one because ultimately what are sense perceptions thoughts and emotions other than forms that arise in your consciousness it all arises in your consciousness or in consciousness in that vast space or that the light of consciousness that is formless you can't say there it is or i have it so when you notice the stillness in between and underneath the words that you're listening to now then you are listening to the words and noticing at the same time a stillness that is the transcendent dimension and that is self-realization but really we only we it doesn't mean that you are i wouldn't say that you are self-realized to say a person is self-realized would imply that he or she lives continuously knowing that dimension in every situation but it always starts it's here and now this is the where the possibility opens up not at some future point and this dimension is what in the buddhists i if i remember correctly sometimes call it the other shore the other shore like a river you're crossing the river to the other shore and there's the scripture i believe i remember correctly it says gatte gatte paragate gone gone to the farthest shore or to the other shore describing the inner shift from being identified continuously with all the forms that continuously arise in consciousness hypnotized by them hypnotized by every thought that arises and follow it wherever it takes you and then another thought comes and look at me i'm so important this you need to think about more from this now oh oh this is hypnotized so most humans are hypnotized by their own minds or by the ultimately it's the human mind the collective mind sleepwalking another word dreaming another word all describes the same state whatever you want to call it sleepwalking hypnotized dreaming because nobody has told them that that there is another dimension there and all they have to do is pay attention and notice it isn't it strange that that basically is still unknown despite this old scriptures that point to it in various um traditions but it's not that unknown anymore because more and more people are beginning to realize the truth of it in their own lives in themselves please i've been looking for so long i only have a few more years to live still haven't found it and i say the looking is it asking is the ability to ask is wonderful um please thank you the um because if they if you're truly asking there is as you there's a space of openness if you're truly asking you you voluntarily enter the state of not knowing so and this is a wonderful ability to ask whatever it is so that you become a space you can ask a person something you can ask the universe something and but there needs to be the receptivity if you can ask any kinds of questions but the question needs to be the question needs to come out of the spaciousness of which is there when you truly ask there are many people who ask questions and there's not the openness to receive the answer and that is not true asking but to put yourself in this basically it's connected with the state of not knowing so that you can and that's the part of the state of awareness is that you're an aspect of it is that you're in that state of not knowing conceptually so there is a there's nothing more beautiful than asking a question and if it's directed to other human beings then people love to be asked true questions and they can feel whether there is an openness there or whether you have certain expectations as far as the answer is concerned so that in itself is a spiritual great spiritual practice to ask of course there are certain questions that do not require an answer not all answers are necessarily conceptual answers they may when there's this the non-conceptual space the answer may come as an intuition as a realization that you may not yet before be able to formulate conceptually you just suddenly know but you can't explain what it is that you know and that certainly applies to your sense of who you are which is you suddenly there's a deep knowing inside yourself perhaps because you asked yourself the question who am i and that's a beautiful question it creates the openness and the and then you start to investigate your attention arises who have we talked about that before but this is here relevant in this context you ask who am i question mark and there is a kind of looking but it's not looking visually there is a kind of searching there is the attention arises right now the attention arises who am i and it's looking and suddenly it realizes what you're looking for is in the looking or in other words you are what you're looking for the very looking the very question which becomes a non-conceptual question is the answer so when you ask who am i there's just a silent presence which is that you're looking for the answer and then suddenly you realize that presence that arises the alertness that is there looking is it so the search and the object of the search become a one so if you're looking for yourself the looking is yourself that's wonderful so that is the ultimate secret i'm glad i got a chance to say it before the end of the retreat and that is just it's miraculous thank you so people sometimes come to me please help me find god or please help me find myself or please help me find the place where i and god merge please find help me find my place where i know myself as the source as an expression of the i'm looking for god and i've had some people have been looking desperately for 30 40 years looking please help me they say please i've been looking for so long i only have a few more years to live still haven't found it and i say the looking is it haha it's always been there in the in the consciousness that you called looking you are it oh some got it some didn't get it and they're still looking not knowing that they already found it a positive thought is much less likely to become obsessive some that you can't get rid of than a negative thought well the first thing i think that would anybody would probably say it's more pleasant to have nice thoughts than negative thoughts it feels better certainly the body likes it more too because negative thoughts you use the negative to influence the body in some way obstructing the energy flow you can test it out for yourself when you feel stressed or got into repetitive negative thoughts then your body doesn't like it it reacts even mainstream medicine is discovering there is a link between well some still say no but there is a link between your predominant state of mind or consciousness and the physical functioning not that now you may also find that negative thoughts proliferate and multiply much more readily than positive thoughts the negative thought wants to proliferate and it wants and it wants to produce more negative thoughts so and then you may find a positive thought is quite happy to stand alone there isn't the the pull towards proliferation of more more of itself a positive thought is much less likely to become obsessive some that you can't get rid of than a negative thought so when you are trapped in the mind it's very rare if ever happens that you are trapped in obsessive good thoughts you are usually trapped in obsessive negative thoughts because that is what negative thoughts love to do it love they love to take you over they want to for some reason they're like certain insects that suddenly reproduce and become from one you get they give birth to 50 and the 50 give birth to another 50 and suddenly you have millions and billions of them and so the difference a fundamental difference then is a negative thought is actually first makes you feel better is easier to experience that which follows the thought because often after negative thought you just experience the reality of what the thought just pointed to life is beautiful the person here mentions as an example of a of a positive thought life is beautiful what's wrong with that thought because after that thought you're actually going to have a certain experience of life being beautiful so the thought was no more than a pointer a sign post and that's perfectly fine you use thought as a pointer it does not absorb all your attention as a thought it's quite happy to be just a pointer life is beautiful and then perhaps for the next few minutes you appreciate everything that is around you and it becomes a true experience so as a pointer it can work beautifully and the negative one is just one and after another after another it becomes obsessive so but even if you change all your thinking from negative to positive if the most vital thing is to realize that which is beyond all thought positive thought in itself is not yet liberating it doesn't liberate you can be nice but it doesn't liberate you only to find the place that is beyond all thought liberates you now does that free you from negative thoughts yes after a while your the negative thoughts need your identification which means your unconsciousness in order to proliferate continuously in your life it's only if you identified with them you give them your total attention in fact it's not only that you become them they come out of your mouth when you speak they're in your thoughts they take you over they possess you you become them and that's how they continue to grow and grow and take over your life and it can happen some thoughts or thought patterns have the same function in the human mind in many cases as a virus has in the body a virus can proliferate and takes over the body and so there are many mental viruses that people get taken over by and can't get rid of sometimes you have that virus the whole lifetime persistent deep-seated negative thoughts that occupy either your entire mind or a particular section of your mind and sometimes the virus that can take over can take over collectively an entire collective entity of human beings be it a nation or a tribe or a religion or a section within a religion it can be a political movement that suddenly has all the answers and knows who where the enemies are it happened when national socialism in germany was an infection of a collective mental virus soviet communism which started of course with good intentions but of course no that had been absolutely no change in consciousness so good intentions are not enough unless there's a shift in consciousness good intentions will lead you to more suffering if there's no shift in consciousness soviet communism became an awful thing and it took over as again a collective mental virus china under Mao Zedong a collective mental virus millions and millions died in china in the soviet commission obviously nazi germany millions and millions in under Mao Zedong children would denounce their parents if they child was unhappy with their parents they would go to somebody at school and say my parents are saying this and that the next day they would be taken away to a labor camp and never be seen again total insanity so a collective flowers were declared illegal they had to tear out all the flowers bourgeois infection we don't want flowers and many just countless things being taken over by a mental an entire nation being taken over by a mental obsessed with certain mind forms and then it passes it doesn't it it lasted can last a couple of decades in soviet communism lasted fairly long national socialism the 1000 year rise lasted i can't don't know 15 years or something so it it runs its course and then like a virus infection after a while the virus disappears it's and a semblance of sanity returns certainly sanity compared to what was there before there's still there's still the normal insanity that's part of the normal state of consciousness but not the extreme unconsciousness that can take over when thought form becomes a virus and of course it happens to individuals they have then they interpret the world through their mental virus you might have certain ideas if you go on the internet too much and you you might see things that suddenly put the trans the the virus infection can happen by looking up certain things on the internet and you suddenly believe totally in what this it could be a total fantasy but it looks so convincing that it it becomes a thought form in your mind and then from there it grows and after that you only have contact with those people who are also infected by that thought form and you think that becomes a new reality that is the case with many conspiracy theories now i'm not saying that one out of 10 20 or 50 conspiracy theories may not be correct it could it'll be but many of them are fictitious constructs but of course the world is pretty insane so it's probably more insane than you realize and that includes particularly politicians and political power play and so on so i'm not denying all that absolutely there is no conspiracy there are quite mad things happening that we don't know about and yet i wouldn't go that way even if it's true don't get drawn into that your job is to be present your job is to embody a different state of consciousness you cannot fight unconsciousness on its own level you have to rise above unconsciousness so good thoughts yes good thoughts are preferable to bad thoughts but then go beyond thought also then negative thoughts will lessen in your life even if you've been around for a long time as more presence arises good thoughts can arise naturally and a lot of your consciousness is no longer dependent on what thoughts you have there's just more presence and you appreciate life through presence rather than trying to convince yourself that you should appreciate life you appreciate life directly gratefulness is another important thing gratitude is of course wonderful a very transformative gratitude implies a deep appreciation of what you are perceiving around you whether or not you have the thought in your mind that accompanies that that says thank you it's secondary and after a while you don't need thank you anymore but when you first practice gratitude thankful can be helpful when you say some beautiful thank you for things that otherwise you wouldn't even acknowledge thank you for how this the light reflects off this table thank you for this shiny clock i know it's not real gold but it shines beautifully thank you for this amazing substance that we call water got these little like tiny bubbles in it and here it is i can look at it drink it it's alive it's an amazing thing and you can appreciate it it's it's it's filled with light life giving substance why not appreciate it so and whether or not you say thank you it's up to you it's thank you is not the main the main thing is the the act of giving it attention that again is perceiving it through presence and then everything is something to be valued that's around you so you go and that's wonderful spiritual practice and of course for a while it's a spiritual practice then it becomes second nature that it's how you live so there is some association with certain thoughts yes expressing gratitude but it's not the main thing the thoughts are more like pointers towards that which is beyond thought but in many people's lives the beginning of spiritual practice and realization is that they suddenly realize how much they've been trapped in negative thinking over past years and they suddenly wake up to their own thought processes whereas before they were trapped in their own thought processes that's the beginning of spiritual awakening if you realize what kind of thought processes have been predominant in your life over the past few years on every day through which you interpret other people the world yourself your life and so on and that's an amazing jump because it implies suddenly awareness or presence has emerged my emotions and thoughts are mostly occupied with worry and guilt about my daughter's marriage and children i feel the need to often tell her and her husband how to do things better and bring up their kids better it feels that this destroys my life i mentioned that kind of thing briefly in new earth i believe that to be a parent is a function an important function for many people it's not only a function they identify with the function of being a parent then it becomes a role that you grow into that it gets hold of you and then you remain a parent because that's become part of your ego function it becomes a role that you cannot get out of and even when your children are already adults might be 30 years old you still are forced to act out the role of parent and that does usually does not have a good effect on the relationship and it is quite possible that you know better or it is possible that you just think that you know better but in either case perhaps yes you have more life experience you've seen more things so why aren't they listening to you because they want to be free so to give to let children go to let go of your identity of parent after you have fulfilled the function of parent and you have to start doing that as when your children reach adolescence gradually you have to let go you have to allow them to make mistakes advice yes up to a certain age you still can impose your will but not for too long but then they reach 16 17 18 if you're still trying to impose your will when they're 18 19 things get problematic so you can still guide diplomatically gently but then realize they will go their own way and they will and must make mistakes yes so that's that can be a significant letting go which requires a certain amount of consciousness if you have been identified with a role of being a parent because that's become part of your the ego identity has a certain inertia to it it does not want to let go of whatever its identity is every psychotherapist knows that patients come to him or clients whatever they're called and there's always a point is reached when the in many cases the patient or client sees the possibility of going beyond certain types of dysfunctional behavior or misery but they are attached to their unhappiness because it's become part of their sense of self and that is often a critical point in therapy and often clients or patients disappear just as they reach the point that there's a possibility of transcending these limitations because the ego feels i need to hang i'm going to lose myself so what you need here is presence so and especially self-observation rather than focusing all your attention on what your children are doing with their children and so on and how what they can do better put at least as much or more attention into the workings of your mind and see how it is associated with not being able to let go of the role of parent so you know and here you say your emotions and thoughts are mostly occupied with worry and guilt about my daughter's marriage and children so it's all even when you're not seeing them you're thinking about it now this is just another example of the uncontrolled use of mind which is not a use of mind you are being used by the egoic mind is there enough awareness in you you have to ask yourself and verify it in your own experience is there enough awareness in you when this happens again you start thinking about her worrying about her they're making mistakes at that moment are you able to know what's that this is what your mind is doing and perhaps in the past that wasn't possible perhaps after this retreat your awareness has grown so the awareness can be there when the mind does its usual thing and then you recognize that actually it serves no useful purpose to worry about this except to keep this identity alive in you you're not helping them by boring and you're probably not helping them by giving them advice that they don't want so to recognize the futility of what the mind is doing this this is so futile isn't it that's still a thought but it comes from the awareness that's a true thought the rest are unconscious thoughts you can have true thoughts that arise out of awareness and often those true thoughts have something to say about the unconscious thoughts say this is so crazy do i want to do this for the rest of my life i'd rather not think these thoughts anymore and therefore i will put my attention on the fact that i'm breathing and i'll put my attention on looking at the sky and be in the present moment and then a few minutes later you you will find the thoughts trying to creep in again and they want your attention one little thought comes come this way and you watch that okay i'm not going there again sorry i've had it for years it's had solved no purpose just made me unhappy made my relationship with my daughter unpleasant i don't want it anymore that's thanks but you've been very kind thank you and then you choose to put your attention on something else your inner body the aliveness and preferably present moment and preferably not annihilate yourself by having a few drinks i mean those kind of drinks that annihilate you that doesn't work you don't need that and another way of annihilating your own thoughts is by turning on the tv now you may notice interesting thing when you turn on the tv you're not thinking anymore so one could think that occasional thoughts may come in but you could actually sit there in a trance like state for a whole hour watching whatever is there and even changing channels and you would still be in a trance like state and you can't even get out you know there's nothing because there's always the next channel might have something interesting and even if it's every channel is totally uninteresting there's always what about the next one and you're in a trance like state in which actually you might think oh isn't that good my i'm not thinking anymore but you have fallen below thought and if you if you're actually watching a program a sitcom or whatever it is then you are linking into the thoughts on the screen that people are talking there's drama on the screen you're linking into you're not free of thought you're free of personalized thought but you exchange personalized thought for that kind of thought so that's not the way to go to become free of dysfunctional thinking because that's just another way of falling below thinking so you need to rise above thinking it could be other things that plague you on a daily basis certain types of thoughts that recur that if you look at them clearly fulfill no purpose except to make you unhappy and to strengthen your fictitious sense of identity so yes your psychological function you're not a mother anymore not as it's not your identity but biologically yes you are the mother for this daughter but but your your identity is not being a mother anymore you have to transcend that limited identity you may go to a workshop a new age workshop and say where they teach you i'm happy i'm happy and then you can you can kind of you go i'm really enjoying this but you're not so can you can you at least can you accept i've been a model for 10 years somewhere deep inside i kept hoping for a big break it never came or has yet to come is it time to move on to another job if this job is not making me money it's time to move to another job if this job is not enjoyable anymore if you're unable to enjoy what you're doing then it's time to move to another job but you have to look to see whether your inability to enjoy the job you're doing now has something to do with the particular job you're doing or has more to do with your inability to enjoy the present moment in which case the next job that you find you will also not enjoy so if you can't enjoy your job either one of these is true either there is something for you to change there's something inherently not right anymore with this particular job does no longer corresponds to what to who you are or your state of consciousness or you cannot enjoy your job because you haven't learned yet to be present enough to enjoy what you're doing now and you always think oh the next one is going to be much better and if you don't know which one it is of those two you may have to get another job and then see if you can enjoy that one many jobs that the mind tells you cannot be enjoyed actually can be enjoyed also the mind telling you if you enjoy this job that you do you really don't want this job to be permanent and if the mind tells you no if i enjoy this job i'll be stuck with it for the rest of my life and i don't want to be stuck with it let's say you you got a you got a job working working in a diner as a waiter or waitress but you really want to get your job as an actress or you really want to be a writer you really want to be whatever you want to be a senator successor of donald trump whatever your mind says and so the mind says like i'm not going to enjoy this job because i really want to be somewhere else and if i enjoy it then i'll really be stuck but you may find that the opposite is the case if you it it is freeing to enjoy what you are doing even if it's not something that you would want to do for the rest of your life all you have to do is enjoy the present moment your energy field then shifts and when this energy field energy field shifts you become open to life only if you no longer resist life you cannot be open to life the greater consciousness coming through you if you resist life and you resist life if you resist or resent the present moment that's where life is so the shift happens you need to be in the state of alignment with the present moment no matter what activity you are doing in the present moment and if you absolutely cannot be in alignment with the present moment you need to walk out so if i got a job as a bartender in a disco i would i would walk out i could surrender if they shut me in there and it's impossible for me to leave the building i would still surrender but since there is still a door that is i can open i would walk out because although i know how to surrender i wouldn't want to surrender there if i can help it so when we use the expression to enjoy what you do we get this little word joy here again enjoy to enjoy what is the english language to enjoy what you do so when you enjoy what you do joy arises from within and i would say it's not the doing it looks as if what you do perhaps gave you joy but it's really your presence in the doing that allows the joy to to come from within you and then it flows into what you do so rather than the doing giving you joy because you are present in the doing the joy arises from within and it flows into what you do and so you can say i enjoy this work i enjoy doing this now if you cannot enjoy it try first just to accept it then this is what you're doing in this moment let's say you start off with you're working at dennis or you're not from the united states um dennis is a chain of diners throughout the states not bad okay often there's nothing else if you're driving along you work at let's say you'd work and you absolutely are resistance you don't really want to be there but you have to earn money you are a graduate let's imagine you're a graduate you look you've applied for jobs but because of the recession you can't get any jobs and you've had 50 rejections and you're getting frustrated and here you are stuck in this menial job what did i study for all those those years all for nothing all these thoughts go through your head while you're serving people okay and then you come into contact with the spiritual teaching or this teaching that points to the possibility of enjoying what you do and you say i i can't enjoy that okay then try something else can you at least accept that right now this is what you do don't try to get yourself to enjoy it it might become unnatural you might you might play a role to yourself you may go to a workshop a new age workshop and say where they teach you i'm happy i'm happy and then you can you can kind of you go i'm really enjoying this but you're not so can you can you at least can you accept that this is what you're doing right now not for the rest of your life not even perhaps for the whole year who knows but just right now this is all there is right now so i might as well accept that this is what i'm doing right now can you accept it you can't enjoy it okay i can try that feels already better feels much better and sometimes from there before you know it there is no clear dividing line between acceptance and enjoyment somewhere they merge so if you begin with acceptance you may find suddenly there's even some enjoyment there acceptance just means there is an absence of resistance you're just well that's what is and that can sometimes take you suddenly before you know it there's an enjoyment that arises oh so if you think you can't enjoy don't force yourself to enjoy that doesn't work except that's all first this is what is right now i talked about that in the new earth where i had three modalities it's just come back to you i haven't read the book in a long time three modalities of doing you can have acceptance you can have enjoyment or the most intense is then this is usually when there's a creative process happening through you i call it enthusiasm enthusiasm is an intense intense energy stream that flows is part of creativity and so if you are in order to live consciously and sanely you have to be in either one of these three modalities if you're neither in acceptance nor enjoyment nor enthusiasm you are somewhere in dysfunction and you're creating unhappiness and suffering for yourself and that usually implies you're also creating suffering for others because unhappy humans make others unhappy too so if you cannot accept enjoy or be in enthusiasm remove yourself remove yourself and then try again somewhere else but acceptance in a way is the most accessible of course to just try that just one one comment uh uh for the benefit of everybody is that uh in the indian custom today is the day of the full moon and and on that day consciousness is enlivened the most and a lot of knowledge and energy and bliss comes from the guru so you're our guru today so we want to thank you for sharing that enlivened consciousness with us so that's one comment and i had one question and that is that uh uh in order to maintain the unity and the diversity all the time uh would it be advisable to cut down activity and make your life a lot more simple with less belongings because according to nisargadatta one of the things he comments is that you should give up pretty much everything in life and maintain as little as possible and your sole purpose in life should be just enlivenment of your own self and consciousness okay thank you thank you

of course it's true that many people have many superfluous things they're not only concerned with innumerable things that are ultimately superfluous they also try to accumulate more and more things that are ultimately superfluous but the liberation does not lie in whether or not you have things but it's more important what is your inner relationship to what you have talking for a moment about things that you possess or acquire another aspect of your question of course is things that you do activities that you are engaged in we have the two aspects of as far as activities are concerned many people in this our civilization are hyperactive they are continuously active they are stressed almost continuously they're pursuing one thing after another and then they never arrive there's always the next thing to do and the next thing and then the hurry with everything that's the stress disease of our civilization and that's a form of madness that has to be relinquished because it's an insane way to live now people might say well i'm going to lose my job if i'm not if i'm not stressed and or if i don't do what i'm supposed to do and i cannot do what i'm supposed to do without stress because there's always deadlines one deadline after another another aspect of living in our civilization is that you get continuous deadlines for obscure reasons publishers say the book has to be out by such and such a date what why does it have to be out by such and such a day can't you wait until the book is mature and complete no no we have all the things i don't know what the justifications are but they always say it has to be out you need to hurry it's insane and so many things that our civilization produces are rushed rushed jobs one could say very rushed they're not fully matured decisions are taken before they even know fully whether that is all the facts that involve the decision they did on tv executives they put on a show and then they look at the what are the audience number the numbers and if it's not kind of no take it off take it off if they'd given it a chance it might have developed into something great or employees companies not doing well okay we have to sack a thousand people do it now but no there's no no spaciousness at all there's only rushed decision making all insane so to bring not to be part of that is essential your state of consciousness you need to it's not easy living in this world to say i'm not going to live in this way i will do what is required of me but i won't be part of the madness i'll do what i can i'll do it as well as i can but i'm not going to live the rest of my life in a state of stress you just give attention to whatever it is you're doing now and see if you can do it well not looking to the fruit of the action do it now reducing unnecessary activities but more important than that is reducing the unnecessary mind activity because really that's where the whole thing originates because the mind is becoming more and more active what is being projected is external activity so a hyperactive mind produces a hyperactive life what's the next thought what's the next thing really what's the next thought about what i have to do and the next thought and so you're rushing after one thought after another trying to capture this and this and this so it goes back to the mind so it needs to be tackled on the inner level primarily rather than the outer if you do not come to grips with or bring awareness to your hyperactive mind there isn't that much you can do on the outer level because you will continuously be driven by the hyperactive mind into all kinds of activities many of them quite useless even useless even even people who have jobs hyper they're still doing many things that are quite unnecessary superfluous just hyperactive can't stop doing you have to stop doing you inability to just be so reducing the hyperactive mind slowing that down is of the essence that's the most important part of it and then that will then manifest in your active life so that they will the hyperactivity will not be there you will be actually more effective in what you do but you do fewer things but you do them better than countless things half done because you're always not not enough time to really do it well of course that's all mind mind and that's the dilemma is our whole civilization is in that dysfunctional state so to take yourself out of the dysfunctional state so to speak not not physically but internally is not easy it's a sort it's a challenge because you're surrounded by a certain state of consciousness the collective consciousness that you move in so it's your job to be awake enough so that you gain don't get drawn into that state of consciousness which really should be called state of unconsciousness the collective so that some sanity comes into this world through you and so that's the reduction of activity begins with the reduction of thought in your hyperactive mind and then automatically then that will flow into reduction of activity now we come to the second part that's to do with things or acquiring things as some people recommend you should get rid of as many things as possible in your life now i'm speaking as somebody who has relatively few things although i have more things now than i ever had before in my life and that's strange because usually it goes the other way when as you get older you gradually let go but life has so strange that now i have more material possessions although not vast amount but more than before i don't feel particularly attached to any one thing in other words if it disappeared it would be okay that's fine so it's not and i believe not everybody it's not for everybody to let go of things on the physical level it's not even necessary you need to examine what your inner relationship to the things that surround you is whether there is an identification with possessions or whether you simply appreciate something beautiful that is in your life without the attachment to it or the it giving you as an enhanced sense of self as it often is the case and you need to see whether you are whether there's some kind of acquisitive tendency in you that propels you to buy or acquire more and more and more or whether you're simply just happy with what is already there and simply appreciate what's there or do you compulsively go to the shopping malls every weekend and look for something to buy to fill up this emptiness you feel inside and just the action of buying something confirms that you are somebody to the ego it feels there's nothing wrong with buying you can buy something beautiful but not as an addictive thing as a compulsive thing so it's finding a right relationship with the external world not an addictive relationship but a free relationship the appreciation of nice things is it is not not something that is non-spiritual it's actually spiritual to appreciate nice things whether you call the nice things mine or whether it's not yours for me sometimes it's enough well not anymore when i lived in london i would sometimes walk around the streets and look in shop windows and love in regent street or bond street and look at the nice things in the windows and wow that's beautiful i neither had the money nor the desire to buy these things but i loved i loved it now if i had had the money i might have bought an occasional thing so it would be nice to have that at home and look at it and feel its presence perhaps it was made with attention and care why not appreciate beautiful things the attachment is what keeps you unconscious so i happen to know your home and i know that you are surrounded by beautiful things so uh and i also believe that although you are surrounded by beautiful things you're you you don't have a enormous attachment to those things i can sense that there's a certain spaciousness there between you and that there's a simple appreciation of it and that is fine now if the time comes in your life where you feel from within the urge comes to leave even that behind although you may not be attached but you at some point in your life it is possible that you may feel now i want to live in totally simple surroundings i just want to not have things anymore at all that's if it comes that's fine and then you will take action you might remove yourself or you might give away all the beautiful things that fill up your house and just be in the empty relatively empty space who knows if that comes to you at some point that's fine too but primarily really is what your inner relationship is to the outer and so i'm right now i'm using certain concepts as signposts towards presence but you may notice especially if and many of you are already going through this awakening process you may notice in a way that you cannot explain as i mentioned these words there is a kind of recognition in you of what i'm talking about but you would not be able to perhaps explain it because as i talk about presence as a state of consciousness as i talk about it there's not only the words which are signposts that are pointing towards it but there's also underlying the words and in between the words there is already that state of presence and this is then the hidden dimension of our gathering here the hidden dimension of this gathering is deeper than words and this is why sometimes i slow down a bit it just happens so that you don't attach excessive importance or give excessive attention to the words they are helpful but don't be like somebody who collects signposts and has a wonderful collection let's say the signposts say rome or mecca and they point that way and say oh this is a beautiful signpost i'm going to keep this and talk about it then after a while you confuse the signpost with the destination so you don't become a collector of signposts because then you become intellectually very knowledgeable perhaps about spirituality but you're like the proverbial person who writes a phd about honey without ever having tasted honey so there is a there is a knowing the possibility in you of accessing and knowing that is non-conceptual and this is completely overlooked in our civilization almost completely because our civilization encourages the ability even already in young children to conceptualize and to to analyze and to think and be the teacher asked a question and the best students according to the educational system are those that immediately go huh i know that's that's it and then you begin to mistake names for the deeper reality of things it starts with something like when the child learns language and the child asks the parent what's that the child is looking at a big something doesn't know yet what it is what's that and the dad or mom says that's an oak tree oh oak tree okay thanks dad and from then on whenever the child looks at that kind of tree he says oh that's an oak tree and you confuse the naming with what it is in many many cases when when you think you know it's only the illusion of knowledge because you've attached labels to things and the moment the mind attaches a label to a thing the mind says oh now i know dad how do birds find their way when they migrate every year from here to south america and how do they find their way back to their nesting grounds the following year how is that possible dad please tell me and the dad says oh that's easy instinct oh okay you've attached a label now you think you know how it works oh it's by instinct they find then the exam comes and right by instinct that birds find oh great we give it an a plus so part of this awakening of consciousness is to realize that there is a whole hidden until now or until recently there is a whole dimension of consciousness in you that you had been unaware of that you had always overlooked the whole dimension that actually our whole civilization is continuously encouraging you to overlook just don't look there and there are many ways in which we can approach talking about it but more importantly of course we are here to deepen our experience of that dimension and that dimension of consciousness which in spiritual traditions all the ancient teachers have pointed to it using different kinds of signposts which of course the collectors of signposts say no this signpost is totally different from that one look they're totally different writing on it and let's analyze it even more not realizing they point exactly the same way so the ancient teachings and teachers have spoken about it in various ways whether they talk about liberation awakening salvation or the buddha in negative terms the the end of suffering or another term the buddha used is emptiness which is not very inspiring as you might have noticed but it's very deep if the buddha says emptiness he's giving you a signpost that is very hard to to take and say i believe in this signpost because it's a negative term but he's pointing to a certain state of consciousness is pointing to a certain realization and he calls it emptiness very wise because this discourages people from worshiping the signpost you can worship the kingdom of heaven it's the term that jesus used by the way they talk about exactly the same thing as you'll see in about two minutes they talk about exactly the same thing but the buddha's one of the key terms in buddhism is sunyata which means empty translated as emptiness that's an interesting choice of signposts because you cannot worship or make an idol out of emptiness but you can make an idol out of the kingdom of heaven because then you can say or where is it it is somewhere probably up there and when am i going to get there so you create space and time and then the kingdom of heaven a certain location and you can you can even be becomes part of your your thought structure and you begin to worship the kingdom of heaven not realizing that it's a signpost so emptiness the buddhist term emptiness is closely related to the kingdom of heaven of jesus in churches you they won't explain it to you of course it's it's closely related my translation of emptiness is spaciousness and my translation of the kingdom of heaven is kingdom in modern terminology is dimension heaven is the vastness of the sky this vastness of the sky the sky stands for spaciousness the dimension of spaciousness is the kingdom of heaven which is buddha's emptiness or spaciousness same same thing or the same no thing and what is this thing what is this dimension of spaciousness it is a dimension within you it is a dimension of consciousness that is possible for humans to access although in most humans it only exists in seed form as a potential not that many humans have actually even began to realize that that dimension exists in them except you and that's why you're here but that is the look that also you can practice it is the look that where you're not a person you're just a presence i've been looking at this folder it has questions in it people submit lots of questions so i will answer perhaps a few and from tomorrow we are open or i am open to receiving questions from you that arise spontaneously or that you've kept at the back of your mind for a long time wanting to ask and it still hasn't dissolved it's beautiful by the way if a question dissolves that you've had which means well you could still ask it but it's no longer of vital importance sometime in the 1930s a british writer went to india i believe his name was paul brunton he went to india to visit the living masters and interview them and then write a book about them and he did and one of the masters he visited was ramana maharshi at the time not known in the west at all and to limit only to a limited extent in india and so when he went in to see ramana maharshi with his list a long list of questions for his book and ramana maharshi just looked at him there are some photos around with ramana maharshi looking at you especially one that's very beautiful and so he just looks you can feel when he looks even on that photo he's not thinking whatsoever there's no thought whatsoever in his mind there's just spaciousness but but it's not not a look of a zombie it's it's presence spacious presence well you can have that now please just there's nobody there looking there's just consciousness nobody in particular just consciousness so it's not not a person looking and that's uh that's the energy transmission also happens in the way it cannot happen when a person is looking at you because that means the looking happens through the veil of conditioning that is the person mental emotional conditioning but here the looking is come straight from the depths of consciousness unconditioned consciousness so it's just the light looking so paul brunton came to see me into ramana maharshi's room and he just ramana hashi just looked at him and suddenly paul brunton had no no longer any desire to ask his questions and they sat in silence together for 20 minutes or 30 minutes i don't remember and then paul brunton thanked him and left the room that was the interview this happened again a few years later the famous british author somerset maugham visited india and he had probably read paul brunton's book that in the meantime had been published where he wrote very favorably about ramana maharshi who was the one teacher that impressed him most so somerset maugham came to experience the presence of this master probably to write about him because whatever somerset maugham did and whoever he met he would write about them later he continuously was collecting notes about making notes about people and just before ramana maharshi came into his room it was so hot there he fainted and they not sorry not ramana hashi somerset maugham fainted they carried him into a room to put him on a bed there to regain consciousness and then they told ramana mahashi there's a famous british author who came to see you but he fainted and ramana mahashi said okay i'll go to where he is and when somerset maugham opened his eyes there was ramana mahashi sitting looking at him uh and again or no words were spoken except i remember correctly they looked at each other and then ramana mahashi said something like silence is the best speech and that was about it that was the meeting of the famous british author with the spiritual master and of course yes he did write a book and ramana mahashi appears as a character in that book and although he doesn't of course under a different name as a master and if you're interested the book is called the razor's edge the novel but that is the look that also you can practice it is the look that where you're not a person you're just a presence and when you look at a tree or the sky or a flower or another person if that's not too difficult if you look at them and there's no mind activity just just an underlying presence as the backdrop so to speak to your sense perception then at that moment you're not a person looking at the world you are consciousness looking ultimately at itself its own creations because everything is an is consciousness that has taken a particular form a temporary form there's only the one underlying all forms and in that looking there's not only the absence of the person there is also the presence of presence and that means whatever you are looking at you sense something that is deeper than the surface appearance of that thing that you are looking at in the case of a plant or a flower yes there is the surface beauty of the flower or the plant but there is also something that the eye cannot see and there is a beautiful quote that is by belief from a book called I think the little prince Saint-Exupéry said the author and there's a quote it says what is essential is invisible to the eye but what is essential is invisible to the eye the eye this eye uh this does not only refer to the visual sense it also refers to all the other senses so what is essential the essence of things of human beings of yourself of a tree of a dog the essence of the thing is you cannot see or perceive with the senses so if you only perceive through the conditioned mind as the person then all you ever see or perceive with the other senses is the surface never the essence of that life form so what is essential is invisible to the eye how can you become aware of that which is beyond the sense perception that the deeper dimension of things which for many humans alive now does not exist and the majority of scientists would probably there are maybe some exceptions but Einstein was an exception but the majority of scientists would probably deny that there is such a thing as a deeper dimension for things but there eventually they will come around if not this generation when this generation is dead the next one will come around so then you look at something at a tree a flower and that presence of presence through which you're looking recognizes something of itself in that which you're looking at and that is the dimension of depths and that is where you feel connected or a better word where you feel a that sense of oneness with that which you are looking at no longer the separation when you're looking through the conditioned mind as a person there's always a sense of separateness there's whatever you're looking at is the other there's always a sense of otherness and that sense of otherness is the absence of love in the deepest sense you cannot love the other in that state of consciousness you can try or you might convince yourself for a while that it's working but it won't last so to sense something deeper with that is within that is the essence of that life form that is that adds a depth to all your perceptions it's no longer a surface reality everything has a depth to it and that depth in traditional spirituality is called sacredness and every human suffers every life form suffers because life is hard and challenging and precarious for every life form from the moment life comes into being life is challenging and precarious for humans for animals for plants every life form encounters obstacles in its attempt to grow and expand and it continuously encounters obstacles to its expansion every human in one form or another if you come into this world very quickly you'll find obstacles seeming obstacles to your expansion and growth and well-being and flowering i think you can all if you think about your so-called life how many obstacles life seems to have put in your path towards happiness and some people perceive life as life continuously is sabotaging my attempts to find happiness why is that and then they have these strange theories that god is against me or whatever the theory is but it does seem like and this is related to the buddhist term dukkha or suffering wherever you go you will find life is sometimes helpful and then obstacles again and all and this is perceived as some people believe if you only practice positive thinking continuously you will no longer encounter obstacles but that unfortunately is not the case positive thinking is a great thing can be extremely helpful and bring about certain shifts in you but it does not free you from experiencing the obstacles that life will put on you in your path and the challenges that come so those obstacles whether they come in the form of loss or illness or relationship problems many of them arise from their own mind because your mind creates an enormous amount of problems that are quite unnecessary but the mind doesn't know that so the mind creates an enormous amount of conflict that is unnecessary in your life that's one kind of obstacle is your own mind then and again you are you need to experience the consequences of the obstacles that your own mind creates the conflicts and the unnecessary problems that your own mind because you identified with the mind creates you need to experience the suffering that you create for yourself out of that unconsciousness of unconsciousness means completely identifying with the mind the egoic mind which in many cases transforms challenges which could be solved easily into much bigger problems so you have the your mind created obstacles that you ultimately create yourself because you're not conscious enough and then you encounter suffering this is one level of suffering and this is you need to experience the suffering that comes through unconscious use of the mind in order to awaken it's only through the suffering that eventually you go can't take anymore as it happened to me when i was in bed one night and said i can't live with myself anymore and it's and then somehow i realized this myself that i couldn't live with anymore was an illusion an illusory entity and very unhappy mind created entity but before i realized that i had to go through this suffering for years and years so the suffering worked it fulfilled its purpose and then you have another level of suffering or obstacles obstacles come to you seemingly from the outside that suddenly you have an accident an illness that's a kind of outside it something seems to happen to you that you have not contributed to something happens somebody close to you dies as an accident many things can happen but you seem i haven't created that of course in new age it's very normal to say when things go wrong in your life the typical new age person will say how did you create that you slipped on a banana skin and broke your leg why did you create that how did you create that it's an interesting question i don't want to go into this whether even those obstacles or challenges that come to you not seemingly not from your own mind but from the outside did you still create that or not let's leave that aside i don't want to convince anybody one way or another i have a much more simple recipe here which goes like this instead of telling people you better look at your life and see why you created that or how you created that i say accept each moment as if you had created it accept each moment as if you had wanted it or caused it wanted it to happen i can't remember my own writings it's always not good to go into memory don't quote just present moment so but if you live whatever happens you accept this moment as if you had chosen that's the one i wrote accept accept each moment as if you had chosen it no that's a good recipe for working because if it already is the case you might as well accept whatever is as if you have chosen it because it's already here so i'm not telling people you chose it maybe you did maybe you didn't doesn't matter it still accept it as if you had chosen it that shifts things that your whole attitude to it shifts and it dissolves more quickly than whatever the obstacle is but let's go back to the suffering the first the suffering that arises from your own mind creates conflict and all those things that create suffering and then at some point you awaken and then what remains is the suffering that comes with having a body for example because eventually the body gets older no matter how much you go to the gym every day no matter how fantastic your nutrition is no matter how many pills for the longer life you take which is all fine and good but of course every form eventually dissolves and the time comes when the body can be perceived as a burden almost the older you get the more likely it is to happen and so of course you might then say old age isn't so bad if you consider the alternative which is you die younger and then you don't have to experience the body getting fragile and old but if you get old the body can become problematic a source of suffering potentially but the those challenges if approached correctly don't have to turn into suffering accept each moment as if you had chosen it if you can go with the isness of things there's no complaining entity that says something about being a victim and complaining how dreadful things are now i wish my mother had learned that lesson when she suffered in that way because she had always identified very much with her body good looking always nicely dressed going out and liked to be looked at very normal thing for many people and then the body got older and older and then hip problems and other fractures and this and got worse and worse and their unhappiness grow and grow not so much of limited movement but the identity that's so much was in the body that those tremendous suffering i tried to free her and occasionally there were moments when she could disidentify from body but very very brief and that is the destiny of many humans but this the suffering is really that every end every life form encounters the obstacles that every life form encounters whether they come in young at a younger age older age middle age in whatever form so these things are absolutely necessary without which there would be no human evolution whatsoever and no life form would ever evolve if the life form did not encounter obstacles so that which looks like an obstacle is actually always potentially an opening potentially it that seems to stop your progress in life always potentially can make you more conscious so you can use every obstacle that arises in your life if you can especially works especially quickly if you accept each moment as if you had chosen it and when it looks this moment is an obstacle you go with it instead of complaining or running away from it and then accept and then act if action is possible or don't act if no action is possible you identify with thinking and the identification with thinking becomes ego and there are many people in this world who are stuck with hostile life denying continuously critical and attacking entities that they carry in their head and they believe that is who they are to become free of ego means becoming free of thought identification with thought that's the end of the ego welcome to our live meditation i'm in denmark today we are only interested in one thing here for our live meditation and that is to sit together not physically together but nevertheless together in presence thinking is not important here as much as possible let go of thinking without any effort and realize that you are more fully yourself when you're not thinking and when you're not thinking you can realize what being is what it means to be and you can sense the being that you are which can be expressed as the first person singular of the verb to be i am so you sense or you are the presence prior to thinking the clear space of presence that's why we're here to be that to realize that we are that i don't think as i sit here the words just come out of the stillness there's no thinking prior to the words and as soon as a word has been uttered there's just presence or stillness so you can join me in that as i don't need to think you don't need to think right now but just be present the great teacher ramana maharshi who taught during the first half of the 20th century in india was once asked by a visitor to his ashram this question how do i know whether i'm making progress on the spiritual path and he said the degree of absence of thought is the only true criterion for your progress on the spiritual path the extent in other words to which you are free of thought in daily life you are still able to use thought whenever it's needed perfectly more efficiently than before more creatively because you have access to the unconditioned intelligence itself which is presence how long you can sit in meditation formal meditation is not a good criterion for progress on the spiritual path but to what extent presence comes into your daily life which initially may just mean little moments of presence in between all the doings of your life little moments of being awareness alertness alert stillness conscious consciously looking at something consciously listening consciously walking across the room consciously washing your hands which does not mean when you walk across the room you're thinking i am now crossing the room or when you look at something i'm now looking at that tree that you're not present yet it can be an intermediate step but the actual presence is when there's no background commentary and when there's virtually no background commentary throughout your life that is the awakened state there may still be fragments of thoughts saying this or that but basically or fundamentally free of the involuntary compulsive background commentary in your daily life that's an enormous evolutionary leap to live like that but you don't need to have that as some aim i want to be totally free just be free of background commentary now it's easier than to say throughout my life i want to be free of that or just do it now renounce unnecessary thinking be present instead then the ego diminishes and eventually cannot survive in you when you are present people have practiced traditionally all kinds of renunciations in spiritual life in christianity and buddhism and hinduism and so on and they're still being practiced in many cultures to some extent renunciation of possessions renunciation of your name let go of your old name adopt a new spiritual name renunciation of physical comforts exposing the body to discomfort but all these can be helpful but if the most basic renunciation is not known then the most basic attachment will still be there and that's attachment to your thoughts you haven't renounced unnecessary thinking setting aside a period for being present is traditionally called meditation so you could say that that's what we are doing here although we're not really doing anything all we are doing which is not a doing is realizing our presence realizing presence right now in different parts of the planet little points of consciousness waking up where before there was only a person there's no conscious presence arising in different parts of the planet at the same time and this of course has no form and there's no time past and future become irrelevant in presence and that's an amazing realization that who you essentially are a feeling of identity of essential identity does not need the future to complete itself it is already complete it does not need the past so you don't need past to know who you are that's a delusion that's a story you don't need future to finally arrive at some more complete version of yourself because presence is already complete you are already complete in presence one could say presence is the cream and whatever happens in time and whatever happens in future to you is the skimmed milk but once you know the cream and have the cream and skimmed milk is not that important anymore so as more presence arises you lose the fear of death which of course arises because you unconsciously think you need more time to be fully yourself of course the truth is you need to get out of time to be fully yourself so we are here relaxed and alert at the same time alertness does not require tension and to be free of tension does not mean that you're going towards sleep and at this moment who are you with no reference to your story the space of presence not a person you still look like a person from the outside so with this shift the person recedes and presence arises you don't lose anything real in this and what about my personal identity i don't want to lose that if you look more deeply at the bottom of what you feel is your personal identity there's the fact that right now you are conscious that's the foundation of what you sense and call your personal identity it's consciousness is your personal identity it gives light to the story of who you are which consists of thoughts and past past is thoughts the consciousness is the light behind your story and without it there would be nothing let's close our eyes for a moment and just continue to be present without any visual perception if thoughts interfere take your attention into the inner body feel the aliveness inside the body be present with every cell of the body presence of course transcends the body but it shines through the form open your eyes look around the room wherever you are and stay present be the awareness behind the perceptions innocent fresh perception alert perception and back at the screen as we finish our meditation you may want to sit a little longer in the stillness and when you then start moving again start doing things carry that presence as much as possible with you as i don't have my bell with me i will now simulate the bell as best i can

there was a man that many of you have heard of some of you read some of the teachings socrates he lived two thousand roughly two thousand five two thousand four hundred years ago in greece he never wrote anything his disciples later wrote down what they remembered and its main disciple was plato and plato then wrote the socratic dialogues uh we don't know of course whether what plato wrote was exactly what socrates taught in a way what plato wrote in plato's writing socrates is a literary character so the characteristic of platonic dialogues is that socrates asks questions his people who come to him for teaching he doesn't seem to immediately have the answer he asks questions and then the person answers and he gradually leads the person to the answer now in the dialogues which some of you may have read some of them not perhaps many people these days read plato the in the dialogues it the impression is given that socrates kind of manipulates a little bit the people who come to him and the impression is given that he already knows the answer he just pretends not to know the answer that's what comes across in the dialogues and i think that was that is the the character that plato created but i have i believe and i have evidence for this belief that that's not actually what happened i believe and i'll tell you in a minute why that plato actually started every teaching session from a place of not knowing the answer and so unlike the impression we get if you read if you read the platonic dialogues that he already knows he's just pretending not to know no how do i know this plato said i'm sorry socrates said they call me the wisest of all men and the reason why they call me the wisest of all men is that i'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing so and again when we read it retrospectively after having read the platonic dialogues we think oh he's just again some kind of affectation he's saying i i know nothing no i believe that is his genuine starting point was the ability to go into that state of not knowing rather than coming from already having accumulated knowledge just waiting to come out of his head and this is why his uh he was able to think creatively he actually taught you one could say almost he taught humanity how to think for the first time to think rationally but his thinking is creative it's fresh and new and it it was a process between him and the people who came to him there was an energy field that arose and out of this energy field the answers came sometimes they came through him sometimes they came through the people who came to him another interesting thing he said that's not reported in plato but written by another disciple of his called xenophone and he said that socrates frequently pointed out that he received counsel from a divine voice and again that's something that the western rationalists try to ignore they to them plato is the absolutely clear rational analytical conceptual thinker and they don't see because they don't know that dimension within themselves they don't see the depths out of which his thinking actually came so he said frequently as reported by xenophone that he received guidance from a divine voice socrates is not in the sense one doesn't get the sense that some entity spoke through him but obviously he was referring to inspiration from a dimension within him that was beyond thinking beyond conceptualization beyond the rational thought so what we the impression we get of socrates is really we see half the story we see only the upper half of the iceberg well the iceberg actually is you see far less than half of it you see only a tiny fraction of him that was when we when these things are taught at universities and so on the the more important dimension is actually completely missed they only look at the upper what's he taught what's he saying but where did all that come from what was the state of consciousness out of which such a creative teaching such creative thinking could arise and so it is that most these dimensions the dimension of conceptualization of thinking is in everyone but the dimension of non-conceptual intelligence is also in everyone this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation

you know when i was a little girl i don't know what it is is i mean i do notice this in all in in most asian people that if they're not smiling they just look sad so when i was a kid you know and if i wasn't smiling they always say why do you look so sad and i'm like i don't think i'm sad you know smile smile you got such a pretty smile smile so i learned to hi even when i'm really sad i'll go hi hi hi yeah i'm fine you know we we take on these roles because people may have said something i mean i you know i did it and then i when i take on that role i actually lose that authentic self of of me that okay i might be this person that you know just looks sad but i'm not sad i mean you know it's i was trying to please somebody else make somebody else comfortable because they told me that it wasn't nice they didn't they weren't feeling good because i looked the way that i looked which appeared to them in their mind and interpretation that i was sad so i learned to keep smiling you know it's easy to do but it can be very exhausting if you hang around with a bunch of people all the time because i think i have to be like this that's why i don't hang around with anybody no i mean wow we just got to be ourselves and you know somebody told me i i was in a a body worker in california and we often just share and we talk because we really love talking with each other and and she told me this this story this man who used to come to her he was a very old gentleman and seeing that he was old she asked him wow you've lived so many years what what great wisdom can you share with me and he said don't believe in it what anybody says so it's not only don't believe what they say don't believe what your own mind says and don't believe the mask they wear you'll know something when it's just genuine because something in your body just melts you just feel it and when that melts because they're melted and then you melt you go oh wow this is nice it's not like this great excitement that happens it's just a nice feeling it's kind of like oh okay this is nice this is comfortable so in my uh on my retreats that i do sometimes i'll do an experiment with with the group and it's a smaller group than this so we can do a lot more experiments and stuff exercises but i will have them talk to each other just you know somebody that they don't know go up to them and just have a conversation with them right away it'll start off and that gets louder and louder and louder and louder and you just know that vibration of that energy is coming strictly from the mind that's how they're meeting each other and communicating is through the mind and then i'll go okay let's stop before you talk i want you to go into your body feel your body and then if you can access stillness access stillness go into stillness so feel your body and then speak from there so it's quiet for a moment because they feel their body and then suddenly they speak and there's a level there it doesn't rise like it's not like before you know where it was just like so loud it can get so loud and they're speaking from a different place and i love i did a retreat a couple of weeks ago at hollyhock and then i had you know the person share like well what was different from them for them and they said i just felt like as if i was raw because they were just being them there's themselves we are raw we come we're vulnerable and it was wonderful for her and at the same time it was very strange because it's unfamiliar we've forgotten that familiarity of how vulnerable and how raw and how open and how exposed we can be because we're so used to hiding ourself protecting ourselves and this has become our habit is the protection of ourself but who are we really protecting we're protecting that ego identity because what is there to protect of your soul of consciousness nothing because that soul that consciousness is that open space or that all consuming love the love that has no opposites or the peace that passes all understanding it's who we are really in reality the other thing that comes and goes the body the mind the ego that's all illusion it's all impermanent it's not who we are but when we attach ourselves to that and only live from that place you're living out of your shadow self you've covered that light that you are here because it went and this is where then you talk you act and you think you're being yourself but you're not and what i've observed most human beings are not themselves it does take an vulnerability a willingness to be vulnerable a willingness to be exposed a willingness to be raw and open just to be this but every time that you believe that you are this then it's like you become sensitive to that and think oh i might get hurt so it's easier to cover myself yeah you might get hurt yeah humans hurt each other let me just look at last half of the century i mean we hurt each other all the time all the time but when you know that you are the consciousness that's why i was saying ultimately there is no one to forgive because when you know that you are a consciousness the other is consciousness too and that is just the ego the illusion of it so that's why there's no one to forgive but most of us you're not in that place so you're not in that place you need to you kind of need to merge these two places together and have that your ego your mind to understand that to tell the truth and when you live in that truth it does open up that space there because there is this too just because it's an illusion doesn't mean that it's not there because it is there it's like that i don't know it was some sort of uh zen story where the student would say well if all this is if our body is an illusion then you know why why bother you know with it and i don't know i can't even remember but then the master just hits him with a stick and he goes oh and he goes when the master goes well if you said your body's an illusion why does it hurt so we do feel why separate ourselves from that because when we are in the very essence of your soul and you know that the the consciousness is you are that consciousness then you're more mindful because you know how sensitive this body is how sensitive the mind is and how you know just vulnerable it can be so we just kind of hold that we hold ourselves in that without that attachment because we know that there is this body here and then we speak from a different place we don't just go right into the mind and start talking so that's your your homework during lunch is to before you speak go into your body

welcome to our christmas meditation lots of people are joining us today from all over the world let's start with a moment of silence and so we can be aware of our breathing breathing consciously in and out i was reading the other day about something that happened at christmas in the year 1914 in the middle of the first world war when the soldiers i believe it was in france or belgium the soldiers were in their trenches french german british soldiers and then on christmas eve the fighting spontaneously stopped and the soldiers could hear on the opposing trenches singing of a christmas song that everybody recognized and that song was silent night holy night and gradually they came out of their trenches and in the area between the trenches so-called no man's land they shook hands started talking to each other exchanged gifts of food and other little items and they sang together that song silent night holy night each in their respective languages they talked to each other showed each other photos of their families and that became known as the christmas truce of 1914 somebody even wrote a book about it and then the superiors the officers the command in the command centers were informed that this was happening and they said oh we must put a stop to this fighting must resume as soon as possible and of course a few hours later or the next morning the craziness the insanity continued and in a way that event that happened spontaneously the instantaneous arising of ultimately is what is only sanity between human beings that seems almost miraculous and the insanity seems almost normal so if you believe that our present political discourse not only in the united states but also in other countries in europe if you believe that's crazy then of course just think back to the first half of the 20th century and the insanity of all that so that moment and that song which triggered it that that christmas songs holy night silent night brought about a shift in consciousness it didn't last and that's an interesting song to me that song embodies something that transcends anything cultural or anything belonging to any particular religion it transcends all that because the song silent night really embodies the essence of spirituality which is inner stillness it was composed in the early 19th century by an was the lyrics were written by an austrian priest in a village in the mountains in austria he had written these lyrics a year before and then christmas eve arrived and he had to present a piece of music in the evening service in the church so he had the lyrics and then he went to the schoolmaster of that village i believe he was and he in the last few hours before this the church service composed the music to it and then that evening they both performed it together in the church and then it's gradually over the years it spread all over the world because human beings recognized something in that that went beyond any particular culture or even religion although the words point to something specifically christian the birth of jesus the spirit that this song embodies goes beyond that it transcends all that it goes very deep and so it was actually declared by unesco uh as something i don't know what the official designation was world an intangible world heritage so in many ways christmas of course has degenerated into consumerism and so on although there's nothing wrong with buying gifts and giving gifts that's a beautiful thing but it it has degenerated into that so it's important to rediscover the essence of it in the english language christmas in english-speaking countries many people don't use about christmas anymore they call it holidays the intention behind it i suppose is to not to exclude people who are not christian and i can see the reasoning behind that but there is something there that is of great value and somehow to me the word word holiday does not although originally that word is also beautiful because it refers to a holy day but it's been used in so many other contexts that it no longer really has that cat doesn't no longer does not carry that sense anymore of holy but christmas still has the christ in it and that's a very interesting word christ in english it's pronounced when it's only in its by itself it's of course pronounced christ christ it's usually associated with jesus of course but we need to remember that jesus christ was not his name jesus or yoshua was his name christ is a title that was given to him later in the same way that buddha was not a name it was a title given to somebody and buddha means the awakened one and christ means literally the anointed one which it refers to anointing with sacred oil which a holy person you could do that to a holy person you you would pour sacred oil over them it's the anointing that is a literal meaning but i believe there is a deeper meaning behind that word and i also believe it's no coincidence that christ or christ christ and krishna the deity one could say in hinduism very important the most important figure in the hindu tradition those names are so uncannily similar christ christ comes from the latin christus which comes from the greek christos and then we have krishna christos krishna is that just a coincidence or are they etymologically related i believe they are and if it's just a coincidence it's a very interesting coincidence with the deeper meaning because what that christ refers to in its esoteric sense is a particular state of consciousness in mystical christianity that's called christ consciousness and in some traditions even the term krishna consciousness is used and a similar term in buddhism is called buddha nature it refers all these refer to a particular state of consciousness that is possible for humans to realize not to achieve to attain to acquire but to realize why am i making that distinction because that state of conscious is not something that is not already here that consciousness which we could call the awakened consciousness christ consciousness buddha nature is a potential that's already there dormant in many humans but already there so you don't need to acquire it or go somewhere else or find it in the future it's a realization that within you there is a deeper state of consciousness than the one that you experience mostly in everyday life and that's the realization of in mystical christianity it's called the realization of the christ within in buddhism it's the realization of your own buddha nature which is your deepest sense of identity of being so you are on the one hand a person or a personality and the kind of personality that you are is determined by your past all the things that have contributed to the arising of that particular personality or person and beyond this person which consists of mainly of mental and emotional conditioning beyond that you are something deeper and jesus pointed to that in his teachings when he said to his disciples you are the light of the world and somewhere else jesus also said i am the light of the world i believe the i am the light of the world is in the gospel of john you are the light of the world is in one of the other gospels in other words the essence of who i am is also the essence of who you are the difference between us this is the implication the difference between us is only that i know i realize the essence of who i am and you have not yet realized it that's the only difference and therefore jesus also said all the things that i do and greater things you will also do so ultimately we are one the essence of who we are jesus said is the same you just have to recognize or realize that essence within you but how do you do that now i could use examples from buddhism or examples from christianity that point to the possibility of realizing that dimension within you let's let's look just at one one saying of jesus again because this is christmas our christmas meditation jesus talks about the kingdom of heaven that's perhaps the very foundation of his teaching seek and find the kingdom of heaven which is within you that's the foundation some people believe that love your neighbor as yourself is the foundation but i would suggest to you that that is not the foundation because that cannot be a starting point it is pointless to tell anybody who has not realized the essence within themselves to love their neighbor as themselves they won't be able to do it not for long because if they have not recognized their own essence they cannot recognize the essence in the other and realize that who i am in the essence of my being is one with who you are in the essence of your being and when i realize that then i love the other as myself but i cannot tell somebody you must love the other as yourself they live totally trapped in the mental emotional conditioning of their personality or their ego they may want genuinely want to be a better human being and try to love the other but they will always fail again and again so the foundation is finding the kingdom of heaven that is within you and then as a consequence of that you will love the other as yourself in other words it'll change your relationship with other human beings there will be a goodwill a benevolence coming into your interactions with other human beings your interactions with other human beings will no longer be dysfunctional the dysfunction that we see on every level not only when we listen to the news but in our personal lives in every level personal to collective within nations and between nations so what is this the kingdom of heaven that is within you what does that mean of course they read it in the churches have been reading it for a long time and mostly it's been misinterpreted although jesus clearly said it is within you christians traditionally have believed that it is somewhere else it's going to come when you when you die you will enter the kingdom of heaven or it's come at the end of times or the kingdom of heaven and so on disregarding what he said about don't look for it here or there you can't say oh there it is or here it's over there that's what he said it is here now these are old words kingdom of heaven especially kingdom so i want to offer you a fresh translation of that so that it becomes more effective as a pointer towards that state of consciousness because it is pointing to something that is within you kingdom there are not that many kingdoms left these days it's no longer a word it's really alive within us and so what did he mean when he used the term kingdom i suggest dimension it is speaking of a particular dimension of consciousness a dimension of consciousness that is different from your usual dimension of consciousness what is heaven heaven is up there in many languages heaven and sky are the same word in in german in spanish in french heaven and sky are the same word so there in those languages jesus said the kingdom of the sky c l c l o himmel and so on so what is what what is that heaven or sky you look up what do you see now heaven or sky is not something that is a particular object it's it's all over when you look at it it's vast spaciousness so jesus used a something in the sense perceived world that was closest to that what he was talking about in the nonsense perceived world and the closest he could find was the vast spaciousness of the sky he was pointing here to an inner dimension of consciousness the inner dimension of space or spaciousness because that is the sky the sky is not something nobody can touch it nobody can even reach it if you wanted to if you go up in a rocket you will never find the sky you can never say oh here's the sky clouds yes but not sky if you go up in a rocket suddenly you find yourself in outer space and you say oh where was the sky so the sky is and isn't it exists and it doesn't exist so it's a very uh good choice for pointing to something that is totally intangible that is within you so what he was pointing to is the dimension of spaciousness the dimension of spaciousness or space that is within you now where is that now you may have noticed that your mind most of the time talks in your head not always out aloud but in the same way that a person walking in the street who is maybe mentally unbalanced talk to talk aloud to themselves all the time and you say oh this guy is crazy you need he or she they talk but almost every human being does it all the time except that they don't do it out aloud there is the voice in the head that continuously speaks and comments and complains more often than not uh has negative things to talk about internally the self talk in the head and for most people that goes on and on as long as they awake in daily life the voice never stops for many people that voice is a torture because it's it's so negative that it it makes their life miserable they don't realize that they think the situations they find themselves in and the people they interact with and whatever they are doing but don't want to be doing that all these things cause them their misery they don't realize that the greater part of their misery is caused by what their mind is saying and the emotions that reflect what their mind is saying how bad this is how bad that is the complaining the accusing the blaming the the regret the resentments the guilt they're all connected with unconscious thinking the compulsive thinking the voice in the head so there is a lack of inner spaciousness the mind is cluttered full like a room full of furniture most of it useless the mind is a beautiful instrument if it's used in a focused and constructive way of course it's the ability to think is wonderful to use thought is a incredible thing it's an evolutionary attainment but most people don't use thought they are used by thought they are possessed by the unconscious mind activity they can't do anything about it there's a lack of spaciousness and that spaciousness is exactly that dimension of consciousness that jesus points to the inner spaciousness the dimension of spaciousness how how do you find it it's always there but it's usually covered up by the incessant noise of the mind so what we are talking about here goes back to that christmas song what we are talking about here is inner stillness for example in the gap between two thoughts for example in this moment in order to be conscious at this moment do you need to think being aware of the weather the various ways in which the weather manifests in the present moment is also a way of bringing you into the now to feel the breeze of the air on your skin for example listen to the sounds of rain or the wind in the trees and one of my favorite my favorites is watching the sky the continuously changing paintings abstract paintings that appear in the sky the air breathing in the air the sense the smells of nature and taking in the entire energy field that surrounds you now where i'm sitting there's not much nature in this room it's a little studio but that's okay if you go within you encounter your own nature your own essential nature i believe it was ralph baldo emerson the american writer spiritual writer 19th century who said something like the wick of individual life runs deep into the oil of pure being that's an interesting analogy and quite a powerful one the wick if english is not your native language and you happen not to know what wick is wick is the string that is in the candle that you light that draws up the wax so it's a string in an oil lamp and you light the wick that sticks out of the oil and you light it then as a flame the wick draws up the oil that oil is then consumed by the flame so that's the wick and in this analogy he said the wick of individual life your individual life runs deep into the oil of pure being so that means there is a great depth within you and your individual consciousness derives its sustenance from the greater universal consciousness is only a manifestation or an emanation of the greater one consciousness that you also are that you are more fundamentally than the individual the wick that's burning on the surface you are a surface phenomenon on the level of your physical body and the sense perceived all the sense perceived aspects of yourself and even your thinking although your thinking is already already exists in the realm of invisibility nobody has ever seen a thought you cannot see a thought you cannot perceive it with your senses and yet even thinking is a relatively superficial or surface phenomenon it belongs to the dimension of your individual form but there could be no thinking and there could be no sense perception if you were not connected to something deeper which is consciousness so you are an an emanation of something very profound very deep that connects you with the totality of the universe now the important thing is to to realize the truth of this directly which means to sense that depth in you here and now so that in addition to knowing yourself as an individual person in the analogy that emerson used that's the wick in addition to knowing yourself as an individual person surrounded by many other individual persons and life forms in addition to that you are aware of a deeper dimension within yourself and when i say you are aware of it may not be totally correct because the awareness when you become aware of your own awareness when you become aware of the fact that you are conscious right now and you can only become aware of that if for a moment there's no thinking and yet you have not fallen asleep for a moment there's a cessation of thinking like now and what do you need to think about now nothing for a moment there's no thinking in that moment there's a stillness an alert stillness that is the awareness of who you are beyond your individual form that is the beginning of the the pure being that emerson speaks of it's not that difficult especially here right here and now where you're not being disturbed hopefully by all the demands that the world normally places upon you it's not that difficult here now to have these brief moments and perhaps even longer moments when you are aware of an inner alert stillness cessation of thinking what remains is consciousness prior to thought consciousness before it becomes a thought and that i sometimes describe as the deep eye as opposed to the surface i'm not talking about this eye because that's also an interesting analogy but i'm talking about the first person singular i pronoun pronoun pronoun the deep eye is that being the i am awareness of the i amness beingness the surface i that you normally identify with and that normally when you use the word i in every day usage you refer to the surface i your personality your past the person that you are the bundle of thoughts and emotions that form make up the personality that's the surface i and in the absence of thought activity the surface i subsides and if you have not fallen below thought and towards sleep but have risen above thought then there is an alert stillness not a tired stillness that is the essence of who you are that is the unconditioned consciousness and it's so close it's not that difficult to experience to realize this alive depth in you where the personality is transcended although you still have you still have or you still are for a while of course also the the surface self is still there and most likely you will again and again become completely identified with the surface surface self which is a normal human consciousness the normal unawakened consciousness the normal fairly dysfunctional consciousness and dysfunctional because it doesn't know its own depth it doesn't know the root you're in other words dysfunction because you're out of touch with yourself yourself meaning the deep i the unconditioned consciousness you cannot sense that in the background even while you are acting in this world as a person you can still this is the the aim of awakening means if you are awakened first you have glimpses of awakening but you can sense yourself as this deep i that's fine and then the glimpses are a little longer and then you may find gradually in your everyday life you can live from that deeper place that changes the way in which you think habitual thoughts are still there but a greater a deeper intelligence flows into your mind your thinking becomes creative more creative more alive less dysfunctional doesn't create suffering anymore for yourself and others because otherwise your thinking creates an enormous amount of suffering unhappiness this is still the case for millions of humans on the planet so the deepest meaning of shakespeare's words is to your own self be true the deepest meaning of that is to be in touch with that pure being which is the unconditioned consciousness which is your true being your true self it is no longer a separate self it connects you to the totality so this frees you from the prison of your personality if you are not aware of that deeper dimension to who you are you are trapped on the surface level of who you are constantly looking for an enhanced sense of identity on the surface level where no true and ultimately satisfying sense of identity can ever be found welcome to our meditation we start with the surface of now which is whatever we perceive at this moment whatever you perceive whatever i perceive really it's the the i so you perceive this person talking you hear the voice there's the totality of the room there's the ever-present noises the ceiling and the walls all part of the totality of your visual perception so there's a totality of sensory perception that's the actually call it the surface of the now or you can call it the outside of now and then you're also aware of yourself breathing and you may be aware of the energy inside the body so we are gradually moving from the outside to the inside and if you allow the outside to be as it is although there's nothing special here in this room it is it's quite nice it has its own beauty sounds are quite nice if you allow them to be imagine it's the om sound and now comes the really important part you're aware of yourself as the perceiver of all these things you're not aware of yourself right now you're aware of the the personal self because at this moment let's use this word i hope that you are not thinking about your personal history right now or the problems you've had in the future in the past or might have in the future so when i say you're aware of yourself it's not your way of yourself in the usual way because when you usually say you're aware of yourself you're aware of the story of yourself you and your life you and your position in the world you and other people and so on no more simple now in our meditation you're aware of yourself not as a person with a history but a deeper level of self and i'm begin by calling it the perceiver of whatever it is that arises in your perception auditory visual feeling sensing so but who is it that is perceiving this not the person because the person is a story the story is not perceiving this so for a moment let's not call it anything but be aware of the simple fact that you are perceiving this but you don't know what that is that i that is perceiving but there's no doubt that that is there and even if what you are perceiving is a dream perhaps it is it certainly has a lot in common with the dream because the dream evaporates very quickly it doesn't last many philosophers have discussed whether human existence is a dream we don't need to go there can say it might be but even if it is it's all not real as some people say there is something in which the dream appears the dream is being experienced one could say there's a light in which the forms appear and you are that and there's no doubt that if it's a dream it's happening if it's all unreal at least that unreality is happening in that light of awareness because without that awareness there would be no sense perception there would be no room there would be no voice or somebody listening to the voice so that's the one thing that cannot be doubted everything else you can doubt whether it's actually real and that awareness is formless it doesn't have a history because your entire history appears in it when you remember it in that awareness and when things happened that once happened they happened in the present moment in the light of awareness and you can only remember it as the awareness now so i'm now asking you although you continue to be aware of sense perceptions to simply acknowledge the fact that you are aware and even that is not perhaps putting it rightly to acknowledge the fact that there is awareness in other words you are aware that you are aware you are conscious of being conscious it sounds a little strange but it's an amazing thing it also sounds if there were a duality here i am conscious of being conscious the subject i but that only appears in language in fact when you are conscious of being conscious and that's a it's a it's a strange thing just and you can't you can't say much about it it just has no form and no shape it's totally elusive and yet all pervasive can you feel the fact that you are conscious or rather that you are consciousness and that's an to to sense yourself as that and still be able to perceive all this and you have long since left compulsive labeling behind when you are aware of yourself as consciousness and then perceive as consciousness labeling things mentally doesn't come in anymore there's just consciousness and forms arising and subsiding in consciousness arising they some forms stay for a while this room stays as long as you sit here this room arises in consciousness and then you leave and it subsides but the voice the words arise in consciousness and subside arise subside you could call consciousness the the eternal gap behind everything the gap in between everything the space behind everything whatever you want to call it these are just pointers and there is a an intense frequency that arises in you when you become aware of consciousness it makes the personal self fade out it burns up the karmic accumulations in you old stuff from the past pain body old mind patterns and your entire being is vibrating at a higher frequency that's the only way i can put it but the words may not be absolutely right but that's how i sense it in you and that is inherently joyful and energizing to sense this essence in yourself we are learning here not to have it as a very short-lived glimpse but to be able to stay there and every moment you stay in that the old gets burned up in you and you connect with intelligence not the iq intelligence that you measure in iq tests that's a very limited form of intelligence creative intelligence i talk about this does not mean that you or i this moment will come up with the solution to the problem that einstein couldn't solve the unified field theory or whatever it was nor does it mean that suddenly i can paint a masterpiece or compose an exquisite piece of music because i have these are not vehicles that have been prepared in this body for this by this body but this intelligence can flow into something if you there is a vehicle in your life it can flow into that transform it and make it absolutely creative and even that is no more than a bonus for some people it may be enough to walk around the planet for the rest of their life in this form as peaceful intensely alive beings that are astonished at the beauty of all things and bring that vibration of peace that comes with the awareness of pure consciousness whoever they meet it's a little whiff of that and for some humans that's enough and they fulfill their purpose here others may create some more elaborate forms but empowered by not the ego but by the greater intelligence it creates it can flow into the human mind and body and create through the human form let's come back to the simple secret be conscious that you are conscious feel the awareness as your essence and you will notice it's very still the awareness is still still i compare it sometimes to space i call it inner space or space consciousness it has no extension it is vast but not like the outer space that you see you don't see it but that is there when you look at the sky at night the vastness of space is only a reflection in the external of who you are in the essence of your being and that's the awe-inspiring thing when you look at this starry sky at night the absolutely awe-inspiring thing that if you're really looking will really shut up your mind immediately because it's so astonishing that was my first meditation when i was in my teens i had no idea it was meditation lying on the deck of our we lived on the top floor there was a little terrace it was in the south of spain where there were beautiful skies at night there was no thought i had no idea that was going on then i just it was so deeply enjoyable the awe-inspiring thing is not the countless countless suns that you see which are stars but the vastness of it the nothingness that makes it all possible the vastness of space unimaginable infinity and there too that can put you in touch with the vastness within you just looking at that and space again is very similar the outer space is very similar to inner space because both of them don't really exist because as i mentioned earlier existence means to stand out but space is you can't say oh here's space all you can ever be aware of is things in space and again in yourself you can't say here is the essence of who i am you cannot be aware of it as an object all objects are things forms that arise in this place why can't you be aware of space because you are it you cannot separate from it and look at it as an object it is the formless i the i am that i am the most profound statement in the entire bible which is of course a mixed bag of all kinds of writings but there are some deep insights if you know how to find them when god is asked what's your name god says i am that i am that's my name see i am that immediately there's space in you when you become conscious of being conscious that is space in any situation you find yourself in a quick access to inner space spaciousness essence is to become conscious that you are conscious that's presence then yes you are still a person you can function as a person but you are not trapped in the person that's the hybrid i talked about you function as the person we are not trapped in the person and now for a little while we just see if we can stay there in that consciousness of consciousness so welcome to our saturday meditation the focus of our meditation is stillness inner stillness what happens outside doesn't really matter so much stillness is just a word a pointer to most people it means absence of noise and in that sense stillness could be called a negative pointer it points to the absence of something but it doesn't really refer to the absence of noise even the absence of inner noise although it is true that when the inner noise stops there is stillness but every pointer we use is not really it it's not quite right ever it reduces that to which it points to something we think we can understand so it's much more than the absence of something although as a pointer that works another word for stillness is presence and that's a positive pointer by implication presence points to the presence of something the presence of what all you can say here is the presence of presence so there are two levels one could say to who you are on the one hand on one level you are the presence of certain things the existence of certain things you are the existence of the body the existence of sense perceptions the existence of emotions the existence of thoughts so we can call that the presence of something that's you as a person and here we are not concerned with that we are concerned with who you are beyond the person that deeper level and we are here together a few thousand people perhaps on in different parts of the planet going beyond the individual persons personalities to a deeper level of being and that's our meditation and i am speaking the words point to it the words of course are not it the silence the stillness the presence which cannot be perceived with the senses is what matters here so there's nothing for you to do except be who you are beyond the personality and realize there is a stillness in you that has nothing to do with the personality and its problems because a large part of your personality consists of your problems as you access the deeper level of stillness or where you just sense as i sometimes put it your own presence it's not your own but let's just put it this way where you sense your own presence or rather where you sense the presence that you are you are that presence before you become this or that a person there is a presence an aliveness there is the light of consciousness in which the person arises but the light of consciousness itself is not the person it is it transcends the person it is not separate from it the light assumes a certain form and becomes a person in the same way that when you watch a movie there's a light a projector light and the ways in which the light is obstructed by the film and those obstructions of the light not never total obstructions because then you wouldn't see anything partial obstructions of the light and that becomes the movie the characters the events and so on that's a little analogy and normal life isn't really that much different so if you only know the obstructions to the light of consciousness the light of god then you are trapped on the level of problems and drama and difficulties anxieties regrets past future me me but here we become aware of the presence not the presence of something in us that would make it into some formal thing again but more simply the presence of presence so the presence underlies the words that i speak it underlies the words that you hear and so i am inviting you to be aware of that in you that underlies the sense perceptions and the thoughts that's what we could call that the essence of who you are that transcends the person that's the most important realization in your life but it seems to be still a secret because nobody very few seem to know about it and many are not interested yet until existence as the person only becomes increasingly frustrating both for the individual and for the collective on the planet societies civilizations where the transcendent dimension is missing completely nothing no individual or civilization can remain sane for long without it there's an increasing madness if that is all you know and the presence the realization of presence frees you from bondage to the person the personality with all its little concerns that keep it busy all day long and on a larger scale the collective realize that the concerns of the collective that you hear through the media and so on may be relatively important but ultimately they are not just as your problems which sometimes are related to the problems of the collective at for example now in times of the recession and so on your problems too are ultimately not that important they certainly won't be important in 50 60 years time to anybody and not to you because you as the person probably won't be there anymore that's quite soon i suggest you visit a graveyard from time to time and look at the gravestones with these names on them all these people thought that their problems were incredibly important and their successes were important incredibly important their failures were very important and none of this suddenly matters 50 years later all gone and another generation is there with the same beliefs totally absorbed in their life their so-called life but without connection to the transcendent dimension they're not really fully alive and they're not really enjoying life except as temporary passing sense pleasures to high followed by low[Speaker 1] (0:05 - 3:29:34)

And on that level only, life, so-called life, will always disappoint you, even when you achieve change that you wanted, which is fine, but it cannot give you real satisfaction for long. Only discovering the transcendent in you can do that. So real satisfaction is realizing who you are beyond that level of person, form, we could call it.

Realizing who you are sounds as if you suddenly understood something, you can't really understand it, but you can, it's a being it rather than understanding it. So you'll notice when you join me here in the state of not thinking, just being present, at that time, something other than the person with its past and future and concerns has arisen, something other than the usual person. So the person has stepped aside or receded temporarily and there's a presence which has no content as such because it's space.

All the little things, and so that means most of your life, you can actually use them in this way so that they become a help. All those things that don't require that much of your attention, they become, use that spare attention to go within and another way of putting it, become aware of that field of attention itself as the consciousness. And this is why it was so pleasant when I put away the clothes this morning, just, it wasn't the putting away, it was something deeper.

And that's, you can practice that, practice it here and in the rest of your life with all the little things that make up most of your life, whether you are a so-called VIP in the eyes of the world, a totally meaningless concept or not, it's still little things that makes, even, and you become most effective when you give your attention to little things. If there's something that absorbs more of your attention, then some attention will move more into mind and thinking and you will have less than the being awareness, so to speak, goes a little bit into the background if you have to work something out. Or write something, but it's vital that it's still there.

So there's, or you're engaged in a discussion that can very quickly pull you completely out of the being awareness. When you're getting your viewpoint, you need to defend your viewpoint now. Now, there are two ways of defending your viewpoint.

One is losing yourself in your viewpoint. And one is remaining in connection with the being awareness and then just put forward your viewpoint and why you have it. And then allow the other person to forward their viewpoint and don't make them into an enemy, which is much easier now when you have not, you're no longer seeking your identity to derive your identity from your opinions and viewpoints.

That's a dreadful state to be in because then you're surrounded by enemies or those who don't share your viewpoints or have opposite ones. They are awful. These people are evil.

The same thing happens with collective viewpoints. You have a collective belief system. It's the same mechanism.

Our belief is the only one, obviously, that's true. All other beliefs are fallacy. They are lies spread by the devil.

They're not our beliefs. So these people are less than human who don't share our beliefs. It's insane, but normal.

And what kind of a world does that produce if millions of people are trapped in that dysfunctional belief system, egoic belief structures? And so when I talk about the little things, another Zen quote, yeah, I love these Zen people. And there was a Zen master who was asked, what's the essence of Zen?

And now there are many different kinds of answers the masters give. None of them are answers that you would expect. And he said, Zen, well, the disciple, of course, came, please explain to me again.

I've only been here for 10 years and I don't get it yet. What is it? I need a fuller explanation.

You haven't said enough. And what is Zen? And the master said, Zen is doing one thing at a time.

Is that it? Yeah. Okay, thank you.

I'm going to look for another master who gives me a better explanation. But if he had really listened, that's all you need to know. Doing one thing at a time.

Attention. So attention on what you're doing and attention on attention. Then you're no longer an egoic doer.

If you don't have attention on attention, the doing becomes egoic seeking. And it's not empowered. It comes out of the conditioning of your mind.

So attention on what you're doing and attention on attention. Then you are in touch. Again, that's another aspect of what we called yesterday, one foot in one dimension, the other foot in that dimension.

And then you are both a human and a being, a full human being. And until you are able to live like that, you're not a full human being yet, as Confucius already said over 2000 years ago. And many humans are still not, evolution has not come to an end of humanity or anything.

We are still evolving, obviously, this is not the end product. Where we are at, I don't know, not that advanced. So the most important thing to get here, get, get it, get.

The most important thing to get here is to be able to be aware of yourself as consciousness or attention on attention. This means, oh, this is another Zen story that just came to me. The disciple said, I'm going to take my leave now because I'm going to look for another monastery and another master because you actually haven't given me the full answer.

Can you just write something down so that it's just something for me to remember that is important, so some explanation. And the Zen master, he goes, give me paper, pen. He wrote, there.

And he said, attention. Okay, is that all? Yes, please add a little bit more, just another few more words.

Okay, give it to me. And then the disciple reads it, attention, attention. What does that mean?

He said, attention, attention, what does it mean? The master said, attention means attention. So the disciple was seeking to pursue Zen through mental concepts.

And the master was attempting to help him break through mental concepts because the answer to all, to who you are, the answer to the secrets of the universe, which are all in you, of course, you are a microcosm of the macrocosm, as above, so below, as the ancient philosophers already said, the answer, all the secrets of the universe are not to be found through conceptual thinking. What conceptual thinking can do is relatively little. And the human evolution, which has now reached a critical stage, does not mean that we are going to improve conceptual thinking.

It's been helpful. It's done interesting things. It's created, of course, it has a downside, lots of huge problems, especially if it's not connected with wisdom, which comes from the being.

But you cannot further develop more refined conceptual thinking. We've come to the kind of end of the road of conceptual thinking, because what else? It's just putting words together in a different way.

So we've tried so many ways of putting words together. How many words? There are a limited number of letters in the alphabet, not to mention sounds.

I talked about that already. There are a limited number of letters in the alphabet and a limited number of words that you can put together. Every book in the library, or nowadays on the computer, anything you read, any text you read, is words put together in a certain order.

And then you jumble them, and then you have another text, and you put different one. But the number of words is limited. And they're just words.

So the answer is not in further development of conceptual thinking, or another way of putting it, more information is more information, because we live in the so-called information age, and you can get all the information on the computer. It is quite amazing. Of course it is on that level, that before you had to buy the encyclopedia Britannica, and it was quickly out of date.

And now you can Google and Wikipedia and all those things, and it's all whatever, all the human knowledge is there. But human evolution does not consist in finding, getting more and more information. You don't evolve by getting more and more information.

In fact, the more you stuff, get information, the more confused you get, if you're not connected with being. So much stuff, and then stuff accumulates in the head, and all the devices, the more stuff comes into your mind, you absorb more and more stuff. And you get completely scattered.

Human attention deficit disorder, all these things, can't focus on anything for longer than 20 seconds. Dreadful state to be in. Of course, yes, you know more than Jesus did 2,000 years ago, and of course you do on the level of information.

You know 100,000 times more than the Buddha did, but that's not vital. It's knowledge, but it's not knowing. So human evolution is not to completely abandon conceptual thinking, no, to be able to use conceptual thinking without being trapped in conceptual thinking.

So it's to transcend conceptual thinking. Transcend mean you don't remove it, you go beyond it, but it's still there for you to use, but not for you to be used by.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. When I was writing The Power of Now, I wrote, I don't know why I wrote that, it just came to me one day, I wrote, there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. And the editor saw it and said, you can't say that because you don't, how can you know that?

The people are going to argue with that, so it was taken out. And some years later, I read an article by a scientist and said, now scientists believe that there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. Humanity is, this species is at a critical stage now.

There's a possibility of a shift into a deeper state or a higher state, if you want to call it that, of transcending conceptual thinking, going beyond. You can still think, but no longer trapped in thinking. This is where humanity has to go.

And as you transcend conceptual thinking, you regain what was lost eons, eons ago. You regain your sense of connectedness with being. You feel deep down, you're connected with something vast and it's not different from who you are.

It just, when we put it into language, it sounds as if that was something different from who you are. You're connected with being, with a sense of simple beingness. Being comes from the word to be, to be, the most primordial thing.

And everything in nature is an expression of that underlying beingness, and including the physical body, this body, this body. All that we perceive in this world is existence. Exists, it exists, this body exists, this body exists.

Underlying existence is being. Being is the formless, timeless dimension within yourself. It's very much like the black hole at the center of the galaxy.

When I was writing The Power of Now, I wrote, I don't know why I wrote that, it just came to me one day. I wrote, there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. And the editor saw it and said, you can't say that because you don't, how can you know that?

The people are going to argue with that, so it was taken out. And some years later, I read an article by a scientist and it said, now scientists believe that there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. And so, why did I know that?

I knew that because I could feel the black hole inside myself. The spacious, formless, one life, the origin. And I know that the human being is a microcosm.

It's just, you can understand the whole universe by understanding yourself. You are just a microscopic version of that. So that's the, we are regaining by no longer being lost in the conceptualizing mind, we regain something that was lost a long, long time ago, very much like the prodigal son in the New Testament, your origin.

Not your origin in, you can't say, it's not really your origin in time, it's not saying, okay, my origin was six billion years ago, that's where I started, when the Big Bang happened, that was the beginning of me. That's true, of course, that was the beginning, but it's not so much that the origin is in the distant past or not even in the near past, the origin is timeless. The origin of your being, it is still there, this primordial nothingness, nothingness before the Big Bang is still in you now.

Nature can help you rediscover that if you approach it not with the conceptualizing mind, but you approach nature and perceive nature in a state of alert attention, spaciousness, and that's a wonderful, wonderful, first we could call it a practice, but then it's no longer a practice, it becomes a natural way of being. First in nature and then even in the man-made world, but you need to first of all be able to, we are going into it now, do it in the forest or on the beach or in the field, wherever it is, before you can be in that state in the shopping mall where everything, it's not so being, you can't really find being that easily, you have to be rooted very deeply in yourself to find being in the shopping mall because everything is surface phenomena. Buy me, do this, do this, eat a hamburger.

Look here, look here, and then after 20 minutes in the shopping mall, you're totally exhausted because all the energy is flowing out of your eyes into phenomena and music is in the background. Not the most profound music. And yet you could be walking in the forest for three hours and not feel exhausted, in fact feel invigorated, isn't that strange?

So the shopping mall takes it out of you and the forest or whatever, the beach or the desert puts it back, there's something there that's very, very different and, but not for everybody. There needs to be the openness and the alertness so that all the seemingly insignificant things in nature, you are alert to that, and that, for example, you're looking at, you're walking a tree, a slight movement of leaves in the breeze, perhaps a sound associated with it, your senses are alert, not strained, there's no tension, you don't go, no, just alert and in that alertness, of course, there's no thought anymore because if you were thinking, you would not be alert. Thought is not alert, it's a lower state.

Alertness is a higher state than thought, higher consciousness than thought, but good, by the good thoughts, which means creative thoughts, original thoughts, original insights can only come out of the alertness. You need to have the alertness and then sometimes thought becomes fruitful and original and creative out of that, but if you never touch the alertness, then thought is repetitive, old records, CDs, not records anymore and not CDs anymore, old iPods or whatever, same. So, nature then, you have to approach nature with that alertness, attentiveness, like a little child as if you had come there for the first time into that place.

Let's say, maybe you drive somewhere or maybe it's close to where you live, you get out of the car, out of your door, in most, for most people, even wherever you live, there will be something natural when you step out of your house somewhere. Even if you live downtown, there may be a little tree somewhere, not acknowledged by most people, almost everybody walks past it without looking because they have more important things to think about, but you, for a moment, you acknowledge that, not by saying, oh, I should be acknowledging the tree, you just acknowledge, you give it attention and in that moment, you notice little things about it that before you didn't notice, how the quivering leaves, how the light shines through the branches or the leaves, how the light interacts with the tree and you notice all these things without having to call it anything, it's just a noticing and this is a practice, you can practice that as a choice because you choose to relate to nature in a different way and when you do that, then nature gives you something back. What it gives you back is some of that energy of connectedness with the source that the tree is still in, this energy comes back to you, the tree gives you that back, it says, have some of this, I have more than enough and you get, so it helps you to feel that connectedness but you are also helping the tree, I'm saying that intuitively, the tree hasn't spoken to me like that.

Maybe some trees speak to some people but not to me, I haven't, well, Prince Charles years ago said, he talked to the plants and that's of course a wonderful thing and I think he not only, he meant he not only talked to the plants, I think he meant he gives them his full attention and ever since the newspapers have been making fun of him because they don't understand, it's just the mind doesn't want to understand that. So you're giving it attention, it's not just that the tree and I'm only using tree as an example, it could be a tree, it could be a flower, it could be an entire forest because the attention that you give, you can give to either a single natural phenomenon or being like a tree or a flower or even a blade of grass or a little plant, whatever it may be. You can also give attention to a more inclusive energy field like an entire valley that is, it has its own energy field, its own spirit almost one could say or a forest as you walk.

So there are two modalities one could say of being there in let's say it's a forest. You can notice single things like trees or plants and for a moment you give them attention, there's a looking, in alertness and then you look at something else and there's no choice really involved in not saying, okay, what can I look at? Now it happens naturally, your eyes you'd look at this and then suddenly you look at something else and then you look, you take in the totality of what's there just a general without always necessarily focusing on one thing, you take in the totality and that is, there's an expression in Zen which is translated as a choiceless awareness, an expression that also I believe Krishnamurti used, choiceless awareness of so you take in the totality of what is around you and then the nature, the entire energy field of what's around you then connects with you and you connect with it. So it gives you what some of that connectedness with a source that nature never lost, almost transmits itself to you but it's a reciprocal process, what you give nature is the awareness of itself because we need to remember that nature, it's not that you are separate from nature, you haven't been put into nature, you have come out of nature, you are nature also, you are nature that is in the process of becoming conscious of itself and so what you then give back to the tree or the flower or the forest is awareness of itself. It recognizes, because this flower, I would say it does not know it is beautiful, it just is, the flower is.

Its beauty is there, it comes from the source and now when any human perceives this flower as a true act of perception, not conceptualizing it or judging it, something responds from within, there's something is touched within, there's such beauty there but even to call it beauty, you don't need that, there's something there, something within response, almost a recognition because and when you perceive in such a way, you realize that you and it are not separate. The illusion of separation which is created by the thinking mind disappears and there's a sense of oneness when you are not calling it anything, this pure spacious perception, that immediately there's not me and the flower, there's a continuum, the flower arises within the field of consciousness, it comes out of that.

I'd like to share with you a short passage from the Bible, doesn't happen very often that I read from the Bible as part of a teaching. This is from the New Testament and it is a parable that Jesus tells that is very profound and absolutely relevant to the present time. So here we go.

Everyone who listens to these words of mine and does them will be like a man building a house who dug deep and laid the foundation on the rock. The rain fell, the floods came and the wind blew and beat against the house, but it did not collapse, it had been set solidly on rock. And everyone who listens to these words of mine but does not do them will be like a fool who built his house on sand.

The rain fell, the floods came and the wind blew and beat against the house and it collapsed and was completely ruined. So let's understand the deeper meaning of this. Everyone who listens to these words and does them means obviously anybody who listens to the teaching and practices the teaching.

And of course, Jesus' teaching is, find the kingdom of heaven that is within you, not anywhere else in space or time. Find the transcendent dimension, the kingdom of heaven that is within you, which is a deeper dimension or higher dimension of consciousness, accessible to everyone. And the man that's building the house is

The house is you. The floods come, the rain comes, beating against the house, of course, obviously means some form of adversity you encounter as you inevitably will in your life, some form of fairly extreme adversity, whether it's on a personal level or as we're experiencing now on a collective level. Now, if you haven't gone deep enough, because remember, you are the house.

If you haven't gone deep enough, you have not found anything beyond the conceptual thinking mind, then the floods, the rain, the wind, the adversity, whatever it may be, in this case, we know what it is, will devastate you. And even if you do not fall ill or contract the virus, the fear will consume you as it's consuming millions of humans at the present time. And why do you fear?

What is fear? Fear are certain thought forms you project yourself into some future moment and you're not present. Because if you were present, you would realize that in this moment, there's nothing to fear.

Only when you leave this moment, fear arises as a thought form, which then creates an emotion. So what does it mean then to dig deep and to find the foundation on the rock? What is that rock?

The foundation for the house that you are, you are that house. And I'd like you to take into a little meditation now in order to illustrate and to enable you to experience at first hand what it means to dig deep. For a moment, just become aware that you're breathing, become aware of yourself.

Not the conceptual self, not become aware of your personal history or become aware of some imagined future moment, but become aware of yourself as the conscious presence, a field of conscious presence. And thinking does not help you there. Thinking is an obstacle.

So you go deeper than thinking and you can be completely awake and present and yet with very little mind activity. And that is the beginning of the realization of your deep identity, what I sometimes call your essence identity. And your essence identity is inseparable from the present moment.

It is the timeless, eternal present. It is a deeper dimension of consciousness than the one that you ordinarily identify with. And that is the meaning of digging deep and finding that unshakable foundation that is deep within you, within everyone.

Adversity is a wonderful opportunity because adversity forces you to go deeper. Adversity forces you to awaken to the deeper dimension of who you are. Why does adversity force you?

Because life becomes almost unbearable when you live only on the surface, the surface of sense perceptions and your conceptual mind. And then you listen to the newscasts and you read all kinds of things and everybody's in a state of fear. That is the house built on the sand that when the floods come, the wind comes, the storms come, the house collapses.

Meaning, since you are the house in this parable, you are devastated in a state of extreme anxiety, extreme suffering, although nothing actually has happened yet unless you contract a disease. And this is something we'll talk about next time, right? Is the house, your house, the house that you are, are you living on the surface?

Is your house built on sand? Or are you able to dig and find the foundation within yourself that frees you from fear? Now, when things are going well, it's unlikely that most humans can't be bothered with going deeper.

What for? If things are going okay, I'm looking forward to my next vacation, weekend is coming up, and whatever it is, a nice meal is waiting for me. Everything is, it's comfort zone.

You're in your comfort zone. I've never heard of anybody who awakens in their comfort zone. There's nothing wrong with comfort zone.

Enjoy them when they are there. They last for a while. And then some form of adversity arises, either on a personal level or on a collective level.

Minor forms of adversity, and occasionally huge forms of adversity. Potential calamities, whether it's you're suddenly confronted with the fact of mortality, some great loss, serious illness on a personal level or on a collective level, war, civil strife, civil war, financial collapse, invasion of your country. All kinds of things can happen.

And at the present time, we are experiencing the so-called pandemic, collective adversity, not affecting just one person, now affecting millions at the same time. And this is an invitation to go deeper because if you don't, you suffer unnecessarily. Millions are in a state of fear and anxiety, but use this as an opportunity to either awaken out of the mind-identified state of consciousness that continuously project itself into the future that you have no control over.

It is never present. This mind-identified state of consciousness that's the house built on the sand avoids an opportunity to come to this realization that you are much deeper than you had known before. You are forced to go deeper because you can't stand the suffering anymore, the unhappiness or whatever you want to call it, the anxiety.

And so the most vital thing in any situation is the state of consciousness with which you meet the situation. And you should pay more attention to that than to the newscasts and whatever it is that you listen to and watch. Yes, you can do that also.

But what is your state of consciousness? That's something you can do something about. It's not very much that you can do about the external situation.

You can take precautions. You can help other people to the extent to which it is possible. All that's good.

You do all the things that you need to do. And perhaps many people are now forced to stay at home and suddenly you have to be on a private retreat at home. Now that's an opportunity too.

So use this precious time that is here because it is part of the awakening consciousness of humanity. It seems almost paradoxical to say that something that on the surface looks very negative and looks like an obstacle to the wellbeing of humanity. And yes, it's an obstacle to the wellbeing of humanity on a purely physical level, perhaps temporarily.

Yes. But something that looks like an obstacle from a conventional point of view is actually an opportunity for you to awaken to a deeper, or you could say higher level of consciousness. Humans don't awaken when they're in their comfort zone.

They awaken when they are taken out of their comfort zone. Not everybody does. It's an opportunity.

If you do not awaken when you're no longer in your comfort zone, you suffer. You're unhappy. You're anxious.

You're fearful. You haven't found the rock. Now, the difference between this parable and actual life is in this parable, the man had already dug deep and he had already built his house on the rock and then the floods came and so on and the house was unshakable.

In real life, often it is the case that the wind, the floods, the rains, beating against the house, which means adversity arising in your life, the adversity forces you, if you haven't already gone deeper, it forces you to go deeper. And so it's not too late to start digging now in the face of adversity. Many of you are already in the process of awakening, probably most of you listening to this.

And what's happening to us now is a wonderful opportunity for you to go deeper, a deepening of that, an acceleration of the awakening. So as much as possible, especially whenever you feel yourself drifting off into a fearful state of consciousness and a fearful emotional state, whenever you realize that, realize that in this present moment, there's nothing to fear and you have to verify this for yourself, whether this is true or not. When you fear something, it's of some imagined future moment.

Am I going to catch this disease? Am I going to die? Is a loved one going to catch it?

Is a loved one, my child, are they going to die? Imagine it, it could happen. But right now it's not happening.

So whenever you feel yourself drifting off into fear, realize, okay, I have lost the present moment. And I lost myself in my mind, in the thinking mind. And I don't know.

And then the emotion reflects that mind activity. So the moment you notice it, okay, I've lost the present moment. I am lost in the mind.

Come back into the present moment. A few little things are helpful. Be aware of your breathing.

Be aware of the inner energy field in your body. The body is alive. There's this energy, this life energy that pervades the body.

You feel that. You're breathing. You feel the aliveness in the body.

You're aware of sense perceptions. You look around. You're present.

And then you become aware of that presence that is inseparable from who you are. That presence that is inseparable from who you are. That's an amazing realization.

There's more to you than the person. That presence is deeper than the person. And you needed the adversity either to find it or to deepen that, which you had already found it, but it was not yet a deep realization.

So, this is a time of great opportunity. Use it. Don't waste it.

There's a saying that goes, when the ego weeps for what it has lost, the spirit rejoices for what it has found. So, what looks bad on the surface has an essential function. I will speak to you again soon.

In the meantime, be here, be present. Don't lose yourself in the mind. Don't lose yourself in fear.

Find and be rooted in this rock that is your essence, identity. Thank you. When things go wrong, little things like last Sunday or bigger things, it's always a good test for your degree of presence.

So, it gives you a reflection of how present you are or how non-present you are when something goes wrong. Is there, so you can look back, it might be the case with you, maybe not. If you look back to last Sunday, was there a reaction of whatever kind against what is?

And what is was that Eckhart wasn't there. He didn't make it. Well, I was here, but didn't reach many of you.

So, Eckhart didn't make it to our appointed meeting. What was your mind saying? What did you verbally say, comments to people around you?

Or what did your mind comment about it? That's an interesting thing to look at. And accompanying the mental commentary, what was the emotion that went with it?

And some of you, I'm sure, were already so present that there was no sense of upset, disappointment, anger, irritation, some kind of mental complaint. And perhaps it was just, perhaps some of you just went into meditation, just became present and realized you don't need Eckhart to be present. Oh, wonderful.

But if there was a reaction, then it's very useful retrospectively. Usually I don't like, as you know, don't like to go to the past, but from time to time can be helpful to look at a past reaction in which perhaps where you lost consciousness, you lost presence. And you don't beat yourself up.

No, you just say, oh, that's interesting. There was the mind talking and there was an emotion going with it. And I was completely that.

I became that. It took me over. So whenever something goes wrong, big or small, you either react against it in one way or another.

In other words, you are against what is ultimately a dysfunctional state, which in extreme forms becomes insanity, normal insanity, I mean. So the reaction against what is or complete alignment with what is. And there you are.

That means whenever something goes wrong, you either react or you go deeper into presence, deeper into yourself. You can notice that with little things. When little things go wrong, you go a little bit deeper to a place where you don't need the external to be this way or that way because you already sense the fullness of life at this moment.

You already sense yourself as consciousness and nothing needs to be added to that. So sometimes it's only when things go wrong, quite often, it's only then for many people who are not yet able to voluntarily enter presence, only then the possibility of going deeper opens up for them or they become reactive. So another example, you're standing at a street corner meeting somebody, waiting to meet somebody for an appointment and he or she doesn't turn up.

So you stand there 10 minutes, 15 minutes, 20 minutes what happens during that time inside you, in your mind and what is your mind saying about it? And then of course, the emotions that go usually are reflection of what the mind is saying about it. It's an interesting thing to look at.

What is it that your mind is commenting and are you totally identified with what your mind is saying or do you realize, oh, these are just judgments that are coming up and there's the possibility, the opportunity for letting go of all interpretations at that moment as you're standing there at the street corner the person isn't turning up, letting go of all interpretations and just be there as the field of presence.

So to do that, you go deeper within where whatever happens on the surface of life doesn't determine any longer your state of consciousness, your happiness or unhappiness. And it's a wonderful sense of freedom. You can be free of externals.

And then at some point you call the person and say, where are you or where were you? And then there may be a perfectly reasonable explanation why he or she couldn't come or in which case all your mental commentaries which were perhaps negative are revealed as totally invalid, totally inaccurate. It was a total misinterpretation.

That's possible. Or it could be that your mental commentaries were justified and that person says, oh, I completely forgot I was doing something else. What's the reaction then in you?

Am I of so little importance to this person that he or she forgot about our appointment? That's an interesting thought. And that thought can lead to many other thoughts.

On a purely practical level, of course, if it happens several times and this person doesn't turn up then you simply don't arrange to meet with this person anymore. And can you do this without any negativity around it? That's just what is.

A very powerful state to immediately be with what is. That's what is. Instead of mentally saying it shouldn't be or strengthen your ego by complaining about it, the same as saying it shouldn't be.

Because the more you can complain about somebody, somebody or something, the more, the stronger the inflated ego becomes. Huffing and puffing, I call that. So the more you can huff and puff about people and what they do or this person and that, of course, the ego feels bigger and bigger.

It's like a balloon. The more you huff and puff, the bigger you get. Can you live without huffing and puffing?

Any complaining about others, what they do, what they fail to do, huffing and puffing. If you make a commentary in order to point something out so that something practical can be done about it is a different matter. But huffing and puffing is not like that at all.

It has nothing to do with changing the situation. What it changes is the way in which you deal with the situation, which becomes dysfunctional. So you can tell a person's presence by observing another person.

If that person never complains about anybody, that's a good sign. Presence doesn't complain about anybody. It's still relatively rare that you meet people like that, but perhaps you're already on your way or perhaps you're already at that state where you have relinquished all that futility of complaining about other people.

It's an enormous step forward. So let's welcome the many ways in which things can go wrong. In your life.

Not wrong means, of course, with quotation marks, go wrong. Doesn't go wrong. It's the mental interpretation says it's going wrong.

But we're using that conventional label, things going wrong, to point to something very important. Expectations are not being met. You're not getting what you want.

Something happens that shouldn't be happening or something fails to happen that should be happening like last Sunday. As you know, there are always two levels to this. I'm speaking and pointing out something that is helpful in your daily life.

At the same time, there is an underlying presence here. So that's why we call it meditation. It's not a conventional meditation.

But as I speak about becoming aware of a certain type of dysfunction, at the same time, there's a presence there. So it works on two levels here. And that's also why the pause is important when there are no words.

So that next time there is a something goes wrong, little or small, little or big, there's either already such presence that the reaction doesn't even arise or there's a reaction and then there is the recognition immediately after, to a second after or a minute after, there's the recognition that there is a reaction and there's a recognition that the mind is creating its story around the simplicity of what is. And there's the recognition that you don't need it. You're better off without it.

You're more effective in what you do when you're free of that. So there's a choice of then being present instead of reactive. And then the reaction subsides and presence takes its place, arises, the reaction goes.

And then that's an enormous thing when you suddenly realize in the very same situation, a minute ago, you were upset and reactive and then recognized it. The recognition comes, of course, from heightened presence and then you became the presence instead of the reaction. And then the reaction crumbles.

And then in the very same situation, in that minute later, you're free of upset and you feel empowered. It means externals no longer control you. So as I said, let's be grateful for all those occasions when things go wrong.

There are always an opportunity for going deeper. And if it's something big that goes wrong, something truly huge, something big crumbles in your life, then you'll have to go even deeper so the depths increases. When you just let go of a little upset, you go a little bit deeper.

But when something big happens, some big loss in your life, then you have to go even deeper. It's always miraculous to suddenly discover that you can be free of externals as far as your inner state is concerned. Occasionally you may experience low levels of physical energy and this can affect the mind too.

The important thing is first of all, when you talk about being depressed and so on, to see whether there is, what kind of thoughts are being created in your mind during that time. Ask yourself whether or examine whether the certain types of thinking create that feeling of depression. Thoughts like, oh, it's all pointless anyway.

Or what's the point of it all? I hate this world. There's no point in even struggling anymore.

I'm fed up, completely fed up with life. I can't take anymore. That type of thinking.

Are you aware, what is the relationship between the emotion that you feel and your thought processes? Are perhaps your thoughts creating that emotion or could it be that the emotion is creating the thoughts? So when you are depressed, there will be certain thoughts going through your mind and probably there will not be pleasant thoughts.

So be aware of the relationship between what you're feeling, this depressed feeling of sadness, depression. You feel dejected. And your thought processes.

And if in the moment of thinking, those types of thoughts that accompany the feeling of depression or pointlessness, if you can be there and observe those thoughts, then again, as in the first question, answer to the first question, when you recognize those thoughts, you no longer completely believe in them. You recognize them as a conditioned movement in your mind. And then you may be able to come to an acceptance of whatever it is you're feeling at this moment without adding the baggage of thought to it.

So what remains then is this feeling of perhaps low energy or it could be an activation of your pain body to some extent. You feel emotion in you that doesn't feel good, but you're then no longer fueling it with your thinking. So if there's enough awareness in you while you're going through a period of depression, allow yourself to feel what it is you're feeling, but be careful that you don't fuel it with your thinking.

And if you feel what you feel, that's all you have to do is surrender to your experience of this moment. You accept your experience of this moment, which at this moment may be not pleasant, but that's what is inside you. So probably the greatest spiritual practice is to accept whatever it is that you're experiencing at this moment.

So if you're experiencing depression, then that's the isness of the present moment. And as much as possible, you step out of your mind and just be the awareness. Observe, it may be the case that there is an addiction in you that periodically arises, and that's the addiction to unhappiness, the addiction to negativity.

And that is usually connected with a pain body that needs to renew itself periodically. If most of you will know what I'm talking about, you've read about the pain body, old emotion that still lives in you. Sometimes it's dormant.

Sometimes it needs to feed to take in more so that it can stay alive. It's a semi-autonomous energy field in you. And so in the absence of, its favorite way to feed is on other people's reactions.

So it will create drama. It will create, push your partners or other family members, people's buttons, so to speak, so that you get a negative emotional reaction. And so it loves the drama, the emotional drama, and will provoke drama.

And that's how the pain body loves to feed. But if that's for some reason is not possible, for whatever reason, the pain body is quite happy also to feed on your thoughts. So it will periodically rise up into your mind and then you will think thoughts that feed the pain body, but the thoughts themselves already created by the pain body.

And then it's a vicious circle. The negative thoughts that you don't want at that moment, you do not want to let go of that type of thinking because there's not enough awareness in you at that moment. At that moment, when I say you don't want to let go, or when I say you are addicted to your unhappiness, when I say you, it's not really you, it's a mind pattern with which you are that moment completely identified.

And that's why I call it you. So in that moment, it is you. So there are many, many people who are addicted to their unhappy states, the unhappiness in them.

And if some people have it almost continuously, but most people have periods when this happens and then it subsides. And that's the typical way in which the pain body arises from its dormant state, feeds on several hours or even days of deep negative thinking, and then subsides for a while you're free again. So addiction to unhappiness, this is one way of speaking about it.

Be careful, see whether you can detect in yourself when in the moment of it happening, you're almost, you're indulging in this feeling of could be self-pity or condemnation of life or others or whatever it is, you love it. You love that, you love those feelings and those thoughts, and you don't want to get out. If somebody at that moment said to you to come out of it, you say, oh, shut up, I don't want to hear.

Now, some people have them so strongly that the addiction to unhappiness has become part of their conditioned personality. So they are, part of their identity is a very unhappy sense of self. And if that is a terrible place to be in, but again, the only way that you can transcend that and escape from that prison is to be aware when it happens.

So a good question therefore is, am I enjoying my unhappiness in some weird way? Do I love my unhappiness? And if I love my unhappiness, who is that I that loves unhappiness?

Must be a weird and crazy I that loves unhappiness. So maybe that's not really me. Maybe it's just an unhappy self in me that loves.

I know that I had that very strongly for many years in my 20s. So you have to be really alert and see whether you enjoy your unhappiness. And once you notice it, you say, oh, wow, I'm really enjoying this.

In the moment of noticing it, you've made it conscious. And then it's very likely that you cannot go on very much longer enjoying it because this can only continue when you're unconscious. It needs your unconsciousness, this false self.

It's an aspect of the false self that is the ego. It needs your unconsciousness to continue to survive. But when you make it conscious, then there comes a moment of surprise and says, oh, wow, I'm actually enjoying this.

I don't want to let, I love this negative thoughts, love in a perverse way almost. This is the egoic kind of love. And then you might even ask, is that who I am?

Who am I? Why do I love this? This awareness is coming, awareness is arising.

And then suddenly you step out of identification with that mind pattern, mental emotion. And that is part of the awakening. So those things for many people are a very important part of their spiritual awakening.

The very important part of spiritual awakening is to become aware of the unconsciousness in you, the various ways in which the unconsciousness manifests in you, that's an extremely important part of awakening. In fact, you need that to provide fuel for the arising of presence. You don't have to be as slow as I am to be present.

I'm not always slow. But often. Interesting thing to find out for yourself if you've reached a stage in your spiritual evolution where you're able to choose to be free of thinking without exerting willpower to suppress thought and without stopping your breathing.

And without engaging in a life-threatening activity, which could easily stop your mind. Walking on a tight rope will certainly stop your mind for two seconds before you fall off. Now, some of you are able to do that when you're not being disturbed by anything or anybody.

Everything is fine. You're sitting quietly in your room or outside. And then you just go.

There's an intensity of awareness, but there's no willpower. You're not willing it to happen. You're not suppressing thought.

So if you're not yet there, that's fine. You can choose other ways of taking attention away from the stream of thinking by placing attention on sensory perception into your body, the inner body, or on your breathing that's happening naturally. So as the Buddha said, when they asked how to attain enlightenment, he said, just be aware that you're breathing.

Is that all they said? He said, yes. I don't know if that's in any of the scriptures, though.

But I'm sure that's what he said. He did recommend highly awareness of your breath. The rest was me adding something to it, which I do believe he did say, because every spiritual teacher is very simple.

Now, as long as you're aware that you're breathing, you can't be thinking. So he didn't say, don't think. He said, be aware of your breath.

So your attention moves away from mind and goes, you feel the inflow and outflow of the breath. You even feel every subtle movement of the breath where it enters your nose. Then it flows in and then it flows out and you follow it with your attention.

And while you're doing it, you're not breathing. You're not thinking. And then at some point you could let go of that too.

Then you're just not thinking. The important thing is you're above thinking. We're not talking about falling below thinking.

It's easy to tell the difference, but it's possible if you try to sustain the no thinking stage for too long, it's possible that without you noticing it, you're going. And then that means you're going from. It can happen very quickly.

If you go to a Buddhist monasteries where monks spent a long time meditating, you can observe how it happens to the monks. They start off and then they go after 20 minutes, half an hour, especially if it's 4.30 in the morning. And then you're able to be in that state of pure awareness or presence, even while things happen.

That's the next step, so to speak. Even while you're talking to your attorney, there's a court case coming up. Are you able to be in presence while you listen to what he has to say?

Or there's an obnoxious person in your vicinity and this is not an uncommon occurrence. Since a greater part of humans, if not are obnoxious, but periodically become obnoxious. In other words, very unconscious.

Humans move into different levels of consciousness and unconsciousness. It's not always the same person that you meet. It's a delusion.

Do you think once you have become acquainted with somebody that this is going to be the same person you're going to meet the next day? Because he or she may be in a very different state of consciousness the next day, or when an event happens to trigger that person into diminished consciousness, and then one of the sub-personalities that is associated with that diminished consciousness is suddenly there and talking to you. Who are you?

Who are you? And that's even more shocking if this happens after you've signed a contract that says you're going to live with this person for the rest of your life. And then the mind comes up with strange conclusions.

I won't trust anybody anymore. He really let me down. He's a liar.

He's just pretending to be nice. He was so nice when I, I know now I know he was just pretending. No, he was nice.

Perhaps he was at a relatively more conscious stage at that time, but now he's not nice because something that you said triggered him. And another sub-personality emerged, so to speak, or somebody mentioned the word money. You owe me.

And you can observe it in yourself that you're sometimes more conscious than at other times. You're sometimes very present, even in a challenging situation. At other times, a challenging situation or person pulls you into unconscious reactivity.

And then you wake up a few minutes or an hour later or a day. And as more consciousness emerges through you, the time period between unconsciousness and waking up again out of an unconscious reactive episode is shorter. You don't stay in it for a week, complaining about people and what they did to you.

Your mind never stops replaying a situation in your mind, different versions of it that could have happened if you only had said the right thing. And what you're, and then you can imagine, but next time you're confronted with this person, how it's going to unfold. And you feel angry and can't sleep at night.

And you don't even know what's happening to you until something suddenly, it actually is like waking up out of a dreamlike state. What was that all about? So as far as trusting other people is concerned, can you trust people?

Yes. Trust everybody. To behave, you can trust that they will behave according to their level of consciousness at any given time.

Complete trust. No more is possible. Now to be more integrated, to be a human being that is no longer taken over by reactive episodes to such an extent that virtually another person emerges temporarily, there needs to be more awareness that there still may be remnants of these subpersonalities surviving for a certain period of time in you, but they no longer take you over, that you can still feel the energy behind it when certain things happen. But what awareness does, it integrates all that.

It's no longer one entity that takes you over completely. And of course, especially the pain body as the most powerful subpersonality. And the pain body may even have two or three aspects to it.

So it could be divided into two or three other sub, but let's treat the same one as one huge subpersonality when it comes up. To have that no longer controlling you, that requires that energy field of awareness around it, its presence around it. And then you know it's still there, but it doesn't take over anymore.

Or if it does, then immediately after, you know, oops, there it was. So eventually awareness, then you become an integrated being with still a few energy flows here and there, but not a big deal anymore. Welcome to our live meditation, wherever you are, whatever the time is, where you are, it's the present moment, there's nothing else ever.

We're here to become comfortable with something very precious that is both within and without, within you and without you, outside of you. And that is stillness. If you lose touch with that, as many millions of people in our civilization have lost, touch with that inner stillness, you lose touch with that, no matter what you achieve or attain or do, it's always going to end up in frustration and some form of unhappiness because the foundation will be missing from your life.

Stillness, of course, is only a word. We use it here as a pointer. We could use other words, other pointers to that same reality within you that is usually overlooked, covered up.

Everybody has stillness deep inside, no matter how mad their mind may be. The French philosopher Pascal must have realized this important truth when he said, all of man's misfortunes derive from one single thing. And that is their inability to be at ease in a room.

Of course, that implies stillness, their inability to find that inner place. And so they cannot be at ease in a room, as he put it, which is at ease with themselves. They haven't touched that sense of inner being or rootedness that is the foundation of all spirituality.

So this is what we are here to realize, not to do because we are not doing anything. We are not doing a meditation. If you have the idea in your head that we are doing a meditation here, that will detract you from being.

We're not doing anything. We're not even saying, okay, now we have to become still. We don't have to become anything.

We just have to be with what is in this moment. And then find that underneath all the stream of thinking that usually gives you your sense of identity, there is something more vital that, however, cannot be defined through thinking. It is here, particularly in between the words, you encounter it as the space in between the words, which to the conceptual thinking mind is completely uninteresting and completely unimportant, completely meaningless.

So to the extent that you are completely trapped in your stream of thinking, our meditation here is meaningless to the conceptual mind. And if you are trapped in thinking, you are the conceptual thinking mind. You're unaware of any other dimension, so you are trapped on that surface level of who you are.

Or you could be aware of the gaps in between the words and just notice that there are gaps in between the words. What does that mean? What happens then when you notice, for example, now there's a gap, nothing is happening in that gap.

What is there in that gap? Is there anything in that gap between two words or between two thoughts? No, it's just a space.

And yet there must be something because there is an awareness that there is just a space. In this gap, there's still an awareness, an awareness that there's a gap, but there's nothing happening in that awareness. It's just a spacious awareness, an awareness of no thing, nothing.

And what happens inside you when you're aware of the gap? Suddenly you've become still or you've realized that dimension of stillness that's always there. In you, no thought.

For a moment, you're aware of the gap between two thoughts or in this case, a brief gap between sentences or words or even in between words. So in that gap, something arises within you that before was covered up by thinking or emotions that go with thinking. We could call that stillness, we could call that being, a sense of being or beingness, a deep sense of I am-ness, I am being, of course, the same as be, the first person singular of the verb to be.

The realization that you are, I am, that you are without any definition of who or what you are. In that space, there is an awareness you are that essentially. It is a very foundation for everything else.

When a thought comes, it can only come because there is an awareness in which the thought appears. When a sense perception comes, it can only be there because there is an awareness in which the sense perception appears. What you see, what you hear, what you touch, feel, taste, smell.

There is an awareness in which the world appears, a light in which it appears, you could say, a consciousness in which it appears, a field, a space. Whatever. The words don't matter.

The realization matters, that the foundation of who you are is that space or that light of consciousness. It has no form. You have no form on that level.

Everything else is form, thought forms, emotional forms, and sense perceptions of the physical forms around you. It's all form. Now, to most people, that's all there is.

Their life consists of absorption in forms, thought forms, sense perceptions, emotional forms. That's their life. They pursue form.

What's the next form that can be more fulfilling than this one because this one isn't fulfilling enough? It never is, never for long. No form can be fulfilling for that long.

It cannot serve as a foundation for your life. It's ephemeral, fleeting, short-lived, impermanent, comes and goes. But what is it that enables it to be?

You, the entire world arises where you are. An entire world, an entire universe arises at that focal point. But you are essentially not what arises.

You are the space. You are not the form. That's a temporary aspect of who you are.

So the most vital thing in your life on this planet here is the realization of who you are in essence and that essence has no form. It's just spacious consciousness. And that word is only a pointer, stillness.

Just a sense of being with no particular content. Now, does it have to be lost? Let's say you have glimpses of it here or perhaps more than glimpses.

Connectedness with who you are on the level of the formless and that you are the formless, the timeless. It goes together. Now, does this have to be confined to brief moments like this?

Or can that be active, an active realization in your daily life? When the world of form makes continuous demands on you, the demands made by the thinking mind, give me attention, says every thought, so that I can become bigger and so that I can give rise to lots of little children which are other thoughts. Give me attention.

I am so important, says every thought, and pulls your consciousness into it and your consciousness becomes form, the thought form, and more thought and more thought. And every emotion says, give me attention. I want to grow.

You can observe it even with anger, how the anger takes you over and wants to grow and use your mind, add more thought to it. I matter, give me attention. And in the outside world, every event, every situation says, it's so important.

It may be important relatively, but it's not important in absolute terms because whatever the problem is now won't be the problem in a few years or tomorrow or in 100 years. Everything changes. The people that lived on the planet 100 years ago, everybody had their life problems and dilemmas and difficulties and things they had to worry about and think about continuously, even at night.

And everything was so important, so important, my life. But it was only a tiny aspect of what, this wasn't truly my life, their life. They thought it was, most of them, and perhaps very few realized the deeper dimension where the problems and the preoccupations and whatever makes demands upon you on the level of form is secondary, is not of absolute importance.

As Jesus puts it, only one thing matters. He says to Mary, while Martha, her sister, is preoccupied with lots of things and busy. Only one thing matters, and you have chosen that one thing.

Many parables in Jesus is about the one thing, the one, he finds the one valuable coin and sells everything else. It's the one thing that truly matters. Everything else will be added, is an addition.

But there's a one thing, but of course the one thing is not a thing. We have to call it thing because words reflect things. The words in themselves things, but that one thing that matters absolutely is not a thing, it has no form.

It's not subject to decay. It's nothing to do with time. It's inseparable from who you are.

Welcome to another live meditation. We are not doing a meditation. It's not a doing, but we're becoming aware of the being behind all doing.

That's the presence. You are that. I'm not asking you to become still, but simply to discover that underneath all the thinking, you're already still.

So we could call this also a kind of retreat, a stepping back. Retreat, I suppose, means something like stepping back. Stepping back from the stream of thinking.

And there's then the essence of who you are, the presence, which has no form, the presence that is prior to thinking, to thought, but without which there couldn't be any thought. And so we are here to allow thinking to subside and then find out what's left when thinking subsides. And of course, you can't put a name really to what's left when thinking subsides, but you haven't gone to sleep.

Normally, when thinking subsides for people who are not yet awakened or awakening, when thinking subsides, that means they go to sleep. Or they are completely spaced out because they've taken some kind of substance. But here it's different.

The most wonderful discovery is you don't have to think all the time. And there's a power that's greater than thinking. And that's the presence.

So on the one hand, there is you as the person that consists of thinking, plus the emotions that go with thinking, feelings, emotions, sense perceptions, interpreted through thinking. That's you as the person. That's the person.

That's most people's only reality. And here you discover, well, most of you already have discovered it or it becomes obscured periodically. You discover there is another dimension to who you are.

That is deeper than thinking and sense perceptions and emotions. And that is called liberation. It liberates you from bondage to sensory perception, to thinking, and to the emotional ups and downs.

I say bondage because that really is how it is when you are identified with form, which is what it is, sense perceptions, forms that arise, sensory formations, sounds, images, so on. Thinking, identified with every thought that arises. Emotions, identified with every emotion that comes.

That's bondage. You are in the grip of all these things that come and go. And then you discover that there is another dimension that doesn't come and go, although your awareness of it may come and go.

And that is the presence. We could also call it, I sometimes call it the space around the things that come and go. The space behind, the space around.

And that is essentially who you are, the timeless being, the consciousness. So there is a kind of detachment that comes with that awareness. Detachment means you're not attached anymore.

So you contemplate the world, and the things that come into your field of consciousness that arise visually and all the other senses. And you're not attached, and you don't compulsively judge it anymore as it arises. That's really what creates the attachment.

And that's why in Shakespeare, in one of his plays, it says, there's neither good or bad, but thinking makes it so. And that's the attachment to whatever arises every moment. Sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions.

And as you become aware of yourself as the underlying presence, a kind of spaciousness is suddenly there inside you. Not only when you sit like now, it's easier to sense, to feel that as we are here, but also when you start talking to someone. You say what you have to say, and then it becomes second nature to you that you are then, in addition to what you have to say, what's the thoughts, the words that come out of your mouth, there's still an awareness of that space around all the things.

It's very hard to put this into words because it has no form. So then you are both the speaker and the thinker, and more fundamentally, you are also the space out of which the thinking arises, and the words. So that's why I sometimes say there's a space around everything suddenly, and you are, that gives you a sense of, ah, it's, life is, you're no longer in the grip of everything that comes and goes.

There's a, this is detachment, one could say. There's a sense of spaciousness around everything that arises in your life. Without that, you are trapped, and you're in the grip of all your old conditioning which runs your mind, the old conditioning that determines your emotional, mental reactions.

And of course, basically, you're asleep, and thinking you're awake. It's a dream, often not a very pleasant dream, or the pleasant moments are few and far between. So another way of putting this is that you, you know there's something called lucid dreaming, which is when you're having a dream at night, you're in bed, and in the middle of the dream, you suddenly become aware that you're dreaming.

That's quite a lovely thing to realize. Oh, this is a dream, and then you look around, and you experience in a totally different way with detachment, and you're still interested. You say, wow, this is amazing.

It's a dream. So it's called lucid dreaming. Sometimes happens to people just accidentally, and others, some people actually try to cultivate that, which you can do before going to sleep.

You can bring awareness, say, I'm going to be conscious in my dreams. But much more important than that is to have lucid living, because without lucid living, everyday living is a kind of dream. So it is similar then, this lucid living is similar to lucid dreaming, because there comes an awareness into your life that wasn't there before, or was obscured.

And from there, your experience of life, your life experience becomes much more pleasant and interesting, just like in a dream, when you become aware, oh, this is a dream, and suddenly, whatever happens in that dream is not that frightening anymore, because you know it's a dream. You could actually look at something that scared you before, because you know it's a dream, and you look, whoa, that monster doesn't look that bad. It's actually quite interesting.

And of course, in a dream, if you look at a monster in a dream that before frightened you that you couldn't bear to look at, very often it becomes transformed into a benign presence. And that's even a mythological motive. If you give it your attention, a transformation happens.

It's only if you try not to look, you don't give it your attention, it is threatening. So that happens in a dream. If you give it your attention, which you can now do, because you know it's a dream, and then you can look at whatever is there in the dream, and in the act of looking, it's not just a passive thing.

That's the amazing, the looking at the dream images is not just a passive thing. The act of looking, giving conscious attention, transforms that which you are looking at. And really, and ultimately, that also applies to lucid living.

It's not just that internally you, there's a transformation in the way in which you perceive the world and in the way in which thinking happens, transformation because of that added dimension of spaciousness or depth. It's also, your life experience also changes. It's not just how you perceive it changes.

For example, when you interact with another human being on whatever level, whatever kind of relationship it is, if you're there not only as the person saying what you have to say, your opinions, what needs to be done, your viewpoints, there's not only that, there's also the space, you as the person and you as the space. And when you bring in that dimension of spaciousness, presence, depth, that is there in the background or around whatever it is that you say, you feel, so how does it look in practice? You're talking to somebody, whatever you need to talk about, discuss, and at the same time, you can still feel, let's put it like this, you can still feel a presence or spaciousness in the background as yourself, a space around what it is that you're saying.

There's still an awareness of awareness around the thoughts and the words. A moment of spaciousness. No thinking is required at this moment.

We wouldn't add anything. Do it and be aware of yourself and what's around you. So the consciousness that you are makes this possible.

The light of consciousness. If you cannot yet in your daily life step from thinking into awareness, freedom from thinking for a moment, then you just use one of the portals, inner body, breath awareness, acute attention to sensory perception. And after a while, you can just step out of thinking when it's not needed or reduce thinking to just a trickle.

And then presence arises and you sense it with your entire energy field. And gradually, this power grows in you. The power itself doesn't grow, but its manifestation in you grows.

Presence, power grows in you. At first, it seems nothing remarkable. Even uninteresting.

But first you notice it frees you from a lot of turmoil, mind generated. And then it deepens you because it is the deeper I, the deep I that emerges, the deep self, the deep I. Don't wait for emergency situations to become present.

Don't wait for life to knock you, give you a jolt, a shock. Choose it in ordinary moments. Then it grows in you.

And when life does something to you, it can only intensify the presence instead of taking you out of presence into reactivity. You respond, but don't react. Reaction is on the conditioned mind.

Responding is out of presence. As I said before, with reaction, you are at the mercy of events and people. Your inner state is at the mercy of other people, their behavior towards you or in general.

And you're at the mercy of what's going on around you. Always like somebody's nice and somebody's not nice. That's reactive.

Responses comes out of, you can't predict. Reactions you can predict in people. If you have lived with somebody for a while, you know exactly how they are going to react when you say this or when that happens.

You learn how they react. You know it beforehand. You can push their buttons if you wanted to, and you know exactly how they're going to react.

Totally predictable because they are programmed to react in certain ways. That's their conditioned mind. But when they become present, you can't predict anymore how they're going to respond because they won't be reacting.

Maybe they'll just be there. Who knows? And you can't predict what you, how you will respond to certain situations.

People sometimes ask, what would you do if this happened to you? I don't know. The new possession, nice and shiny, whatever it is, and there you look at it.

Got it now. It's mine. And after a few days or a week or two, it wears off.

You can actually enjoy all manifestations of life from the tree to the store display at Tiffany's, if you want. It's just life. You don't necessarily need to, you don't, at that stage, you don't need to have anything because you're already enjoying all that.

And that is a wonderful feeling of abundance already, but you have to be in the background. There needs to be the connectedness. So there is a certain powerful field of stillness as you walk around Fifth Avenue, looking at everything.

You need to have a stronger connection on Fifth Avenue than you need in the middle of the forest. But it's not that you can't be in that place on Fifth Avenue. You can.

So if you're walking out in the middle of a big city, of course you get all kinds of, your attention is pulled this way and that. And the staying rooted in that field so that you're not dependent on your environment to feel peaceful. If you're dependent on your environment to feel peaceful, then, oh, I can't be peaceful here.

I need to go out somewhere else. Yes, I'm often mentioned, of course, that nature is helpful. It is wonderful to go out to nature.

But if you are dependent on nature to become still and peaceful, then your life becomes restricted. And there is a lack of depth still. You're dependent on a certain environment.

Fine, you love nature, that's beautiful. You love being in nature, that's wonderful. But you are then dependent on that and you cannot take that state of aliveness into the city.

So it requires greater depth and intensity, aliveness, so that you can enjoy the aliveness everywhere, wherever you are. In all manifestations of life, see them as temporary play, the temporary play of forms, because that's what it is. There's nothing permanent here, nothing permanent.

If you take a movie picture of Fifth Avenue, let's just stay with Fifth Avenue. That stands for all cities and all streets. If you took a movie camera to Fifth Avenue and film all the people running around the street, and then a few years later, let's say 50 years, you watch the film, then most of the people running around Fifth Avenue will have disappeared already, not only from Fifth Avenue, but from the planet.

So you watch ultimately insubstantial life forms going about their business or their play. They call it business, but it is play. And to them, it's serious, but it's not.

It's a play of life, includes Wall Street. If you know it's play, it's fine, but you can only know it's play through being connected to that which is deeper than the forms in yourself, then you recognize the forms as the play of form. But if you are not connected with the depths of being in yourself, you don't recognize the movement of form as the play of forms, because to you then, that's all there is.

And then there comes a neediness. I need these forms to make me happy. And there comes a concern and seriousness about forms because that's all you seem to have.

So you get unduly anxious about the forms of life. And everything is very serious. So most people in big cities are serious, going about their business.

And there's fear underlying the seriousness. They're serious because they are ultimately in a state of concealed to themselves fear. And they're trying to get somewhere.

They never get there, but they're always on the way somewhere, very important to get this done. They never get it done because they do this and then there's something else. Lack of, that's not abundance.

There can be no true feeling of abundance if you don't recognize the playful nature of the world. If you are dependent for your sense of fullness on the forms, there's no abundance. You're just seeking more forms to fill your life up with.

So here we have then fundamental, at the most fundamental level, abundance is being in touch with a source of life within yourself and recognizing it as the essence of who you are, of course. And then look around and experience the sensory world. And then you can participate in the play without completely losing yourself in it and enjoy the play of form.

And then you experience, as you do that, you experience another level of abundance. That is the abundance of experiences, of experiencing life in various ways through where you go, what you do, relationships, sensory experience even, and even there, you don't get lost in it. You can even enjoy food.

Tastes good. Without the addictive enjoyment that is very different, that goes, I need more of this. And then there's come, you want to, you need to take it in to, more, more, more.

And it draws you out of, yes, you, where's the next, the next sex object? And it, of course, it draws you out of, out there. You can enjoy sensory experience without becoming addicted to sensory experience.

And that is to being able to enjoy sensory experience and whatever you do is also abundance. It's a part of the fullness of life. And then it's possible that also things come into your life and then you can enjoy things also for what they are without getting worked up about owning them or fear of loss.

Enjoy something beautiful, why not? But not obsessively accumulating one thing after another pointlessly, but to honor the world of things also is part of being here. So as things come to you, so you're not really, you don't need to seek abundance for the sake of abundance.

You have to go to the place of abundance. From there, different levels of abundance manifest in your life. They may include the outermost level things coming to you.

All being said already in the New Testament by Jesus, seek only that connectedness with the source within yourself, which he called the kingdom of heaven. And all the other things that you thought you needed for your happiness will be added unto you. You thought you need it, you don't need them anymore for your happiness, but they will be added.

So to appreciate beautiful things is also part of abundance. And you don't always need to own what you appreciate. You can appreciate beautiful things for a while that you see that somebody else has.

You can say, oh, that's a beautiful thing you have without the compulsion to say, I need to have that too. Appreciate it. You can look.

When I lived in London, I would sometimes enjoy walking along Regent Street and Bond Street where the expensive shops are and look in the windows. I couldn't afford a single item that I saw in these windows, but I didn't really want it. Just enjoying some of the beautiful things.

And two minutes is enough, okay, I've enjoyed it now. I couldn't have bought it, but I didn't really need it. Even if I'd had the money, I don't believe I would have bought it.

Maybe one or two things I might have bought, but not more. So you can visit somebody's home and say, oh, this is so beautiful without mentally saying, oh, his thing is much more expensive than mine. It used to be the custom in Spain, it's probably no longer the custom because the country has become modernized.

When you visited somebody's home and you said, oh, isn't this beautiful? The host would immediately say, take it, it's yours. It's yours.

Of course, you are not supposed to take it. You would have been shocked. Some foreigners did make that mistake.

So to go about wanting to manifest material abundance in your life is perhaps not the right way to go about it. Because you're concentrating on the outermost layer of abundance. And even if you manage to manifest abundance on the outer level, it's not going to give you the true feeling of abundance.

It's not, in other words, it's not going to make you happy. It's not going to fulfill you except for a few days. The new possession, nice and shiny, whatever it is, and there you look at it, got it now, it's mine.

And after a few days or a week or two, or give it a month, it wears off. It's no longer that fulfilling to be driving the Ferrari or whatever it is. There's nothing wrong with the Ferrari, but if you're looking to the Ferrari for happiness and fulfillment, and to give you the feeling of, it's not going to work for that long.

If you're just driving it because you enjoy that experience, that's a different matter. There's a very, there is a difference here. So don't condemn the world of things.

This has been done traditionally by many religious people. They were afraid of it. And so don't go there.

You must not have any possessions in many religious orders and so on, not just Christian, but also other religions, monks, nuns. No, you must not have any possessions. In some traditions, Buddhist monks are not allowed to touch money.

Of course, I can see the reason behind it, but it would be even greater, of course, if you could touch money and you're free of attachment to the money that you touch. I'm not attached to it, and then you can touch it. It's fine.

Rather than being a, ooh. And of course, you're not allowed to touch a woman. Oh, ooh.

Ooh. It's dangerous because, of course, the reasoning behind it is it will take you into complete unconsciousness. The sexual urge will arise up in you and will make you totally unconscious.

Maybe that's the reason why in some cultures, women are covered, scared. It could be chaos. And yet, if you are connected with a source, then all that is not a problem.

So manifesting abundance is not really the right way. Go to the source and allow from the source for abundance if it wishes to manifest in your life. You start with the source.

Then you go into enjoying all the forms of life, next level of abundance. Then you enjoy relating with the forms of life, the play of whatever you do in life. You enjoy that, and then that is how, and out of that enjoyment of what you do, that energy most likely also brings things into your life, forms that before you thought you needed desperately to feel abundance.

So they come as an icing on the cake, and you might give them away again if they come. You have them for a while, just, oh, I've had this for long enough. Now you have it.

And so the flow is there beautifully. As you give things away, new things come. And if they're all taken away from you, it's fine too.

You're quite happy with that. So manifest abundance from the inside out, not from the outside as hoping that you go find some inner state through external things. That is a dilemma of many people who practice manifesting, which of course manifesting is something that you can use, and it works if it's done rightly.

But the dilemma or the fallacy is the belief that whatever you manifest is going to make you happy. It's to seek the fullness of life through what you manifest, through things. And that doesn't really work.

So when people manifest something in that way in their lives, a material thing, initially they're quite elated. I've got it now, I've got the house or whatever it is that I wanted to manifest. And then that manifestation wears off and after a while brings about its own problems and a new level of problems.

And the feeling of fullness does not stay. It doesn't stay with them. Nothing can give it to you, can give you the true feeling of abundance.

And that's the amazing thing, which implies nothing that you achieve in the future can get you there. You have to start with that. And you don't need to ask for things to be different in your life.

You start here now where you are. And here now you go within and see if you can find that place within where life is born. Continuously, but which itself, in itself is unborn, timeless, consciousness itself.

As promised, I checked the news this morning. So that you don't have to do it. And I didn't find anything extraordinary.

But as I was reading, I got inspired to share with you the first, although it's not extraordinary, to share with you the first news item today as a spiritual practice. And for this reason, I brought this device. The good thing about it, it saves trees, which otherwise would be used for newsprint.

So what I'll share with you is a very brief news item, which was at the top. If I read it to you in the normal way, it would take 30 seconds to read, but I'll read it to you in a different way so that it can become a spiritual practice. Listening to it can become a spiritual practice.

And that is with lots of spaces between the words and the spaces between the words and sentences, while they happen, I'd ask you as part of your spiritual practice to pay attention to the silence in this room, because the silence in this room is ultimately, one could say, what makes the sounds possible. If there were not silence in this room, there could be no sounds. And as you know, I mentioned yesterday, and you probably know it already, both conceptually and from your own experience, that when you pay attention to external silence, immediately there's inner stillness.

So that's one way of accessing inner stillness is to notice when it's there, to notice external silence around you. Once you are able to connect with inner stillness, you no longer need silent conditions around you, although you might welcome them when you encounter them. It's lovely, but you could be still in the midst of traffic and a shopping mall and a noisy restaurant, because most restaurants these days are noisy.

I don't know if it's the same here. It's hard to find a restaurant without loud music. Because people who are identified with the mental noise actually become very uncomfortable with silence.

Ooh. And so you have in some places in North America, elevators, some of them even have music playing, and some elevators not only have music, they have a TV screen too. So while you're ascending or descending, you're not condemned to having to suffer this dreadful silence for a few seconds.

You can continue to clutter your mind by watching the screen and continue in your state of habitual hypnosis. So to be able to listen to something and then be aware of that dimension, the underlying dimension, ultimately, of course, it's consciousness, the formless dimension, so that you don't get totally drawn into, hypnotized by the world, the mind. And that, by doing that, you bring sanity into this world.

Now, the news item I'm going to read is, it could be regarded as funny, it could be regarded as potentially terribly, terribly serious, it's a mixture. But no matter what perspective you have on it, whether it's funny or potentially terribly, terribly serious, it is important that you connect with the transcendent dimension. Otherwise you contribute to the lostness, if that's a word, the lostness of the world.

The world is lost. Humans are lost, lost in their minds, lost in crazy, compulsive, habitual mind patterns, collective mind patterns. So even if it's serious, it's very important to be aware of the transcendent dimension.

And even if it affected you, it's particularly important to be connected with that. And then you no longer, you become free of fear by being connected to the stillness within, which is more than that. We just, it's one of the words we can use to talk about it.

So be as interested in the words that I read, be as interested in the silence, noticing, listening to, being aware of the silence in this room, which ultimately is the stillness within you, because only with the stillness within you can you be aware of outer silence. So be as interested in, so to speak. It's not the right word because silence is not interesting.

It's deeper than interesting. Only things that you can dissect and think about are interesting. So the news item may be interesting.

The underlying silence is not interesting. There's a vast depth to it, but it's as uninteresting as the most spectacular sunrise or sunset. You go, wow.

But nobody says, oh, that's such an interesting sunset. Let's think about it. What can be so interesting, this sunset, isn't it?

No, you don't, because when you respond to beauty, some vast beauty out in nature, you don't approach it with a thinking mind, because the moment when you really are overwhelmed by some grand spectacle in nature, your mind stops and awareness remains. And you go, allow the mind to subside, which means thinking right now is not important. Something else is important.

Meditation begins when thinking is recognized as not all important. And you begin to sense there's something in you that's deeper than thinking. And becoming aware of that dimension beyond thinking, that's meditation, not below thinking, in which case you would go into sleep, but above thinking, so to speak.

So right here and now, how do you become aware of that dimension? Simply by becoming aware of yourself, not the historical self, person, but a more fundamental sense of beingness or presence that is always there, but most people don't know it's there. And so for them, it is as if it didn't exist.

So meditation is becoming aware of yourself as a sense of presence. And that sense of presence could also be called stillness and could be called many other things. And realizing that dimension within yourself is the most important thing for you in this life.

In this lifetime, it's a kind of foundation for all that is good in your life. And if you're not aware of that dimension that transcends the person, it means that continuously you derive your sense of who you are from the movement of your mind. Which is thought.

And nothing is going to give you lasting fulfillment if you haven't found that dimension. In other words, life becomes frustrating, frequently upsetting, consisting seemingly of a succession of problems and conflict situations, things going wrong, continuously demanding your attention. With an unspoken promise, which is an underlying assumption, unconscious, that at some point your life is going to work out and will be fulfilling and become free of your problems.

Perhaps a better relationship, better place to live, better work situation, improved health situation. And then when you come into the new situation, it seems at first, yeah, this is better. And then the old patterns reemerge in the new situation.

In other words, it's no longer fulfilling. So nothing in this world can be fulfilling for long if you haven't transcended the person and the historical sense of self. To be, this is the being dimension, to become aware of the simple fact that you are.

I am, when you make that statement, you say, I am. And you can sense the meaning behind the fact that you are the words. You can sense the meaning, but you cannot understand it.

I'm using the word understand as conceptual knowledge, conceptual realization. You cannot understand conceptually what I am means or points to, you have to give up wanting to understand, which means you have to give up thinking. And although I am is still a thought, a word, but behind the word is the thought.

It takes you to the edge. And what it points to is beyond thinking. What it points to is that you can become aware of being conscious right now.

So you're becoming aware of yourself as a space of consciousness. And that's who you are. That's the very foundation for your sense of identity.

I am. So, when you become aware of that, there's no dualities to the dualities there when I speak about it, because of the way a sentence is constructed, subject and object. So I am aware of consciousness.

I'm aware of awareness. Sounds like duality. It sounds as if there's the I that is conscious of consciousness.

But the I and consciousness are synonymous. They're one and the same. So you cannot be aware of awareness.

Ultimately, although when we speak about it, it sounds like it. What it really means is you become self-aware. Consciousness, which is you, becomes self-aware.

That's meditation. If you need a technique to get you there, use it. Don't get attached to it.

Ultimately, it's not the technique. And it's not a doing. If you're thinking, I'm doing a meditation, you can't do meditation.

And even to say, I meditate, is misleading. And can become an obstacle, the idea that I am meditating or I have to meditate. Because it implies that you're doing something.

Doing takes time. Meditation is the realization of the timeless dimension of consciousness. So it can't be a doing.

It's only when doing is relinquished, you become aware of doing. Being. Like now.

So there's the timeless dimension, which is inseparable from who you are in your essence, which at the same, is also the timeless dimension of the universe. So the ability to be still, or to realize the stillness that's already there within yourself, and not believing that you need to still your mind, which becomes almost a battle, becomes a doing. But to realize, even if your mind is in turmoil, underneath it, there's a stillness, like the deep waters, the depths of the ocean.

And you realize that just by becoming aware of yourself, not the historical self, but the I presence. So in itself, of course, it's neutral. The technology is neutral.

It's not either bad or good. It depends how it's used. It is, at the moment, it is to a large extent, a reflection of the unconscious mind.

So if you want to learn about human unconsciousness, if you want to learn about the human ego, just go there and read what people post. Look at the reactivity of people on social media, and so on, the comments they leave. You can learn a lot about unconsciousness and identification with mental positions.

So the first thing, of course, is be careful with what you put out there, what kind of thing you post. If you post things online, is it reactive? Give yourself a moment when you read something before you type in an answer or a comment.

Give yourself a moment and go within, and avoid making people wrong. You can talk about issues, but don't make people wrong and amplify your ego by making others wrong, even though their position, political or otherwise, you may regard as completely misguided or erroneous. There's still a human being behind that.

So you can put forward arguments against somebody's perspective or viewpoint without making another human being wrong. So what you put out is very important. Is your communication conscious or not?

Or is it reactive? And then it can be used for other purposes. I'm there too sometimes.

There are certain places where I appear on, could go to YouTube or whatever, and then suddenly there's a spiritual teacher talking. So do you professionally work with, what exactly do you do in your work that involves the media or?

[Speaker 2] (3:29:34 - 3:29:48)
Pretty much involves the creation, the ideas around the digital products and services. So creating the product that people actually use and designing the interfaces that people actually use on their phones and on their computers.

Right. There are some meditation sites on all these things. So there's a great potential for raising consciousness there.

Somebody recommended to me several apps for meditation, which I now have on my phone. I haven't tried them yet. I've been there for a while, but I have four or five that are there.

I want to try them out. So that's the very thing that otherwise would clutter your mind can actually also be used to bring about space or spaciousness in your mind. So it doesn't necessarily mean that when you have your phone or the 99% of cases when people look there, their mind is being cluttered, but maybe they're on a meditation app.

Maybe they're looking at a beautiful, spacious picture and all listening to some sound or something, take a conscious breath, have a little reminder every two hours to take a conscious breath and bring spaciousness. Oh yes, spaciousness. So the very same thing that otherwise clutters your mind can now unclutter your mind.

It's possible. So I believe that it's also going to grow now and it has to because otherwise that technology could potentially drive humans completely insane, to remove their ability to focus on anything for more than a few seconds. People create young people who are totally uncentered, have no spaciousness within.

Don't even communicate with humans anymore because they prefer to communicate digitally. So these things are important, but what you put out is important. So always take into consideration whether this brings people to presence or whether it clutters somebody's mind.

And perhaps you can combine, of course, what you do needs to be also commercially viable. So, but I believe you can combine the two. It's not necessarily a question of either it's commercially viable and it clutters people's minds or it's presence and we are going to go out of business.

Doesn't have to be like that. It's up to you to be creative. Use, the more still you are, the more creative insights you will have into, and you might get some amazing ideas of what is possible.

I can't tell you what is possible. I don't know enough about it. I know very little about it.

So, but you're in a wonderful position. So allow yourself to go deep enough within, because then it is then the creative ideas seem to come. And if you find a thing that is not only brings people to presence, but also helps your company to grow, then that then becomes a conscious business, which is wonderful.

It's challenging. Of course, it's challenging. So don't let all your attention be absorbed by that kind of activity.

Take still, you still need to connect with nature, take it off as much as possible away from there, connect with nature and then bring it back. Another thing that's just in connection with this, not perhaps directly related to your question, but related to this, what tends to happen is that these devices, people are never, they're still in bed and they're still doing stuff on it. And that takes you over there at dinner and they're doing stuff on it.

It breaks the relation with other people. You're at dinner with, I can see, I see people in restaurants, the couple sitting at having dinner together and both are on their phones. Now that's probably means they have known each other for a while.

If it happens on the first date, that's the first date will probably be the last one. But if happens after they've known each other for two years, then it's almost a normal thing that they're not present with each other. Or then they exchange a few words and then she looks at the phone again and then he stares into space and then she's still on her phone.

I've actually observed it. She's still on her phone and he's staring into space. And then finally he gets out his phone too because he doesn't want to be staring into space.

And then I wonder, are they texting each other? Right? Two good things that I learned that in some huge companies, I believe it might be VW in Germany.

Well, they've had enough problems, but now they tell their employees after 6 p.m., they're not allowed to use the company phones anymore, not to deal with emails or anything. They need to get off. And that's a very wise thing because the more people's attention gets absorbed by this, the more confused and non-creative they become, the more cluttered their minds become, the more ineffective they're even at their work.

Not to mention as human beings, their quality of life decreases enormously. So don't give yourself spaces. Don't allow these things to take over your life.

That's vitally important. So it's wonderful that some big companies like that have this policy now, no emails or anything after 6 p.m. Well, that's wonderful. I talked a couple of years ago to Arianna Huffington, who has a famous news website and has also written some books.

And she describes in her latest book how her life deteriorated more and more, although she was making a lot of money. And finally she collapsed and hit her head on her desk and it was complete breakdown. And now she has, for example, in her private life, and that's a good thing, she has this policy of no digital device in my bedroom.

So in her bedroom, she still has books. Sometimes she reads in bed, but it has to be a book, not a Kindle, not the iPad, not the iPhone, no digital device in my bedroom. And that's a good thing to have that, at least you have that space for yourself.

Welcome to our live meditation. It's all about becoming still within, which means not to be engaged in the stream of thinking. The stream of thinking has a very strong pull for almost everybody, because for most people, their entire sense of who they are and their sense of self, sense of identity is bound up with their stream of thinking.

The stream of thinking, which includes, of course, reactions, likes, dislikes, opinions, mental positions, a story, my story. It's all in the stream of thinking, accompanied a lot by certain emotions that reflect whatever is going on at any given time in the mind, in the stream of thinking. So that is most people's, that is the basis for most people's sense of identity.

The I sense, who I am, or think I am. The most amazing discovery you can make in this lifetime is the discovery that you don't have to think to be yourself. There's another dimension in you that has nothing to do with thinking, but out of which thinking arises.

So it's perhaps not totally right to say it has nothing to do with thinking. Thinking arises out of it. It could, thinking could not exist without that dimension, but that dimension in itself is far beyond thinking, much deeper, vaster.

And as I speak to you about this here and now, I suggest that you become aware of the gaps between words because it is there that that dimension is known. You might notice the gap between words, the space between words, between sentences. That space is just that, it's space.

It has no content. The words are the content within the space. And most people are never aware of the space, but only aware of the content.

So here you'll become aware of the space within, which we can also call stillness. And you realize beyond any thoughts that there is a presence there. It is a presence.

And if you can sense yourself, feel yourself, sense yourself as the presence with no particular attributes, not that underlying sense of beingness or presence is not old or young. It's not successful or a failure. These are all mental labels that you give yourself or other people give yourself and you accept them.

Not young or old, not successful or unsuccessful, rich or poor, even man or woman. So it's nothing to do with that. It's deeper than that.

All the story, your life history, or your life situation right now, whatever your situation is in the realm of relationships, finances, work situation, living situation, health, they all make up who you are on the level of form, but they are not who you are on a deeper level. And at that deeper level, you are simply conscious presence. There must be something to do or think about or worry about.

Just to endure it and suddenly you feel alive without mental stimulus. What is boredom? Why this pervasive unsatisfactoriness that I feel everywhere, but most intensely when I'm alone with nothing to do, pervasive unsatisfactoriness that I feel everywhere, but most intensely when I'm alone with nothing to do.

What is this? It's called boredom. That's a good way of putting it, pervasive unsatisfactoriness.

And of course there's a whole industry designed to help you not feel this pervasive unsatisfactoriness. In other words, to stop you from being bored. So you can always, as most people probably do, they always provide their mind with some kind of stimulus.

And these days that's not difficult to do. It's available everywhere. So the mind wants to be stimulated.

It's always hungry for the next thing. So when people get home from work, immediately their mind needs to go into the next thing. And once you've cooked your dinner and eaten your dinner, then the mind goes into what's the next thing?

Is it television? Is it picking up a phone? Is it internet?

Is it emailing or texting? Is it teenagers too? And many others.

There's nothing bad about it. It's fascinating. I recently started occasionally texting and it's quite fascinating.

But what is important to become aware of the mind's demand for food, for stimulus? And if you don't get it, immediately you get into a state of restlessness or pervasive unsatisfactoriness, as the questioner says. You don't feel at home.

You don't feel there's something. Of course, that feeling is always there. It's just it's obscured by the mind.

So that means if you continuously feed your mind with these things, you never reach the deeper levels within yourself. You're stuck. You have to at some point confront the unsatisfactoriness without continuously anesthetizing the unsatisfactoriness and getting some kind of substitute for true aliveness, because that's really what it is.

You don't really feel alive, the aliveness. So you need some kind of stimulus to get a sense of being alive. So it's important to be able to just stop feeding the mind all the time.

There's enough for the mind to do with the things that it really needs to do. And just sit with yourself and allow boredom to arise without running away from it. Because that's your first, you're beginning to go a little bit deeper, but first you need to send to feel that.

And if you don't run away from it, you can actually go through boredom. It's like suddenly you're through. So it becomes, it's a little obstacle there inside you.

But if you don't run away, stay with it, suddenly before you know it, you've gone deeper into yourself, especially if it might be helpful to feel the inner body while you sit, when boredom begins, boredom comes in, you can feel it. You start looking around. What's the next thing I can do or think about?

There must be something to do or think about or worry about even better. And you stay and you notice that. And then you just endure the discomfort of the mind not getting enough stimulus, food.

And it doesn't, it's not that bad. It's just, you just endure it and then begin to feel the inner body, the aliveness in your hands, your arms, your feet, your legs. And you've already gone through the thresholds of the boredom into something deeper.

And suddenly you feel alive without mental stimulus. Much, actually more alive than you could ever feel through mental stimulus. Because mental stimulus is always on the surface of who you are, ripples on the surface.

And now you go deeper. And then you have the ability to sit or stand or lie and be at ease with the here and now. It's all there ever is, life, here and now.

Be at ease with yourself, here and now. To feel at home, here and now without needing to escape into some mental realm that's not here and now. Need to think about that.

Need to play a video game. Need to watch this program. Look at the magazine at least.

You can see how people, the mind consumes. See how they look through magazines, go to waiting rooms or into people's homes. Nowadays, magazines seem, in many cases, are being replaced by the screen.

But people still, so they go. A greedy search for what's the next, and nothing is quite interesting enough. It's always the next thing.

So that's the dysfunction. And so the wonderful, this ability then grows in you of being rooted in the present moment, in yourself, without needing some mental external stimulus to make you feel complete or alive. In fact, it's only now that you really come to life.

There was a famous French philosopher lived a few hundred years ago. Was it Pascal? Or perhaps, who said, all the problems of humankind and can be traced back to man's ability, man includes women, can be traced back or have their origin in man's inability to sit quietly in a room.

All the problems of the world can be traced back to your inability to sit quietly or at ease in a room. Of course, the implications are deep and vast. It's not just sitting quietly in a room, but because sitting quietly in a room implies for you to be able to do that, to sit quietly in a room, you need to be connected with that which is deeper in you than the mind.

Otherwise, you can't sit quietly in a room. You'll be bored. You may be quiet on the outside, but you won't be quiet inside.

So you go within, use the inner body as a starting point for going deeper and taking your attention away from where it's usually lodged in the thinking mind. So you go through boredom into being. And suddenly, you enjoy just being.

That's an enormous awakening if you can just enjoy the simple fact of being. And then you, from that state of aliveness of being, you can look around you and find pleasure and satisfaction in what you see or hear or perceive with your whatever sense. The little things around you, their quiet presence, the flowers, the table, the curtains, whatever is there, the sky through the window, the room, the totality of the room, the quietness, and it's all lovely.

Lovely. So you don't need all these substitutes anymore. You may still, of course, you still use the internet or you use it for, but not anymore to, continuously, because you cannot stand being with yourself.

You can't stand yourself. And that's the reality for most people. Think of that or realize what that means, how dysfunctional that is.

You can't stand yourself. That's why you continuously run into this and into that and into that. And if a person who cannot stand him or herself, of course, what kind of relationships is that person going to have?

If you can't stand yourself, then you're using others to make you feel a little better, but that doesn't work. And basically, the inability to be with yourself gets reflected and projected onto others also. And comes the ability of being with other humans, because at first you try to use them and then you can't stand them either.

So you have to break through that mental barrier because otherwise you spend the rest of your life not being able to sit quietly in a room. And as the French philosopher said, all your problems arise there from that inability, because what that really implies is you are not connected with being. You are not connected with that which is deeper than the mind made personality, the thinker.

So come home to yourself so that you can enjoy your own company. And then you can truly enjoy also other people's company rather than use them as substitutes. Enjoy yourself, as the expression implies, it all starts there.

Can you enjoy yourself, your being? Otherwise, nothing will satisfy you ever because you're not at ease with yourself. And you take your dissatisfied self wherever you go.

Into any relationship or any place. Attention to the resistance of the present, if powerful enough, will dissolve that resistance and a state of presence will emerge. What will dissolve the central core of the self so that it doesn't create endless waves of resistance?

Can we explore the nature of the realization that is necessary? What will dissolve the central core of self so that it doesn't create endless waves of resistance? The central, so what is the central core of self?

The mind structures, the mind movements that are the mental image of me with its accumulated content plus the pain body, the two in cooperation form the central core of self. So what will dissolve that? Of course, that's easy.

Surrender, only now, surrender, it's too easy, isn't it? It's too simple. Surrender to whatever form this moment takes.

Then the self cannot survive in the state of surrender to what is. It's as simple as that. The pain body cannot renew itself when you surrender to the fact that there is a pain body.

And so surrender, I'm not telling you from now on, you need to be in continuous surrender for 24 hours a day. Oh no. It's not that difficult.

It's only this moment that you need to surrender to, not just this, just this, whatever form this takes, it's always this and that you meet in and through surrender. That you can do. You can't surrender for 24 hours a day.

That's a problem, but just this, it's only now. And so the egoic self, nor the pain body can survive in surrender. And so, and then the question may arise, well, how long is it going to take before the central core of self, and my pain body have dissolved?

And that question implies that surrender is not yet complete. Is this moment that bad that you need to get to a future one where you achieve a certain state? To realize the goodness and depth that is already here.

And only through surrender, you realize that. Who you are already. You are greater than in your wildest egoic dreams.

You could ever be, you are already greater than you could ever be, even if the wildest egoic dreams of achievement became realized. Now, already, you are that. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Now, if you're new to this, you're going to wonder, what's he waiting for? Or when are we going to start?

And of course, the implication behind that question is that meditation is something that you do. And that's a fallacy of many meditators. Then meditation becomes just another doing.

And you can put it in your schedule somewhere after all the appointments and whatever you have to do, then you do the meditation. But meditation is really about finding the dimension of depth in yourself, which is not a doing, it's discovering or sensing a deeper level within yourself, which we could call being. Now, you can't really do anything to find being because being is prior to doing.

And it's always already there as the essence of all life, including the essence of yourself. And now, again, if you are new to this, you may wonder, what's he talking about? How do I find being?

Being is all-pervasive, but because it's so all-pervasive, it's so easy to overlook, just as easy as it is for a fish to overlook the eternal fact of water, because it's so all-pervasive. And so the fish says, water, I've never seen it, it's looked everywhere. So what does that mean, this analogy?

There's something all-pervasive that is both within and without, and that is the essence of who you are. And that is where your sense of identity ultimately derives from. So as we sit here together, can you become aware of the simple fact that you are, the fact of being, the fact that I am right now?

To give you another pointer, can you become aware of your own presence here, without which there would be no sounds to listen to, there would be nothing to see? What is it that makes the listening and the seeing possible? That's the dimension of depth.

That's ultimately where your sense of identity comes from. You can't define it, it just is, you just are. When you become aware of that, all that it really means is not so much that you become aware of something, but you become aware of the fact of awareness.

Still, when I put it into language, it still seems as if you were aware of something, because that's how a sentence is constructed, subject and object, but that's not the reality of it. The reality of it is awareness becomes aware of itself. It's not two, but one.

And awareness is consciousness, consciousness that has become aware of itself. And that's so all-pervasive, that's always in the background of your life, as a deeper sense of I am, or of beingness, or of presence, but you get distracted and seduced by all the things that happen and that you do. And continuously, consciousness identifies and gets attached to all the things that occur, especially the thoughts in your mind.

Consciousness becomes seduced into losing itself in every thought, and then you don't know who you are anymore. You get a false sense of identity, and you don't feel enough, and you feel there's something missing, and that you need more to grow in your sense of identity, and it never is enough. And here, in the dimension of depth, you are already enough.

There's already a sense of completion, of fullness and aliveness. You don't need to become more alive. You're already alive.

So another way of putting it, it is you become aware of the very aliveness that you are, the life that you are, which is one with the totality of life, the one life. Let's just take a moment and become aware of the present moment. Vitally important in any endeavor that you undertake, no matter what it is, is not to lose your connectedness with the present moment.

So before you start a new enterprise, a new activity, always good to take a moment for awareness, basically. That's what it is. Sometimes people ask, well, what is the present moment?

How do you, where is it? What does it even mean to become aware of the present moment? And the first thing, of course, is that you become aware of whatever surrounds you.

That's the entry point into the present moment, a very easy entry point into present moment awareness. Some people may call it mindfulness, is to become more aware of whatever surrounds you here and now, sense perceptions. Just be with what is.

Give it attention, some attention, the room you're sitting in. Maybe there's a window, you can look out of the window. You can see trees behind me.

I can't see them. I know they're there. This is, you enter the present moment by becoming more aware of sense perceptions, auditory, visual, and perhaps others.

And of course, what that does, you might notice is there's less mental noise. The voice in the head that speaks and speaks, that talks to you, that you have a dialogue with, a monologue that comments and interprets and takes positions, mental positions, identifies with likes, dislikes. Yes, no, never stops talking.

That's the mind, the voice in the head that most people are completely identified with. And that means they're not present. So the first step is take some attention away from that by simply becoming aware of sense perceptions.

And if you can look at something natural, that's even better because a natural thing, a tree, a flower, a plant, the sky, a natural thing lends itself to a present moment awareness more than a man-made, a human-made thing. So anything natural that you can look at for a moment, focus on and give it attention, acknowledge it. You don't need to think about it.

So it's just come aware of the present moment through a sensory perception. And already, if you can do that, if perhaps a few minutes before you were very much immersed in the problem-making mind, it wasn't actually solving any problem because this continuous mind activity actually creates more problem than it solves. If it's not focused, it's unconscious.

So already, suddenly there's a certain amount of peace that descends upon this, the world, your world. It becomes a bit more peaceful. You become aware of the aliveness of things.

So being the light, what does that mean? There's a very important statement that Jesus made that kind of inspired me to use this perhaps seemingly strange expression. In one of the gospels in the New Testament, Jesus said, addressing his disciples or whoever was listening to him, basically addressing each one of us, he said, you are the light of the world.

That's a very profound statement, not perhaps necessarily understood in the churches. There's another statement that he made in another, the Gospel of John, where he said, with reference to himself, I am the light of the world. So we have two statements of profound significance.

On the one hand, he said, you are the light of the world. And then elsewhere, we find him saying, I am the light of the world. So what does that mean?

He's talking to, and he says, you are the light of the world. He was talking to his followers, simple people, not people who are important in the eyes of the world. They were simple people.

So he was not telling them that they are very special. He was pointing to a deeper reality, a deeper, I would say, a deeper identity within them, deeper than their superficial social identity, their form identity in this world. He was pointing to an essence within every human being.

Now, you may find that probably nowhere in the Bible is the word consciousness used. Jesus never used the word consciousness. It would have been meaningless, and probably in his native language, which was Aramaic, the word consciousness probably didn't even exist.

There's even a dispute whether the word consciousness existed in ancient Greek, which of course is the language in which the New Testament was written. There probably is, but we don't need to go into that. So if there had been the word consciousness, it would still have been meaningless to his listeners who were simple people.

And somehow humanity was not ready to hear this. It would have been meaningless to most people alive on the planet to say, the essence of who you are is you are conscious. The light stands for obviously consciousness.

It could not stand for anything else. And the light in which the world appears is the consciousness. Without consciousness, there's no world.

The greatest mystery about the universe, there are many mysteries in the universe. I love mysteries. There are superficial mysteries.

I love the mysteries of UFOs. And I love the mysteries of crop circles, things like that. And then of course there are the deep mysteries of the vastness of space, outer space, the almost infinite number of galaxies.

Every galaxy is an entire world system. Incomprehensible, inconceivable, unbelievable mystery. We've only scratched the surface of that.

We've only scratched the surface of what this universe is. Then we have the mystery, the outer mystery. Then we have the mystery of the atomic realm and the subatomic realm, which also is inconceivable, incomprehensible, we cannot fully understand it.

It's just an amazing mystery. So we have the macrocosmic mystery and then we have the microcosmic mystery of the world. And in between, we have our everyday world, which we move in.

And yet underlying all that, underlying both the macrocosmic and the microcosmic and our everyday world is the deepest mystery of all. And that is the mystery of consciousness. The most incredible thing is that there is not only a universe, but the most mysterious thing about the universe is that the universe is conscious.

And we don't know what consciousness is. We cannot know what consciousness is in the same way in which we can know something that we look at and examine, that a scientist can examine. The macrocosm, the galaxies, the microcosms, atomic and subatomic realm, scientists rarely talk about consciousness because they don't know what to say about it.

How does it originate? What is it? Where does it come from?

And yet it's so beyond any doubt, one could almost say the one thing that you cannot doubt is that you are conscious right now about yourself. You can doubt everything about yourself, but what you cannot doubt is that you are conscious. Even if the entire world that you, what you experience as the world could all be a dream.

It could be, maybe it's even the matrix. I don't think it is, but a matrix is just a modern form of saying it's a dream-like thing. This very moment could be your dream, that you are dreaming that you're listening to somebody talking about the fact that you might be dreaming and that you might be dreaming that you're seeing this image on the screen and this person and this person is talking.

But of course, where is this person talking? This person is talking, where does this talk take place? In your consciousness.

I am in your consciousness. Obviously, that's where the whole thing is created. Now, whether, when we say your consciousness, whether that is correct, I would say probably not, although we use that term, your, the way I see it, there's only one consciousness.

You are a manifestation of that one consciousness. So I am speaking in this one consciousness and who am I? I am the light of the world, the one consciousness.

As are you. You are that consciousness. And that is the one thing that you cannot doubt.

You are the light of the world. And this is an experiential realization. It's not something abstract.

It is not something to believe in. Then I believe that I am the light of the world. It's nothing to believe in.

But to realize firsthand, immediate, to realize this in your immediate experience, the very fact that the one thing that you cannot doubt about yourself, your whole identity may be just a mental construct. It is, by the way. Your whole identity is just maybe so that you don't, you won't stop listening to me.

Your whole identity may be just a temporary mental construct that can be doubted a little bit, perhaps a bit like a dream. And your whole life could be, it is a kind of dream. Is it, it's a question of perspective where you say it's real or it's a dream.

A dream evaporates very quickly, dissipates, it disappears. But every experience that you have disappears very quickly. Even the dinner you had last night, was that a dream?

Your last vacation, was that a dream or did it happen? And then you remember a dream you had last night. Okay, that was a dream, but the vacation was real, but it's gone now.

So you can doubt many things. You can doubt the absolute reality of this world and your experience that may be, but there was a famous, as you know, probably a French philosopher, Descartes, who came to this point. He wanted to, and he came at the end of the Middle Ages, which had all kinds of weird beliefs and superstitions.

And so he wanted to know, is there anything that is beyond doubt? Everything can be doubted. And he went inside, and then he realized that he was still thinking all the time.

And so he said, I think, therefore I am. That's beyond doubt. But he hadn't gone quite deep enough.

He was on his way towards the true realization, but he stopped before he reached the point where you transcend thinking, but are still conscious and aware. If he had waited a little, and if he had stopped thinking for a moment and realized that beyond thought, there is a consciousness, there's a vast realm of consciousness. Beyond thought, there is an awareness, and where there is the light, the light of consciousness before it becomes a thing, that the light shines through every thought form.

The light is not separate from, the thoughts are not separate from the totality of consciousness. They are like a form that consciousness takes. So the realization, I am the light of the world, is extremely important.

And that's the realization of the one thing within you that is beyond doubt, that you are conscious. And even if it's all a dream, for the dream to be perceived, to be experienced, for the dream to happen, there needs to be a light in which it happens, in which it is perceived and known. And that is the light of consciousness.

And the entire world, to appear, it needs to become a world, it needs the light of consciousness. And so this consciousness, which is the light of the world, which is the essence of who you are, you cannot, scientists have such a problem with it, because that's the one thing, not a thing, I'd just call it a thing. It's the one thing that cannot be an object of knowledge.

Everything else, you are the subject that knows the object. You look at something, you're the subject. I look at my hand, he is my hand, I look my hand.

Anything that the scientist does, the scientist is the observer, and what he or she examines is the observed. Now that works with everything, except with one thing. You cannot be the observer of consciousness.

In other words, consciousness cannot become the observed, because consciousness is the eternal subject, the eternal observer. So if let's say the scientist is looking for consciousness, and the power that is looking for consciousness is the light of consciousness. So whatever the scientist looks at to solve the mystery of consciousness is the consciousness looking for itself.

And so you could never find that consciousness and say, oh, there it is. You can never say, I have it. You cannot even say, I understand it.

It's the eternal mystery, but that is the eternal mystery of who you are. So you cannot, essentially you cannot make yourself into an object of knowledge. That would be the ego itself.

You can know yourself as an ego and say, that's me, and talk about yourself or your conditioned entity, the person, the personality, the historical person, the mental construct that is who you are, that can be an object of knowledge. But the essence of who you are can never be an object of knowledge because it is the eternal subject. So you cannot, and it is inseparable from the transcendent, which is really God.

So in essence, you are God, or perhaps say more acceptable and perhaps more accurate to say, perhaps I wouldn't go so far as to say that you are God, but I would say that you are an emanation of God in the same way that a ray of sunlight is an emanation of the sun and is connected to the sun, but is not the sun. In the same way, you are an emanation of source, the one, but God, you are. Now, if you look for God, the same applies because really that is consciousness is the emanation.

If the same applies, you cannot find God as an object, and there it is. Jesus said that literally, but people just don't seem to get it because people asked him, he used this expression, kingdom of heaven, which in my translation is kingdom is dimension and heaven is spaciousness. It's the dimension of pure consciousness, spaciousness, the dimension of spaciousness.

And kingdom of heaven is not an external thing, it's an inner dimension of consciousness. So find the kingdom of heaven that is within you. Okay, he said, and then his disciples said, when does the kingdom of heaven come?

Because they had completely misunderstood what he was talking about. When does the kingdom of heaven come? And he said, now he's talking, this kingdom of heaven is the consciousness.

And he said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. You cannot say, look, it's over here, or look, it's over there, because truly I tell you, it is within you. He said it all.

What does it mean? He says, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs that you can perceive. You cannot perceive it in the way in which you perceive external things, because it is the eternal subject.

You cannot make God or consciousness, which is the emanation of God, into an object of perception or an object of knowledge. And that's why the only way a sign can be perceived is can understand consciousness. If the scientist becomes, directs the attention that goes outward back into itself, and the scientist or anybody, you, becomes aware that what he, she has been looking for is already the answer.

It's in the answers, what you are looking, you are what you're looking for. Because if you try and try and try to get enlightened, and then it just, you get so frustrated, it's just not happening, so you join the suffering group, and then you're much more likely to find it. Now, here's an interesting little paragraph on the Bhagavad Gita.

What kind of people become spiritual seekers? And it divides into, there are four types of persons, according to here, and this still applies very much nowadays, and this was 2,000 or 3,000 years ago. There are four different types of persons who seek spirituality or God.

So Krishna talks again as the personification of the one. Four types of people seek a connection with me. One, the world-weary, people who worship God for the alleviation of physical or mental agony, or to be released from fears and adversity.

There's many people, of course, who come to a spiritual teacher or teaching or a spiritual book, come for that reason, and it is a good reason to be, one, to be free of suffering. And of course, the whole Buddha's teaching is about freedom from suffering, so that's one type. Two are the seekers of happiness.

They are seeking happiness through worldly things, people who pray to God to obtain wealth, family, power, prestige, and so forth. So maybe those are people also who do go into manifesting things through positive thinking and affirmations, but come out connecting with a somewhat deeper level, yes, in a limited way still, yes. So they're seeking spirituality because they want something in this world.

It still applies. Not that much has changed, apparently. And then there are the seekers of, this number three now, the third group, are the seekers of spiritual advancement, people whose motive for connecting with divinity is to gain knowledge and experience to aid their self-realization.

And I would add, people also who want to have the high of what they conceive of as the high that surely enlightenment must be, as I sometimes call it. They want the fireworks, they're waiting for some ultimate experience. So that's another group, many like that.

And of course, I'll talk about that in a minute. Number four, these are relatively rare, according to the Bhagavad Gita, are people who want to know God, who truly want to know the Atma, the Self, who know that God alone exists, and whose only impulse is for the divine and nothing else. And those are relatively rare.

I just want God. So the ones numbers, whose motive for connecting with divinity is to gain knowledge and experience to aid their self-realization. So we have wanting to be free of suffering, wanting to be happy through this, that, or the other, three, wanting knowledge or experience or some high, and four, the direct wanting the one.

I just want that. So it's, of course, Bhagavad Gita says, of these four, the last is the highest because they know my truth and are devoted to me as I'm supremely dear to them, they are very dear to me. The first three are attached to the worldly objects or mental states they desire.

But certainly all four types are noble because any reason for turning Godward or inwards will in due time lead to spiritual transformation and is therefore ultimately good. So my comment on this is the, it is true that the ones who just want God are rare, and that's fine, it's not needed. Wanting to be free of suffering is more helpful.

Those who want to be free of suffering or adversity who've had enough suffering, that is a very powerful motivation for seeking spiritual awakening. It's a more powerful motivation and more likely to lead to realization or awakening than those who are seeking either happiness because they will have to experience it. None of the things they seek, even when they get them, is really going to fulfill that purpose of making them happy and fulfilled.

And then they begin to suffer. And so they join group one. So first you're in that group for quite a while, and then when you realize, okay, my manifestation is great, it works, but still it's not quite right because nothing fulfills me.

Then you join, you go back to group one. You're suffering. And if you're seeking, now many spiritual seekers seek some kind of enlightenment experience or awakening.

And sometimes I get, they write in and say, I've been trying so hard for so many years and it's not happening yet. I want to be free. I want to be enlightened or whatever they call it.

And they are expecting some kind of experience or they believe that if they acquire enough knowledge about it, finally it's going to work. And so they become very knowledgeable. They can quote all kinds of scriptures.

It's all there. And they know more and more about it and more and more. And for those people, it's quite hard.

In fact, unless they join another group, they're not going to make it. But they will have to join another group, which again is group number one, suffering. Because if you try and try and try to get enlightened and then it just, you get so frustrated, it's just not happening.

So you join the suffering group and then you're much more likely to find it. So I'm really very fond of group one, suffering. As long as you're not identified with yourself as the suffering entity, when that becomes your identity, then you have another problem.

But nothing that cannot be addressed and recognized in yourself. It can be a helpful thing to be in unusual surroundings because it's easier to be more present. In unusual surroundings, that's the advantage of traveling.

And that's why, as I've written somewhere, many people feel more alive when they travel. And when they are at home, their surroundings are so familiar that they lose presence completely. They don't see things anymore.

They go from where they live to their office or wherever it is, go and done it so many times, they don't see it anymore. And you would be surprised even at home, your usual surroundings, you might have a painting on your walls and haven't looked at it in the past three years. Might be very beautiful.

Or your garden or the plants in there. So this is the familiarity can lead to a kind of semi-sleep-like state. And when you're traveling, you go, oh.

And the good thing is you might not even have a name for all the new things you see. At home, you know what everything is called. But here you see things, you might see a weird animal.

Or the mind stops because you can't name it. And that's a wonderful thing. Or you see trees that you haven't seen before and you go, oh.

Or you might say to your friend, look at that. And you might notice in the moment of looking at that, you're not naming it in your mind because you don't know what it's called. And so there's a moment, a few seconds of just being present.

Be the presence rather than the naming person. So it helps to be wide awake to your sense perceptions because that is one way of coming into the present moment, which is why we are here. Because there is more to the present moment than we realize most of the time.

There's more to it. It's the access point to the deeper dimension within yourself. So as a general theme, underlying theme, I recommend, surprisingly, that you practice being in the present moment.

Although you've been taken out of your usual surroundings, you have carried with you something else. And of course, that's your mind. It travels with you wherever you go.

That is perhaps the meaning of a book that somebody wrote. I believe the title is Wherever You Go, There You Are. So wherever you go, you carry your mind and the conditioning of your mind with you.

So that is the challenge here, to transcend the conditioning of your mind. And the habitual way of interpreting, the habitual way of reacting to things, habitual mind patterns. If a mind pattern in you is that you frequently and very quickly become discontent with where you are, if that's a pattern in you, then that pattern will arise here also.

If your mind pattern is one that loves complaining and finding fault with things, then it's very likely that very quickly this mind pattern will appear here also. So you get surprising things, things that your expectations are not met in various ways. And that is a challenge to the mind, to the conditioned mind, because the conditioned mind wants its expectations met.

And if they're not met, it gets uneasy, restless, irritated, angry, starts talking about what's wrong, either silently in your mind or to others. And if others can agree with you, then it's even better. Or you can go on the internet and then you can get 1,000 people agreeing with you.

I'm not saying if there's something really wrong, you shouldn't do something to rectify it. So if something is leaking in your room, say, no, I'm not going to say anything because I'm not supposed to complain. No, of course.

Say there's something there that needs to be rectified. That's not a complaint, it's just information. Complaint means there is an emotion behind it.

And the emotion says this should not be happening. Then it becomes a complaint, or it's your fault. Then it becomes a complaint.

If it's simply presenting information, it's not a complaint. It's just a fact. And then the question is, can anything be done about it?

If yes, good. What they're saying, there's nothing we can do. Do you go on insisting that this is very bad and create suffering for yourself?

Or do you simply accept this is what it is? Remember to turn off the ringer on your phones so that you don't get disturbed. And let's just settle into the present moment, which is not something perhaps that you would normally do because there's always something else that's more important or pretends to be more important.

And then you forget that the only important, the only really important thing in your life is the present moment because there is nothing else ever. You have to really realize that fully to see the implications of that and how one could almost say devastating it is to realize that there's only ever this moment. But most people live as if other things, past and future, were more important than this moment.

It's an unconscious pattern. So meditation is about becoming present. Then the word itself implies, of course, now, present moment.

So we sometimes speak of present moment awareness. I sometimes call it presence. And that is what meditation is all about, discovering that dimension of consciousness in yourself.

And usually meditation techniques are designed to get you there. But our meditation is a meditation that does not really have any particular techniques. I'm just inviting you to come into this present moment with your attention directly.

Just drop into the now. This is something you can only verify or realize for yourself that you can actually almost sense, one could say, the presence of the present moment. Well, it has no shape or form.

So you can become conscious of the present moment itself. What does that mean? First of all, you become more conscious of sensory perceptions.

An alertness arises that normally is not there when you are trapped in the continuous stream of thinking. Then that alertness that is synonymous with presence or awareness is just not there. So the normal state of consciousness is to be trapped in this continuous stream of thinking, a lot of it quite useless and repetitive.

Thinking can be a powerful thing, but most people's thinking, 99% of it is repetitive, useless, often negative. It's mental noise. And when you're identified with that, when there's that voice in your head that never stops speaking and you don't even know that you are not that voice, so you think you are the voice, you become the voice, that is a dreamlike state.

And you can observe people around you often who are in that dreamlike state. You can see it in their eyes. They're not here.

All their attention is absorbed by their thinking. They're just a little bit left just so that they know where they are going and not bump into furniture. But so you can see how many people are, most of the time, not really present because almost all their attention is absorbed by this continuous noise of thinking.

And so they go, and when they look at you, they don't really see you. At best, they see you through the stream of thinking, which is judgments that they may have about you. So there's never a clear perception of anything.

Everything is filtered through the thinking, through the judgments of the mind. And that's a, traditionally in spirituality, that's called being asleep. And that's why the term that is used in various ancient spiritual traditions for enlightenment or whatever you want to call it is awakening.

So there's an alertness that is suddenly there when you become conscious of the present moment. At first, you might notice it as suddenly becoming more aware of your sense perceptions, listening, looking, seeing, hearing. You might also find that alertness is there when something new suddenly arises in your field of vision.

Somebody comes into the, something appears, or in your hearing, a sudden noise, and when a sudden noise appears, and, or suddenly somebody comes in or comes around the corner, and you suddenly look or listen, and there's an alertness behind the looking and listening. And for those few seconds, when that new thing arises and you give it your full attention, for those few seconds, three, four, five, maybe two, there's not a thought in your head. Thought then comes in after a few seconds, and it may, for some people, only be a couple of seconds, and then immediately interprets what it is that's there.

But there is always, there's a moment when something new arises, when there is clear perception and just an alertness in the background. And that's an interesting moment because that is a natural way of presence arising in you, but usually it's so short-lived that people miss it. So it's a good thing to discover that you actually already meditate for brief moments.

You are in the state that we call meditation, and perhaps didn't even know it. And sometimes there may be moments when you just sit somewhere and you suddenly become completely comfortable with that moment as it is. And an inner peace arises, and you feel there's nothing missing here.

And this can suddenly can happen where before your mindset, why am I still waiting here in this waiting room? I've been sitting here for an hour, and why are they keeping me waiting? And suddenly there may be a shift and you say, well, I'm here this moment.

I might as well be here fully. And suddenly all that noise of thinking subsides and you realize actually there's nothing really missing in this moment. I'm breathing, looking, listening, feeling alive.

And it's fine when the mind is not telling me that it's not fine. And you'll be surprised how often the present moment is fine when you really check it out. Whereas the mind would habitually tell you that it's not fine.

It's not good enough. Something is missing. Something shouldn't be there.

But of course it is. And when you argue with what is in your mind, that's called unhappiness in whatever form it comes. Irritation, impatience, anger, sadness.

Oh, no, not this. So meditation is learning to align yourself in time only with the present moment and become aware of the present moment. So first of all, through sensory perceptions.

So I just said that sometimes those things arise naturally. You suddenly, either something new comes into your field of vision or your hearing and an alertness is there for a few seconds. Or there may be a moment when you are relaxing into the present moment.

And I'm not talking about becoming tired because that's not where we are going. We are not going towards sleep. We are going towards a heightened sense of alertness which is what the meditative state is.

Or let's do away with the term meditation altogether and just call it presence. There's a heightened state of alertness. It's very different from the lowered alertness that when you are moving towards sleep.

So that is not meditation. And even when people talk about relaxation, usually or often it's associated in people's minds with kind of you're gradually moving towards sleep. I'm so relaxed now.

Or if you go to a hypnotist, you might say and your eyes are becoming heavier and heavier and we are not going that way. That's nice. It gives you a little bit of relief from your mind.

But here we are exploring the possibility of a higher state of consciousness, heightened alertness. So I'm talking you into it as we sit here. And as I speak, you may find that shift already happening in you that as you sit here and now you're becoming aware of this moment as it is and no longer needing it to be different.

So if you thought you were here to meditate so that eventually you can reach a meditative state or some kind of peace that you don't have now, let's forget about that and just be with this moment as it is and accept that this moment is as it is. Of course, it always is as it is. So you might as well accept it.

So you become comfortable with it, aware of what you're looking at. You see this man on the screen. You hear the voice talking.

There is the room or wherever you are. Peripherally, you're aware of that and it's fine. This moment is as it is.

And what else is there apart from your sense perceptions? What you see, what you hear, is there anything else? Well, you may feel a sense of aliveness in your inner energy field, the body.

You may feel, as you sit here, just a distant sense of that, yes, there is this. I can feel that the body is alive. So some attention moves there.

An all-pervasive sense of aliveness in your body, in your legs, your hands, your arms. It's a very subtle thing. Sometimes you may want to focus on one little thing, one flower, one leaf, one tree, one bird.

And then at other times, you can take in the totality of a particular view. So you have a totality here of trees and plants and one or two houses, sky. So you can take in, but whether you focus on one thing or you focus on a larger landscape, larger section, visual section, sense yourself as the presence while you look.

And that is how you become aware of the sacredness of nature. And nobody could explain to you what sacredness means, but you will know when you sense it, you'll know it. It's all an expression of the one place.

It's all an expression of the one, the underlying one life, one consciousness. And if you love whatever you see, you, there's a sense of no longer separateness. You love it.

There's a joy that comes with seeing that. But the joy is there because you're in touch with yourself. So that is again, an aspect of the balance between being and doing to be aware of being while you do.

And even when you're not doing something, not to lose consciousness. The danger is when you do activities, let's say your normal work situation, a little bit more complex than putting away clothes. The danger is that you lose yourself in the activity.

And so you're no longer rooted in being, you're out there. And then the sign, the clear sign signal that you are out there and lost yourself in it is something arises like stress, anxiety, some negative reactivity, some belief that something out there is terribly important that needs to be done now and nothing else matters. So you lose yourself in the doing.

Now, if you sit quietly in your room, the danger is that you drift off to sleep. At first you're there present, you're above thought. And then before you know it, you can observe it.

Many years ago, I spent some time occasionally in one Buddhist monasteries and you can observe the early morning meditation, especially when the monks sit 4.30, 5 o'clock sitting for an hour for the early morning meditation. Now I must have been not meditating all the time because occasionally I opened my eyes and looked at the monks. And so at first they're always there.

And then after 15, 20 minutes, some of them go. And of course, in a Zen monastery, you have the head monk who may hit you if he sees you're drifting off. That works.

So don't overdo the being, not doing anything to do it. Sometimes don't say, I'm not going to sit for one hour in this room and be. No, just take it as it comes.

There's a time for being and there's a time for doing. Now, many humans alive now are actually feel very uncomfortable with just being. They can't do it.

They can't do the being. Or when they're trying to be, they are trying to do the being, which is like trying to do the meditation. You can't do a meditation because the meditation is about being.

Doing a meditation implies you want to get somewhere. But true meditation is you are somewhere. You go into the vertical dimension.

So many humans who are very uncomfortable with silence, can't stand it, need some noise, or they need continuous sensory or mental stimulation, need something to get my mental teeth into. And when they don't have it, they were very restless. The worst thing that you could do to them is put them in a room where they have no devices to produce noise.

That would be hell for many humans these days. Sense deprivation of noise. So not with you though, because all of you are comfortable.

With being and with the absence of noise, and you're actually appreciative of silence. It's precious and it's beautiful. Now, you wouldn't want to have it all the time.

No, there needs to be a balance between noise and silence, and between thinking and not thinking, and doing and being. Some ancient cultures who are not yet lost in mental development, like our more advanced, so-called more advanced culture, some ancient cultures, the people have a natural ability to just be, and they're not uncomfortable with being. It was reported by when North America, the Europeans came and settled in North American continent.

I remember reading one doctor or somebody observed people lining up somewhere in the States for a doctor's appointment. And some of them were Europeans who had come to America, and some were native Americans. And it took so long, the doctor was overburdened with work.

And these people, there were not enough chairs. People had to line up long way. And whether it was a doctor or nurse who wrote about it, observed it, all the Europeans became increasingly restless.

And then they got very angry. What's going on? I've been here now for three hours.

And all the native Americans were just completely happy with just standing there. So the person who wrote it was so amazed that he wrote about it. So there's a natural ability to drop in and go still.

Now, then the Westerners came, and then of course there was a clash between the old culture of the native Americans and the mind dominated culture of the West. And then many of the native Americans became very confused and became very destructive for that culture. Now, when we go there, we have been through the development of the intellectual faculty and the mental faculty, and we come out the other end, and then we encounter that ability again and even more deeper.

If you haven't lost something, don't appreciate it that much. You don't even know it that much. So for thousands of years, humans could actually drop into stillness.

I'm sure as these native Americans could, they could drop into stillness quite easily. Perhaps they were fighting one moment and the next moment they go. In the same way that a duck does it, as I described in the power of now, the ducks get into a fight.

And then two minutes later, flap their wings completely back into stillness. So, but they didn't even know it. It's just, they just did it.

They didn't know they did it. But once, when you lose something and then you regain it, there's always an element of depth to it that wasn't there before, because then you knowingly go into the stillness. It's not a natural thing anymore.

It's a knowing thing. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

There was a question somebody submitted. I don't have it here, but I remember it. Probably asked by a young man or woman.

I'm not sure. And he said, this is somebody who was watching us. Hi.

So, he said, when I listened to you, I have this strong compulsion to become a spiritual teacher also. But when I listened to a great business leader, suddenly I have the compulsion to become a great business leader. What to do?

What to do? And my recommendation to you is to try the business leader first. I also recommend Tony Robbins seminars.

And there's nothing wrong with that. It's one aspect of life. It's, I can do it.

Yeah, I can do it. Yeah. Build up your energy.

And it's quite enlivening. So, it's not a bad place to go to and try things out. There is a, if you say, let's say that he represents doing and I represent being, but there is, as you know, the symbol of yin yang, the intertwining, the two.

And in the middle of the one, of the one polarity, the yang, there's a little dot and that represents the other. And in the middle of the other, there's a little dot that represents the yang. And so, I have a little bit of the other in me too, as you can see.

And as I found to my amazement that Tony Robbins, I don't know when he started doing that, he has introduced short periods of meditation into his seminars, usually towards the end. And then he goes, now let's just be very quiet. And wow, so that's the other, the other one, the yin is coming into the yang.

Well, that's good. Of course, ideally, in a human life, a human being, human being, you remember how, what that word means, those two words mean when you put them together. Human is the form that you are.

And human is the doing, whatever the form does. The being is who you are in your essence. So you are both.

You are the being, the consciousness, and you are the form that that consciousness takes. And the form that that consciousness takes will do things and think and do and act upon the world and be acted upon. So there's hardly any human, there may be some human beings who are completely balanced between the human and the being, who are in the being and the doing, the human and the being.

They're quite in the middle. Most people go a little bit that way or a little bit more that way. Our civilization as a whole, of course, has gone into the doing mode, very, very far to one extreme.

So the civilization itself is actually mentally ill because of that. And the connectedness with being has been almost entirely lost. So it's a very fragile civilization, despite its many achievements.

It's a little bit like when you go into a supermarket where they sell fruit, you'd look at the oranges, and they're all, they look so shiny and polished, and the tomatoes, they look so shiny and polished. But often when you cut them open, they're completely dry inside and tasteless. So that's a little bit our civilization.

The surface appearance is nice and shiny, but if you look deeper, you can see there is a, there's something that is, something fundamental that's not, that is missing there. And therefore, the civilization, unless it returns to, back to some kind of balance between being and doing, it cannot survive for that much longer. And that's why we are here.

And so predominantly what we focus on here is the being side, because that's, we need to redress the balance within the collective and in your personal life too, because every individual conditioned by this society tends to live, even starts with little young children. They're already taught to be in the, just do and think and to play, right? Go, let's get going.

Okay, all the tension goes out, and then they start their video games and stuff. We can't focus on anything for very long. That's a huge disability.

Many, many young people have that these days because of the influence of many, many factors, and especially the video stuff and devices that they have, cannot focus on anything for very long anymore, cannot give attention to anything for very long because the mind goes. Because that's what, when you, then they watch video games or even many movies, the scene changes every few seconds. And so, if you cannot give attention to something for a certain period of time, there's never a flow of creativity.

You cannot, because creativity, you have to, your attention needs to rest upon something and you need to give it time and look and be with it and become still, and then creativity flows. If a whole generation grows up that is unable to do that, then the civilization cannot produce anything new and it cannot even cope with its problems anymore because even to cope with problems in a good way, you need to be able to look at a problem and be with it and then allow the greater intelligence to inspire you and then come up with a solution. So, humans, as I call it, yeah, they are lost in doing, lost in the mind, they're lost in thinking.

Because thinking is a kind of doing too, you're doing your thinking. Well, you are not. The thinking is doing stuff to you, you're not even thinking.

Thinking happens to you. Humans say, I think. They don't think.

Thinking is an autonomous activity in their minds, a reflection of the collective mind. They are not thinking, they are being used by thought, which is, and well, their personal thoughts are just an aspect of the collective thoughts and they don't know that. So you are being thought, you don't think.

So, and all that is doing, that's the doing mode. Those who are naturally more drawn towards being, they don't really fit into our society at all. In older cultures, there was some room for them, they could go, there were many monasteries they could go to and there were many jobs that actually did not require you to do a lot of doing.

You can just be, there were simple jobs that you could do. And nowadays it's harder for the humans who have this natural inclination towards being to fit into this world. Some of them are here now.

But even those who are very effective at doing eventually become frustrated and unhappy because they realize the emptiness of their doing. So even those who have become very successful doers encounter frustration and emptiness, not the Buddhist emptiness, a different kind of emptiness. And so society is, our civilization is longing without knowing it, is longing to return to the roots, to the being dimension.

And that's why things like these strange videos on YouTube are becoming so popular because this is one way of getting a little bit of being and getting out of doing. And so you watch half an hour of somebody handling an object. Wow, so lovely.

And then comes a point when it's time for another stage to arise where the dream of form is no longer, your no longer consciousness isn't beginning to awaken from complete identification with form. And that is happening to many humans. And this is why human beings are drawn to these two spiritual teachings with the awakening from the dream of form.

Who am I? What does it mean, I? What is identity?

What does it mean when I say I? What does it feel like? What is I?

What am I? Now, to most people, yet, if you ask them, what is, who are you? They will define the word I in terms of form.

They will say, well, obviously this body, that's I. This comes maybe first. And then there comes the mind with its accumulations, its accumulated, its thought, habitual thought movements, its memories, they come the emotions that go with the thought movements, the psychological form of I.

So they say, well, I am this body. Then there's a name, which of course is just a sound. You say, John, I am John.

And many people say they think that's already a big part of who they are. When they can say their name, John, oh, okay. And then they add a little something else.

I'm a, an architect. Oh, okay, we're getting even closer to who you are. And I'm a father, which, okay, good.

And your age, okay, something, that's, okay. We're almost there now. Just need a few more details.

And then we know who you are. And so you can put it on a piece of paper, a summary of it, or if you want a detailed account of who you are, you can write down your life history in a book, and it becomes your autobiography. Oh, that's interesting.

Now we know who you are. And if that's not enough, and if you think there may be hidden parts of me, then you can go to psychoanalysis for 10 years, and then all these hidden memories, and hidden desires, and feelings that you had when you were four and a half years old towards your mother, and your father, and your grandmother, and what, they all readily, they all come up, and then you can add that, and then, okay, now I've got it, I've got my autobiography, and I've got, that's I, I'm me, I'm complete now. And then you look 50 years later, which is not much on a universal scale, 50 years is very little, I know that now. I thought when I was 20, 50 years was a lot.

But I'm older than 50, by the way, by the body. The 50 years pass, and what's left of the body and the psychological me, that entity in the head with its history, what's left? Nothing.

Well, maybe there's one or two copies left of your autobiography, and maybe one person finds a copy in a secondhand bookshop. This is somebody's autobiography. And your grandchildren, or their descendants, well, after, my mother passed away three years ago, and I realized a few, recently, that I'm virtually the only person now who remembers her, because all her friends died before she did, and her family.

And all the other people who knew her only knew tiny fragments. They said, oh, she was a little bit of an eccentric, and she was outspoken, and so on. They had little fragments, but the person who really remembers her more than a fragment is me, and when I go, nobody remembers her.

And then all that's left is photos, and a generation later, nobody will know who this person on the photo is. But this is strange how an identity evaporates that seemed so solid and real. And so, form, we're talking about form identity.

That is, when you're asked, who are you? Or you ask yourself, who am I? Okay, now, is that all there is to who you are?

Is that what can be defined through form, what can be, that which is form, thought forms, emotional forms, physical forms, a conglomeration of that put together for a while becomes what you think is I. Is that really your identity, or is there something else? Well, perhaps we can just, at this moment, see, as you sit here, right at this moment, you don't remember your past.

You don't have to. Let's pretend you don't have one. You have no past.

There is no past. Let's say there is no past, which, by the way, is the truth. Ultimately, there is no past.

There's only the now. So, okay, and no future. Let's pretend there's no future.

Well, there is no future anyway, but there's only this. So you can't remind yourself. You don't even, unless there's a thought in your head that says, I am such and such, even that you don't know right now.

Let's say you don't know anything about who you are. Nothing that you can formulate, conceptualize, call something, you don't. What is left?

Is there, what is lost? Nothing is lost. In fact, when you encounter this, which cannot be named, which is a formless presence, aliveness, that's the, you've touched your, that which is beyond form, consciousness itself.

And that is identity. That is where your sense of I comes from. And so you are more truly yourself when you don't remember your past than when you do remember your past.

And you are more truly yourself when there's not a single thought in your head than when you are full of thinking, thinking about me and my problems. And whenever you feel this sense of I, this, the light of consciousness, which you can know directly in the stillness that is always there, available to you as the essence, your essence identity, your essence identity, timeless, that's always there. And that is one with universal consciousness.

It's just coming through this form. It's never lost. When this form dissolves, the consciousness goes choo, out like a little tentacle, choo.

Being. So let's stay with this for a moment here. You have no past or there is no past.

What is lost? Nothing essential is lost. You get a stronger sense of who you are in your essence when you are not telling yourself in your mind who you are.

This is why I said in Stillness Speaks, I believe, you are never more truly yourself than when you are still. And still means, of course, the mind has become still. It's an inner.

Doesn't, whether there's noise outside or not, doesn't matter. You're never more truly yourself than when you are still. Then you can sense the essence of who you are.

And that does not depend on the age of the body, whether you're 20 or 90, it's the same stillness. That frees you then from the suffering that comes if you have identified with form, which then sooner or later will leave you, you suffer. If you identify with a strong or beautiful body and that body eventually grows old, you begin to suffer because you seem to dissolve.

You haven't realized who you are. And so we have, you have form identity and essence identity. And suffering arises through knowing yourself only as form identity.

My history, my story, my body, my past, my this, my that, my that, my, my, my. That's whatever you identify with in the world of form. If you know yourself only as that, that's a state of unconsciousness, the dreamlike state.

Consciousness is dreaming the dream of form. And then it acts, attempting to become free of its inner state of incompleteness, dissatisfaction and fear, which is inevitable when all you know is your form identity. There's always underneath the surface or even very much on the surface, there is dissatisfaction, fear, unease, discomfort, fear, I am not enough, this is not enough.

This is not the right place where I am now. This is not the right people I'm with. This is not the right thing that I'm doing right now.

There comes the need to go out and search for more forms that I can identify with so that I can feel more complete. But the only way you can actually reach the state of, being at home, being rooted in yourself without the dissatisfaction that always comes again and again and again, and without the fear, the only way is encountering that which is beyond form. And it's so much, it's right here, it's closer.

It's God's realization, it's another word for it, but let's not go there. The God within, the timeless within. And so the universe then has, all the people who are into creating traditionally have been very unconscious because those who were most identified with form had the strongest desire to manifest and create more things out there and conquer an empire or accumulate more and more possessions or have more power.

So they got driven. So all the powerful people, the people who created human history, if you read the history books, they were deeply identified with form and they're all unhappy, of course, very unhappy, hoping by achieving this, that, or the other and conquering this, that, or the other, the other tribe or whatever, to become free of their state of unhappiness and of incompleteness. And never getting there.

And that's been, so traditionally, the doers, there were always some people who were not into doing, but in many traditional societies, there wasn't much of a place for them. Later, monasteries came into being, so they could become monks. Long story, but.

So, we still associate going out and doing with unconsciousness. I believe there's a line by T.S. Eliot in a poem where he says, the best lack all conviction and the worst are full of passionate intensity. Talking about contemporary humanity, early 20th century.

The best lack all convictions means that they don't know what to do. They get, because they are torn between, there's some inkling of, inside them, of their essence. So, they're not, the desire to do, to, is not as overpowering as in those who are totally identified with their former identity.

So, that's an interesting, that where we are at as humanity as a whole is a realization that there is an essence that has nothing to do with a form. And only if we are rooted, if some of our attention is in that formless essence, can we do things in this world without creating more havoc and suffering for others and ourselves. If we only go into doing without the rootedness in the eternal dimension, which is stillness, which is here now, always now, inseparable from now.

Whatever you do, when you lose yourself in the doing, identified again with form and creating some new problem. So, the foundation for all doing is conscious being. So, that's the important realization about what about manifesting.

That's good, but before we talk about manifesting, before we build some new building or structure, get the foundation first. Do you have the foundation? Don't start building a house without any foundation.

Let's manifest this great business empire. This is going to change the world. Yes, but have you laid the foundation?

What foundation? Being, being, the formless, the eternal. No, we haven't thought about that.

No, of course you haven't, you can't think about it.

[Speaker 2] (6:01:17 - 6:01:18)
No. No.

[Speaker 1] (6:01:22 - 7:29:05)
The foundation is being rooted, realizing what that means, what being is, not intellectually, not by trying to understand, because as you may have noticed, there's nothing much to understand about being. You can't, being, can you explain a bit more, please? Being.

Stillness. I don't understand stillness. Can you explain stillness?

No, because there's nothing in it to explain. You can't look at it under a microscope or dissect it. Aspects of stillness, PhD.

The purpose of our meditation, of course, is always getting in touch with that which transcends the person to discover that there's more to you than the person. Person meaning both the physical body and your mind. Plus emotions and so on.

So all your thinking is to do with the person. Emotions, your history, successes, failures, so-called. And even if you've reached a very high point in your life right now, you've just succeeded at something, just gained something, just fallen in love, you will find that it won't be long until that is no longer a real source of satisfaction for you and it may even turn into its opposite.

High becomes low. Now, that's not a negative way, a gloomy, pessimistic way of looking at things. And it's not saying that you should not appreciate when good things happen to you or you achieve things.

It's wonderful and it's to be enjoyed. So you can enjoy it knowing that, of course, it's not going to last forever and it cannot be a source of continuous satisfaction forever if you were suddenly transplanted to the most beautiful place. Let's say you're not happy where you are living now, maybe the climate isn't good enough or the environment isn't good enough.

There's nothing wrong with striving towards finding a better place. But even if you were suddenly transplanted to the most beautiful location you could imagine, perhaps for some people that would be an island and where it's always warm and pleasant. And there's the blue sea and there's white sand or whatever else you could imagine to be the ideal place and suddenly you're there and you have nothing to worry about, all your needs are met.

And of course you might say, well, then I could really get into the spiritual stuff because we wouldn't have to worry about all these other things anymore, making a living or succeeding or helping my family members or whatever. So it's all ideal suddenly and you would be happy for a while. And then gradually you would become dissatisfied.

First boredom sets in and after a while your energy level would go down too because in the absence of challenges, you would, the degree of alertness would diminish. So as far as your spiritual life is concerned, the best place is where you are right now and discover the dimension, the transcendent dimension here and now and use whatever problems or difficulties you have as an encouragement or an incentive to go deeper into yourself, not running away from problems. Of course, you still may have to take action if action is possible or necessary or desirable and take action to change situations, to improve situations in your life.

But at the same time, see if you can discover the deeper dimension within that has nothing to do with what goes on in your external life. And that's why we're here, to discover that. This is not about managing your external life better.

There's nothing wrong with that, but you can, there are other teachings that can help you with that if you still need them. But it's discovering a deeper dimension within and that also has a byproduct of discovering that is actually that it improves your external life immeasurably because you're no longer dependent on the ups and downs, the gains and losses, the good days and the bad days of your external life. You're not dependent on those things anymore for your sense of well-being or fulfillment or inner peace.

And isn't that an incredible thing when you can enjoy things, deal with things? Yes, but you're no longer dependent on the ups and downs. So all of you already have some access to that dimension within and we're just here to deepen it.

Or if you're completely new to this, this may be an occasion when you have your first glimpse of that in you which transcends your person, the personal life, the personal dimension. So just like the universe, and the universe is whatever is around you, the room you're sitting in, or you look at the stars at night or look out of the window. There's the universe with lots of things in it and it's easily overlooked that you're not dependent the most essential thing is not the things, but the space in between things.

Even the room that you're sitting in, there's stuff in it, furniture, there's a floor, a ceiling, walls, but the essence of every room is the space in the room. So there are two dimensions, form, furniture, walls, ceilings, floor, ceiling, floor, and space, formlessness. Or you look up into the sky at night, what do you see?

You see countless stars, most of which are suns, just like our sun, many of them much bigger, countless stars, and the vastness of space. Well, you can't actually see the vastness of space, you cannot see space, that's the strange thing, you can never say, oh, here is space, because space is not something, everything else is something. And now the amazing thing is there's an equivalent in you of what we call outer space, space, we could call it inner space, and that's the essence of who you are, just as the space in this room is the essence of this room, or the space that allows billions of stars and galaxies to exist out there is the essence, and yet you can never pinpoint it or examine it under a microscope.

So the essence of you, you also cannot pinpoint, scientists can examine your brain, but they won't find you there. We know almost nothing about the brain, of course, there's a connection between the brain and consciousness, but the brain is a kind of transmitter of consciousness or receiver, it does not actually generate consciousness, most scientists haven't discovered that yet. They claim to know what the brain is all about, we don't even know what a thought is.

No scientist knows what a thought, does it exist as molecules? Nobody knows what a thought is. And that's still the level of form, thought.

So the essence of who you are cannot be defined just as this place around you cannot be defined, it has no boundary, it's absolutely mysterious, you cannot know it in the sense that you know something in this world, you can only become aware of it by unknowing, by letting go of all that you know for a moment, and just be conscious and realize, you can be conscious of something, which is normal for everybody, you're conscious of perceptions and so on, but you can also be conscious of being conscious, and that is the transcendent dimension. And that at first, people may not understand what it is that these words are pointing to, be conscious of being conscious, sounds like some kind of duality, but that's only because we're using language. Now, as you know, as I've often pointed out, life or your life could be compared to a dream, things happen and then they evaporate, when you get towards the end of your life, it may begin to look more and more like a dream when you think back, and of course, a real dream, when you wake up in the morning, it dissolves, and you say it was just a dream, and many philosophers have argued about whether what you experience as your life is real or it's a dream, it's a question of perspective, of course, but it does have a very strong dreamlike quality, or if you want to use modern terminology, it's your movie, the movie of your life, some movies are very dramatic, with lots of sound and fury, to use the words of Shakespeare, full of sound and fury, and then Shakespeare adds signifying nothing, or another expression of Shakespeare is actually a play, much ado about nothing, and that's many people's lives, and it may not be until you reach the end of your life that you realize that most of it was really, you got upset about nothing much, it's better not to wait until the end of your life to realize that you often still get upset about nothing much, the movie, that's all. So is your life real?

Yes and no. Is it a dream? Depends how you look at it.

It certainly is dreamlike. Is this moment really happening, or am I just imagining it? Am I imagining that I'm looking at the screen and somebody is talking to me, and saying, are you dreaming?

You just don't know. What you do know is, that this is what you are experiencing at this moment, it is being experienced. And a prerequisite for this, so that it can be experienced, whether it's a dream or not, is what we could call the light of consciousness.

Without consciousness, there could be no dream or no experience. So the one thing you know without any doubt, is that you are conscious. And even that is not absolutely right when we put it like that.

Let's put it differently. The one thing that you know without any doubt, is not that you are conscious, because there's again a duality, I am conscious as if we're conscious with something added onto you. No.

The one thing that you know beyond any doubt is that you are consciousness. One does not accomplish great ends in some by and by future. Only in the present can you hammer out real achievement.

The worried mind tends to veer from the only real goal, realizing the atma, uniting with divinity, the true self within. So you cannot accomplish great ends in some future moment, only the present, only in the present, can you hammer out, as he translates, real achievement. So all true achievement is in the present moment, and that determines the quality of your life, as I call it.

How present you are in what you do, immediately brings quality into what you do. It's hard to define what I mean by quality if you cannot feel it. There's a, do something totally as a means to an end or observe somebody performing some action, only concerned about the outcome.

And you can see what I mean by low quality action. You'll be doing, going, want to get, I need to get there, do this, not paying attention to really to anything because you have some thought of future outcome, and you get upset at the slightest obstacle that comes into you. Of course, obstacles arise all the time, of course, in one's life.

I want to get there, but then something stops me. And immediately, when an obstacle comes in, somebody even questions something. You get either angry or fearful.

This shouldn't be happening. Whereas if you're aligned with the doing, then when an obstacle comes, immediately it's accepted and you look, you give it attention. And then you see, you immediately adjust to the newly arisen situation and take action.

You don't complain, oh, about somebody or some situation that has arisen. There's no huffing and puffing. As I sometimes call it, because many humans go through life huffing and puffing about this, complaining about this, shouldn't be this.

All that drops away because they're huffing, puffing, because they have some idea of what they want in some future moment. It's never going to come anyway. So as an obstacle arises, immediately you look at it.

And then intelligent action arises because you're aligned with the present moment, you become much more intelligent. Not knowledgeable, necessarily, but intelligent because you connect with a deeper level within yourself. And then what you say and do is more intelligent when you're aligned with what is instead of trying to get it out of the way.

That's the only way you can truly become intelligent. That's why there's a book by Krishnamurti called The Awakening of Intelligence because that's what it is. The true intelligence is not really awakened at universities.

There you acquire knowledge or you develop your ability to analyze, but it's not yet true intelligence. A little example from my own life. I was for several, quite a few years, I was counseling individuals and giving small talks for a number of years.

Spiritual talks. And I would write down often after giving a talk or after a counseling session, I would take notes and write down what I had said during those sessions. Often happened that I said things in counseling sessions with individuals or in very small groups.

I said things very often that I didn't know beforehand. It only came to me in the moment because it came from the depths of my being. They were intuitive realizations that came out of the present moment.

And they only came because the question was asked. Somebody asked the question or somebody had a problem. And so an answer came.

And then later, of course, I didn't know it. I knew these things. So I wrote it down afterwards.

So writings kind of notes accumulated over the years. And then at some point I realized there's a book that's going to be written, but I also knew the notes themselves are not the book yet. But I had a sense that a book was wanting to be written, wanting to be born into this world.

And that sense was halfway between having a vision of something that is almost inevitable and desiring something to happen. It was halfway in between. So when I wrote down, there is a book I knew.

I never used the future tense, as you must not in any manifestation. There is a book that will change the lives of millions of people and bring consciousness to the planet. And I wrote that down.

And that was, as I said, it's hard to describe, but the only way I can put it was halfway between writing down something that I already knew for sure, because it is a vision that had already some reality on some level, and halfway between that and between wanting something to manifest. So the wanting to manifest it and seeing it already as manifest, it was this kind of, became a single thing. And perhaps that is the most powerful way of manifesting when you have the feeling that what it is that you want to manifest actually already exists not in the physical universe, but on another level.

So I knew this book already existed. And the writing down of this affirmation was only just a reflection of what I already knew. This book already exists, and that I'm writing it down.

I drew a little circle on the paper. In the middle of the circle, there's the book. I don't think I didn't have the title for it yet.

And then I knew, then I said, now what comes out of that? Out of that comes this one line that says, I give talks all over the world and thousands of people come. I knew that.

And that again was not so much that I wanted it to happen. It was almost knowing that it would happen. It was almost like predicting the future rather than wanting to create the future or halfway in between.

There's a book, there's traveling English talks. And then there's another book I think I wrote. And there are various other things that I wrote down.

And I also wrote down that my life circumstances are more pleasant and there is financial abundance. So I'm not worried. I was not really worried about money and I lived on very little for many years and I was quite happy.

But my preference would be to have more abundance in my life. And through this, I said more abundance is coming into my life. And a very pleasant living situation.

There were a few other things associated with the central thing. And those things I've focused on for, I don't know how long, maybe several weeks. And then I put it aside and then a few more weeks focused on it every day.

I think it's on my wall somewhere and focus on it. And then I moved many times. This piece of paper got forgotten.

It got somewhere to my paper. And two, three years passed and I actually completely forgot that I had written this piece of paper. And then various things happened.

And I've suddenly, without going into detail, the energy stream came within me. Oh, and the book suddenly started to come, be written through me. I used a little bit of some of the notes that I had written, but they were not the book.

The book was an empowered energy stream. Oh yes, that came maybe three years after doing this piece of paper. Vision board, they call it sometimes, or something like that.

I realized, well, not that much is happening yet. I'm still doing these small, very small scale. I'm helping a small number of people and that's good, but I knew I could help so many more, but why isn't it, it's not happening yet.

And then as well, one further affirmation I did, and it only, I only did it for one day, I think, or two days. I went into a church in a small village church in Somerset in England, where the county where I was living at the time. And this empty church, I sat there and I looked at the symbols and I just, in the stillness, I said, I asked, I actually asked for something.

That's strange, one shouldn't normally ask for things, but all I asked for is acceleration. I said, I'm asking for acceleration. I knew it was happening, but it was too slow.

Said, I'm asking for acceleration, please. And I could feel it had been received and I could feel, somehow I could feel the reality of acceleration within myself already. And soon after that, everything started to change in my life.

I had to move away from where I was living. I had an internal impulse to move away. I had to sell everything.

I had to move to the West Coast of North America. And there suddenly the book came out and then everything got accelerated. And now let's go forward a few more years.

The power of now is out. It has reached millions of people. Oh yes, I'd also written down on this original paper, translated into don't know how many languages.

All that was there. I'd even colored it. I remember there were red colors and blue black.

The center was like the sun emanating various things. And so forward a few years, the power of now was out. It was a bestseller, been translated into many languages.

Oprah had discovered it. I had financial abundance. All those things were there.

I was unpacking my things. A trunk was coming from England where some of my things had been stored. And I was going through my old papers.

And at that point I saw this old paper that I had written many years before. This thing that I described and then read it. Oh my God, it's all happened.

I forgot that I had written all this completely. And then it was all already written down and it all came to pass. How amazing.

I was kind of speechless. So that's more or less the story of how it happened. The story goes that he was the only one that understood that sermon of the Buddha, the one who smiled.

I could have held this flower up and stopped speaking. And the Buddha's silent sermon, 2,600 years ago, people still remember it. He sat there and he was going to speak and then suddenly he saw this flower and he took this flower and looked at it.

For how long, nobody knows, but it must have gone on for a long time and everybody got restless. That's called the Buddha's silent sermon. And then after half an hour or one hour, we don't know, because they didn't have clocks then.

One of the, because they were all monks at that time, other people didn't have access to anything, to spiritual teachings. I talk about that in the New Earth at the beginning. One of the monks, all the other monks looked puzzled.

What's he trying to do, what's he saying? And one monk suddenly started to smile. And the story goes that he was the only one that understood that sermon of the Buddha, the one who smiled.

And this smile was, according to the story or the legend or the scriptures, the smile was passed on from generation to generation of teacher and pupil. So he became a teacher, that monk. And they say he passed on the smile, which really means the realization, to the next and the next and the next, and after six or seven or whatever generations, it became the origin of Zen.

That's how the story goes. So what is it then that he smiled about? Well, let's not conceptualize it.

I think you will realize it for yourself as we progress here. Not, are we then returning, when we go into nature, are we then returning to the level that trees live at or flowers or minerals or birds, whatever it is, is it an act of return to a primordial stage of being? Not quite.

We join whatever natural thing it is that we are perceiving. We join it in the state of no thought. But when we go there, we've gone through thought already.

We rise above thought. The flower exists below thought. So, and then we meet in the dimension of no thought.

But at a very deep level, we do not become the flower or the cabbage. Well, you had a choice. You'd probably rather be a flower than a cabbage, but cabbage is beautiful too.

We are not regressing. Cabbage is fine for the cabbage, but not for us. The cabbage is totally at ease with itself, one with a source, doesn't inhabit a world of problems, doesn't generate conflict.

The cabbage is rooted in being. So is the tree, so is the flower, and even the dog. Well, most of them, and the cat, except those who have lived for 20 years, or too long with neurotic humans, they are rooted in being.

And this is why people love dogs and cats. It's not, there's actually a deep reason, a deep meaning to that, because they can sense that the dog or the cat is more deeply rooted in being, is more at rest within him or herself than the human. The human has gone out very far from the source into further and further differentiation.

Everything originates from the one source of all life, the unmanifested, formless, timeless, one source. Everything then comes out of that source, and humans are a product, a very differentiated product, gone out a long way from the source, a little bit like the prodigal son in the New Testament who leaves the father's home and squanders his wealth and becomes destitute. He has left the source.

He has gone so far out that he becomes destitute. He doesn't remember his origins anymore. So the dog, and even less so the flower or the tree, they haven't gone out that far, so to speak, from the source.

There's still more of a connection to their origin, and this is also why they are not fearful of death. They don't think about, oh, I'm going to die, and when an animal dies, an animal is very accepting. It surrenders into that.

It doesn't make a problem out of living, and it doesn't make a problem out of dying. It doesn't live on the level of problem-making, which is a level when you lose your sense of connectedness with the source, and this is because you're identified with a thinking mind, then a world of problems arises. You create a world of, that's what you manifest then, and that's what you end up with on this planet, on this beautiful planet, which is paradise.

You end up with layers and layers of complexity and increasing problems. Oh, my God, it's all getting so complicated. It's just survival is getting complicated, very complicated.

So really, now, when we talk about nature exists closer to the source, we have gone out very far, and for us, it's not a return to the original level where the animal lives or the tree lives. It's a transcendence where you regain awareness of the source of being with full consciousness rather than as a natural state, and you don't really know. The dog doesn't know that the dog is one with being.

He just is one with being. The tree doesn't know. If you tell the tree, are you one with being, if the tree could understand you, of course, but it doesn't have conceptual.

Trees are one with being? Don't know. So there is a, but if you look at nature, everything exists in its, it's so much, so at rest within itself.

It has so much integrity. Everything natural has such integrity. Integrity, the word originally means being one with yourself, not having split yourself into two or three.

For example, when you say me and my life, the tree doesn't say me and my life, my difficult life. The tree is life, an expression of life. The human says, I have a hard life.

And the hard life that the human says he or she has is a mental construct because it has no real reality except as a movement of thought because the only real life that you have is at this moment ever, always. This is your life now. I'm sitting here, breathing, perceiving.

There's aware presence. This is life. This is your life.

The rest is memories or anticipations or thinking. So the dog doesn't have a life. The dog is an unproblematic expression of life.

So it's everything in nature. It is life manifesting, the one timeless, sacred, deep down, the one formless life becoming form as millions of life forms coming out of them. They say with the Big Bang, it all started.

Who knows? So before the Big Bang, there was nothing. Nobody understands that because you can't understand nothing.

No thing, no form, no time. Out of that void, which is also the fullness of infinite potential, came the forms. More and more differentiated over millions and millions of years.

And then finally, it becomes the human mind, the most differentiated as far as we can see. There may be others even more mad somewhere else in the universe. You are continuously thinking and analyzing and evaluating.

And then the entity that has to carry that mind is completely out of touch with the source. You're not cut off from the original source, the original oneness. You just don't know it's there.

And so that's it. That's the state of being lost, lost in your mind, lost in the world, split yourself in two or three, having a life that you don't like, me and my life, me and my story, my sad story. And then life is perceived no longer as a joyful expression of the underlying oneness, but becomes a burden.

Gets heavier and heavier. And so this has happened to humanity. Humanity is, this species is at a critical stage now.

There's a possibility of a shift into a deeper state or higher state, if you want to call it that, of transcending conceptual thinking, going beyond. You can still think, but no longer trapped in thinking. This is where humanity has to go.

And as you transcend conceptual thinking, you regain what was lost eons, eons ago. You regain your sense of connectedness with being. You feel deep down, and you're connected with something vast, and it's not different from who you are.

Just when we put it into language, it sounds as if that was something different from who you are. You're connected with being, with a sense of simple beingness. Being comes from the word to be, to be the most primordial thing.

And everything in nature is an expression of that underlying beingness, and including the physical body. This body, this body. All that we perceive in this world is existence.

Exists, it exists. This body exists. This body exists.

Underlying existence is being. Being is the formless, timeless dimension within yourself. It's very much like the black hole at the center of the galaxy.

When I was writing The Power of Now, I wrote, I don't know why I wrote that, it just came to me one day. I wrote, there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. And the editor saw it and said, you can't say that because you don't know.

How can you know that? People are going to argue with that. So it was taken out.

And some years later, I read an article by a scientist and said, now scientists believe that there is a black hole at the center of every galaxy. And so, why did I know that? I knew that because I could feel the black hole inside myself.

This spacious, formless, one life, the origin. And so, and I know that the human being is a microcosm. It's just, you can understand the whole universe by understanding yourself.

You are just a microscopic version of that. So that's the, we are regaining by no longer being lost in the conceptualizing mind. We regain something that was lost a long, long time ago, very much like the prodigal son in the New Testament.

Your origin. Not your origin in, you can't say, it's not really your origin in time. It's not saying, okay, my origin was six billion years ago.

That's where I started when the Big Bang happened. That was the beginning of me. That's true, of course.

That was the beginning, but it's not so much that the origin is in the distant past, or not even in the near past. The origin is timeless. I'm glad you could make it.

I trust you're okay with stillness. To be okay with stillness, you have to access the stillness within you. Otherwise, it gets uncomfortable.

If you experience joy or moments of joy or beauty, aliveness, a sense of aliveness, a loving connection with another human being or a loving connection with another life form, or if you have any creative idea, in your life or anything creative comes to you, all those things that I just mentioned imply that you have some access already to the stillness inside you, because all those things, the joy, the sense of aliveness, the lovingness towards others, the creative impulse, the creative idea, all that comes from that dimension in you. Now, many humans have some access to that dimension. That's why they feel it's good to be alive.

And for most humans, that access gets, for long periods of time, covered up again by excessive mind activity. And then it resurfaces again. It's not recognized usually directly for what it is.

It is recognized indirectly. So you may be aware that suddenly you feel a sense of joy and aliveness, or you look at another human being and you feel a deep sense of connection. So what happens there is that dimension arises.

You don't recognize it directly. You recognize it as joy. You recognize it as a loving connection or a loving kindness, or a creative impulse, or a sense of heightened aliveness, or the recognition of beauty.

You look and, oh, isn't that beautiful? And in the looking and the recognition of the beauty, you may not realize that what underlies that, that which makes it possible, is that for a moment, there was no thought activity in your mind. A space opened up.

That space, that is the stillness. And that is why you could recognize the beauty. Or that is why you felt the connection with another human.

Or a simple aliveness arose within you. So it comes spontaneously to you. There are some humans, quite a few, who almost never experience that opening into the alive stillness.

And their lives are truly miserable. They may not even know that. They may not even know that their lives are miserable.

They think it's normal to be continuously immersed in the thinking. Isn't everybody else? Now, a deepening happens when you recognize that stillness directly.

It may happen spontaneously in a situation. You're looking at a tree, and for a moment, there's no thought. There's just the perception and the stillness in the background.

So you begin to recognize it directly as the foundation for joy, for love, for also compassion, empathy with another. You can't arrive at empathy through conceptual thinking. You cannot sense the aliveness of another human being through conceptual thinking.

But only thinking needs to subside for a moment, and then the sense of separation that's created by continuous thinking disappears in that moment. So I'm inviting you to enter the stillness. Another way of putting it, I'm inviting you to stop thinking without falling asleep.

That's one way, but that's not the way here. And this is the next evolutionary level for humans, rising above thinking, not abandoning thinking altogether, transcending thinking. Thinking can still operate much more powerfully, by the way, when it's rooted consciously in the stillness.

Now, if you're still thinking, this becomes boring or uncomfortable. If it's not boring or uncomfortable, then you are in that state of freedom from thought. You may sense your presence, so to speak, the presence that you are, the essence of you, sense it as a whole body realization, just a sense of presence throughout the body as you sit here.

And that is a sense of heightened aliveness. And if you choose to look around, still sensing this heightened aliveness in your entire energy field, if you then look around, you see that also whatever you are perceiving feels more alive. Even inanimate objects have a certain beingness.

They are. Even a table, chair, even there, there's some life. They are called inanimate, which means, I suppose, lifeless.

But if you look more deeply into the molecular structure of the chair or the table, you would see intense aliveness and intense movement. So at this very moment, the universe, we could say, appearing as you experiences itself. Of course, that's the truth.

You're not separate from the universe. It's an amazing thing. The universe appearing briefly as what we call a person, a cell within the totality, experiencing itself.

So that's the, so the cessation of compulsive and involuntary thinking could be described as the essence of spiritual awakening. The cessation of compulsive thinking. Thinking is addictive for most humans.

Almost every human, except those that have started to disidentify from thinking are addicts. And the greatest addiction is the addiction to thinking. Not to fruitful thinking, not to creative thinking, not to thinking that actually solves problems, but to thinking that is futile, that is destructive, that instead of solving problems, creates problems.

Thinking that creates anxiety, that creates fear, that creates grievances, that creates regrets, that creates all kinds of dysfunctional states, that creates enemies because it's ego, egoic thinking. That is what needs to come to an end. And when that comes to an end, then real thinking, constructive, fruitful, creative thinking can happen.

Thinking is an amazing thing. And we don't, we haven't even started. We're just beginning to touch on what is possible by using the human mind.

A time will come, I don't predict the future very often, but when humans can create through thought already, to some extent, you can do that. You can manifest things through thought. Many of you have already done it.

It's not an answer to your state of dissatisfaction because so we need to go, there's something more fundamental than that that needs to be done first. That needs to be realized first. And then you can create, but it will no longer be the ego that's creating, but something deeper from within you will be creating through your mind.

So a time will come when we won't have factories anymore and all these weird things. We won't need that anymore. We'll create the few things in the material realm that we need.

They can just go, there it is. It's not going to be a Rolls Royce or anything like that, but you won't need that. But so the mind is powerful, a powerful creator.

As Causing Miracles says, every thought creates form on some level. Thought is creative. But more importantly is to access the dimension that is deeper than thought.

And then thought can be in the service of universal intelligence. And then you are the intermediary. You are that through which universal intelligence creates.

Your mind is that through which universal intelligence creates. So this is why, although there are books like the secret and so on, there's a lot of good things in those books, but what they sometimes neglect is to showing the absolute importance of the foundation, which is prior to manifesting through your mind. The foundation is finding the fulfillment of the essence of who you are and the fulfillment of your life, not by projecting, by thinking, when I achieve this, I will be fulfilled because no matter what you create, if you haven't gone, your ability to create is limited anyway, but yes, you can create as an ego too.

Although the ability is limited, you have enough ability to create to create havoc on the planet. So what sometimes these books fail to mention is to put the emphasis on the fact that nothing that you manifest or create in this world is going to satisfy you for long, unless you have accessed the essence of who you are, unless you have realized the essence of who you are beyond the person that comes first. That is the foundation.

This is why I don't speak too much about how to manifest things. This will come by itself. So the cessation of thinking is something that you need to invite into your life, not by suppressing thinking, but by letting go of resistance, resistance, one of the quickest portals into cessation of thinking is letting go of resistance to the present moment, inner resistance to whatever appears in your consciousness at this moment as whatever, and it changes all the time.

One situation, another situation, people, events come into the field of consciousness. And as we mentioned the other day, most humans are in an almost continuous state of not wanting what is, or rather wanting something else that seems to be more important at some future point. And we need to recognize the dysfunction of that state of consciousness.

And one of the greatest spiritual practices is what I call to make the present moment your friend. To make the present moment your friend is to say yes internally to whatever arises in this moment. The conditioned thought processes never stop.

They go continuously. There's a voice talking to you, or you're talking to yourself, or you're having a monologue, or you're having a dialogue. Some people argue with themselves.

It's all the voice in the head never stops for most people. And that is, spiritually speaking, that is a state of unconsciousness, completely identified with the conditioned mental emotional patterns, which make up the so-called person, personality, the ego. So if you are completely identified with it, every thought has you in its grasp.

Every emotion that arises has you completely in its grasp. And you're thinking, you think you're thinking, but you're not thinking. Thinking happens to you.

There's no, you don't have a choice. If you're unconscious, there's no choice. All your thought processes happen to you.

You're at the mercy of your thoughts, of the conditioned thoughts in your head. And all the reactions that come with it, every situation you encounter, there comes a conditioned reaction to the situation. It's the person or the personality that reacts.

And you don't even have a choice. Why don't you have a choice? Because you're asleep, spiritually speaking.

This thing, it's taken you over. It's a dream-like state also. And you can see, often, people are completely up there.

They're never really, they're not really here. You can see sometimes the complete absence in a person's eyes. They're not really here, they're asleep.

But they're thinking very hard. And even at night, when there's nobody around to talk to, you're still, the voice is going on. And it's telling you, I have these problems.

What's going to happen next? Awful, sick, my God. I can't take any more of this.

What's my life come to? I imagined something different when I was 20 years old. I imagined something very different.

Why did it all go so wrong? Well, that's, well, many people actually have that feeling that something, that has gone drastically wrong in my life. And with others, it's a mixed bag.

Some things went okay, and others didn't. It depends what their mind, and your mind tends to focus more on the negative than the positive. Much more memorable, the negative, than the positive.

If you go on vacation, and everything goes perfectly fine, okay, you'll remember some nice moments and sunsets. But if something went drastically wrong, you'll remember that for the rest of your life, and you talk about it continuously. You tell the story of what went wrong.

If everything went fine, you don't talk about it, you'll be at a wonderful holiday. Oh yeah, okay, well, that's the end of it. But you know what happened?

We went into our room, and there was these cockroaches crying on the floor, and then the water was coming to the ceiling, and then they stole all my bags. Oh my God. It's so interesting.

And then you know what he said to me? He said, how dare you? And I said, how dare I?

What about you? You are the one with the biggest ego, I said. And then he started hitting me, and whatever.

And the stories go on and on. And so a lot of the things, the negative things are much more memorable, that the ego focuses on that. It loves its enemies, and every negative situation is the ego's enemy.

And then it can claim, it can enhance its fictitious identity. The more enemies you have, the stronger your fictitious sense of self becomes. Entire nations do that, too.

They need their enemies. Except Sweden, it's so peaceful. And...

All the non-peace-loving people have left Sweden a long time ago. They were called the Vikings. And they occupied other lands.

So, then we have, in Indian spiritual philosophy of psychology, there's a word that's been around for a long time. It's called Turiya. Turiya means the force.

First, second, third, fourth. Turiya is the force. It's the force is, it refers to a state of consciousness.

They divided the human consciousness into these four parts. There is dreamless sleep. There is the dream state in sleep.

There is the state of wakefulness, which is ordinary human consciousness. And Turiya is the awakened state of consciousness. That's the fourth state of consciousness.

They've been talking about that for hundreds of years, thousands of years. The possibility of this dimension of consciousness arising in humans, the fourth state. This is what this is all about.

And it is not some distant possibility that you may achieve in some future lifetime. As many people still believe that. Many Buddhists, I've met Buddhists who say, I think I'll need another 15 lifetimes.

And then, in fact, my teacher told me, they say, he told me 15 more lifetimes and then I'll be enlightened. Oh, wow. Okay, that's right.

Well, you have plenty of time so you can stay unconscious now. It's okay. But the strange thing is, the awakened state of consciousness is already there within you.

It's just covered up, hidden. An essential part of awakening spiritually is going beyond a conceptualized sense of self and living in a conceptual reality. And of course, all that implies being identified with thinking because concepts are thoughts.

So for many people, the question arises, how do I see myself? And there's a very common problem people have and that's called self-esteem. What value do I have?

What value does my life have? Compared to others. Some years ago, the Dalai Lama was asked by somebody about self-esteem and he didn't understand the word self-esteem.

And somebody, the interpreter, spent several minutes trying to explain to him the meaning of self-esteem and she just couldn't get it. Now, of course, you might say, well, if I were the Dalai Lama, I wouldn't have a problem with self-esteem either, but that's not it. Self-esteem and the way in which it's conventionally used is comparative and it's always connected to ego.

How do I rate myself relative to others, either in achievement, worldly achievement, abilities, knowledge, physical appearance, physical strength, good looks, bad looks, fat, thin? And usually it's related to what you have, possessions, what you can do, abilities, what you know, knowledge, and physical appearance. And that's an interesting thing when you look at your life from that point of view.

There's always a sense of unease because there are always others who are better at at least some of these than you are. And then there are others who are worse. I would suggest that the only healthy self-esteem is a self-esteem that is derived from a deeper place than any of those things that usually make up a person's self-esteem.

How you look, what you can do, your knowledge or your abilities, or even weird things like who you know. The strangest thing make up a person's self-esteem. And sometimes it's based in some kind of reality, of course.

And in many other cases, it's a total fiction, but the ego needs that. So if you are, let's say, you're not good at anything in particular, there's nothing much that you can do. You're not wealthy, don't have much, don't have a lot of knowledge, haven't read many books.

Don't look great. And your body is not that great, neither your facial appearance nor your body are that great. What do you do then?

I hope there's nobody in this room who thinks, oh, that's me.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

[Speaker 1] (7:29:17 - 8:18:15)
Oh. Oh. Oh.

First of all, usually the ego would create a certain narrative to compensate for that feeling of inferiority in an attempt to create some sense, at least in one area of superiority. So I would suggest there is no, in that, used in that sense, there's no healthy self-esteem. The only healthy self-esteem is not derived from how you look or how physically strong you are or your abilities in whatever area or your possessions or the knowledge that you have acquired or any other things, your family background.

In some countries, that's a very important thing. Who is your family? Your grandfather, your great-grandfather.

They have that sense that determines their self-esteem. In the West, especially in the new world, North America, maybe South America too, Central America, that sense of family history is not as strong. But if you go to Europe, there are still quite a few people who have very high self-esteem, and that's derived from the existence of their ancestors.

They've never done anything, but their ancestors did. You have to go a little deeper into yourself, and true self-esteem is not comparative. It's not I am better than or less than.

Quite simply, that sense of value, of worthiness, is derived from that deeper place of, quite simply, your presence, the presence of you, the presence of consciousness. If you can sense that presence of you, you don't need to compare yourself anymore to anybody else. You know that that is who you are in your essence, and no narrative is required anymore in your mind to justify your existence or to explain who you are in relation to others.

When you think you have a choice and suddenly you become present, that means presence has chosen to come through you. So I sometimes say that you can choose, once a certain level of presence is in you, you can choose to be present, like now. I can choose to go into my mind and start thinking about my life.

Where am I coming from? Where am I going? Where am I going?

Or I can choose to be reactive when things happen. Well, it looks as if I didn't have a choice, but many people still don't have a choice. The reaction comes.

They're taken over by the reaction. But when there's a certain degree of presence in you, you have a choice. You might forget that you have a choice, but you have a choice.

This is how it looks like, looked at it from the outside, that you have a choice. It's true. But if you look at it from the inside, when you think you have a choice to be present, presence is choosing to come through you.

When you think you have a choice and suddenly you become present, that means presence has chosen to come through you. Nevertheless, it is helpful to feel that you have a choice from this perspective, the outside perspective. That's what presence wants you to feel that you have a choice.

Ultimately, you are present. You are the one consciousness. So it's not that you don't choose presence.

It's just a helpful perspective, a temporary perspective. So when you are dealing with a difficult person or an unconscious person, which is the same thing, an obnoxious person, unconscious person, angry person, unconscious person, then you have a choice. You can be drawn into their unconsciousness, can easily slip.

Any one person, one angry or upset or deeply negative unconscious person can pull an entire room full of people. Like let's say there's a committee meeting of 20 people and one of those 20 people attacks others. This one person can pull almost virtually everybody into his or her deeply unconscious negative state.

This is how contagious a negative state can be. One very unconscious person in a room can do that. You could almost also say that sometimes a few very unconscious people, and this happened before, can create an entire war because they draw others in.

This could, perhaps it was how the First World War started. Nobody exactly knows what were they all fighting about. It started with one person killing somebody in what later became Yugoslavia.

I don't know the details. It's just too much. Don't want to go into that.

One so-called terrorist or whatever killed somebody and that became the First World War. So one, millions and millions killed in a room. The same thing, one unconscious person can pull everybody into, and before you know it, they're all fighting and shouting at each other.

So there is a danger there because you need to know that. But if you remember that there you have a choice at that moment to be drawn into that or to be there as an aware presence, then you can be where as an, continue to be there as an aware presence. And then that could make all the difference to the energy field in the room.

It could dissolve the unconsciousness of that one deeply unconscious person. Just one person who remains presence. And sometimes it's very helpful.

You can have a group of people discussing things, an organization, whatever they're doing. And one person there who can be, as we could call it, an anchor for presence can help the entire group to remain relatively present while they are discussing whatever it is that they need to discuss. That is a wonderful thing when you realize that possibility.

Or if you are in a group of people and you are there as a non-reactive presence, and if the others in that group are so deeply unconscious that they go on and go off into violent conflict, mentally, emotionally violent, might even come to blows. Often you see in certain countries in parliaments, they discuss something and then suddenly they jump up and start hitting each other. And some countries, it doesn't come, they don't quite hit each other, but they get close.

There's a lot of shouting, can be quite amusing, but so if you, often one person can make a lot of difference, so-called persons, not the person. And if it cannot, if you don't affect the energy fields, then very quickly you will not remain where you are. If your state of consciousness is completely incompatible with your surroundings, your surroundings are so deeply unconscious that there's no way it could affect those, then a separation will happen like oil and water.

You will find yourself being removed from there. That just happens. It can happen with yourself waking up one morning and saying, okay, I'm not going in, this is it.

Or find yourself walking out, goodbye. Or they call you and say, we don't need you, I'm afraid we'll have to let you go. You're too conscious for this organization.

You don't fit in at all anymore. I don't know what happened to you. And you're disrupting everything here.

Although this is not a retreat as such, I suggest that you use your time here, make it into a kind of a retreat. And all that it means is, your main interest is in consciousness while you are walking in this lovely small town, looking at things, talking to people. Be the presence rather than the power of the mind.

Be the person that needs to interpret everything. Be the presence behind the awareness. Sorry, be the awareness behind the sense perceptions.

Like now, you cannot improve this moment by adding unnecessary thought to it. What thought would you want to add to this moment? You just, it just detracts from the aliveness and beauty of this moment.

The mind, of course, can't sense that. And it'll say, what do you mean? What's beautiful about this moment?

Well, everything, the stillness in this room, the spaciousness, the lights, the beings, your being, and the consciousness that you are, without which none of this would be, could be. Sensing yourself as the conscious presence, let's see, ocean. Yes, you're also a person with a body and a personalized sense of self, that's the ripple.

So you go from being a ripple to being ocean. And then you can be both, so that you no longer have, okay, you can be either meditating and very aware. And usually the people go then, I'm practicing mindfulness, or they go about their daily life.

Okay, I've done mindfulness for 20 minutes. Yes. Okay, what do I have to do now?

Oh my gosh, gosh, gosh, I can't deal with all this. There are emails I haven't answered, all these emails, funny. Okay, and then eight hours later, oh, time for more mindfulness.

It's better than no mindfulness, of course. At least you have it there, if you have it. Maybe you're just trying.

But bring it into every moment so that you have whatever it is you're doing and always a sense of yourself as the presence. And this is wonderful when you can feel your presence. It's not yours, but I call it yours.

Because the moment I say your presence, I've created a duality. There's you and there's the presence, but there is no duality there. You are the presence.

Language or language creates duality. So that's fine. So feel the presence.

Right now, you are both a person, but to be a person, you need to remember who you are. Of course, you need to think about me and my life. Then you're a person.

Or at this very moment, you can also be the presence. When there's little or no conceptualization in your mind, but just an arising of what before was the background comes into the foreground. And then you start thinking without losing a sense of presence in the background.

Then thinking is actually not bad at all. It's only when thinking becomes self-serving and you lose yourself in it, then it gets very problematic. It creates one problem after another, pretending, wanting to solve problems.

That's self-serving thinking. So let's practice now here being the presence. No thought and sensing how liberating that is.

Not needing to know anything beyond that. No conceptual knowledge required for that at all. And if some concept is needed, somebody approaches you, you're just looking around.

Somebody comes and says, oh, can you tell me how to get to such and such a street? Then the mind starts and it's fine. And that's an amazing way to live.

But you can only, you don't need the narratives anymore. Only when you live in connectedness with the deeper level of your being, with the, only when you know that you are and the sense of already being complete on that level, not needing anything on that level, already being fully yourself on that level. You're not perhaps fully yourself on the level of form.

You can still achieve things. You can still learn new things, master new things, try out new things. Why not?

There you are not complete. But on the level of the depth level of being, you are at the deepest level, you are already fully yourself in the timeless present moment of being. You only need to sense that in yourself.

Then you can operate on the two levels and then you don't need these narratives, spin these narratives anymore in order to continuously enhance your mind made sense of self. And then you can be with situations, allow them to be as they are without imposing any unnecessary story on it. So people behave the way they behave.

People don't always do what they're supposed to do. They just act according to their level of consciousness and you just accept that. They act or whatever they do, that's what they do.

The situations are as they are already. So you no longer, because many narratives have this element of deep resentment to them too. You might notice that when the mind constructs narrative as they do in the collective too, these people don't believe what we believe and therefore they are actually bad, evil people.

How can they not believe the truth? They believe that this event happened 100 years, and in the year so-and-so, but in Christianity it happened too in the past, more than now. When was Jesus born?

I'm telling you it was then. What? You don't believe he was not born on the 24th of December?

That's totally wrong. And people killed each other for that. So be careful of narratives, but the only, I cannot, I'm not saying don't have narratives anymore.

First, get in touch with the stillness within, then you'll notice from there that when the narrative still arise, you can smile, or when you can, before you know it, you might have been talking to somebody about your story, and then you notice it and you can smile, and then you realize you don't really need that story anymore. And then it could be that you're not as popular anymore at dinner parties, because you don't have these interesting narratives about what happened, or these people did, but do you know what he did? You'll never believe it.

That's what he did. Oh God, wow. I thought he was, I knew he was like that.

I had my suspicions. So the, there are many Zen stories like that, where the essence of Zen is, of course, to live without a narrative in that simplicity of awareness. And then the simplicity is the famous saying that you probably know from Zen, chopping wood, carrying water, is a Zen saying, which is what you do in the Zen monastery every day.

You chop the wood for the fire, and you carry water for washing or cleaning, and every day you chop wood. And so there's a Zen saying, chopping wood, carrying water, which means you go about your life without adding anything to it. There's not the story of, I can't stand this anymore.

I've been chopping wood now for three years. Why doesn't somebody else do it? Why the, oh, we should employ somebody.

We must get, and this carrying water, just, it's getting too much for me. Why should I have to do that? I'd rather be somewhere else.

I'd rather be playing golf than carrying water. These are all stories that go through people's minds that stop them from being, giving their fullest attention to whatever they're doing at the present moment, doing with resentment. You do what you do it, but there's resentment behind the doing.

You're doing it, but you don't really want to be doing it because I shouldn't be doing that, or whatever the narrative is, why you shouldn't be doing that, or don't want to be, would rather be doing something else. The famous bumper stickers on cars. I'd rather be fishing.

I'd rather be golfing. I'd rather be in Hawaii. Or as Ram Dass's bumper sticker that I saw on his car, I'd rather be here now.

So, that's a good one. I'd rather be here now. So, then you have then always fully in whatever activity you're doing, it's not being obstructed by some kind of story in your mind, then you can give your fullest attention to whatever you're doing without interference of some entity up here that doesn't really want to be doing it for some reason.

And so, many people have continuously some stuff going on there that is in conflict with whatever is happening or with whatever they are doing in the present, not perhaps permanent conflict, but a lot of conflict with whatever they are doing.

That prevents a high quality of activity because one can look at activity in terms of quality. Quality in doing something is intrinsically connected with the degree of presence of consciousness that flows into the doing.

So, when you buy something that is of quality, whether it's a work of art or somebody has made it, then that sense of quality derives from the consciousness of the maker of that thing, whatever it may be, because it shows there is attention in it. There is complete attention to the present moment. It wasn't somebody said, oh, we must finish that as soon as possible so that we can make as many things as we can today.

Let's make it as quickly as possible. So, every doing is a means to an end, to the next moment. Let's make this.

And you're already looking to the next one while you're making this. So, in other words, you'd rather be there than here. That's low quality doing.

You're not present in the doing. And because there's mental interference, it creates the thought of the next moment where you would rather be because the next moment is always a thought. The next moment has no actual existence except as a thought.

Isn't that interesting? There is no next moment unless you think about the next moment. I have to think about that.

No, you can't. Is that true? You have to start thinking.

Is there no next moment unless I think about the next? Let me think about that. I'm getting very confused.

It's actually quite simple. It's so obvious. It's like saying, here's an apple.

Yeah, it is an apple. It's true. That's what we call it, an apple.

There it is. There is no next moment. There's only ever this moment, obviously, away from your thoughts.

So if you continuously live as if the next moment were more important than this one, you cannot give your fullest attention to this one. That diminishes the quality of your doing. It decreases your connectedness with true intelligence where creativity comes from, inspiration comes from, which can then not flow into what you're doing or only trickles, little trickles might still flow, but perhaps not even that because you're always, you're looking to the next thing.

You're not fully with this thing, when the next thing is mental stuff. It's a thought. So that's another aspect of the interference of narrative because even the next thing is a small narrative in your head.

And that tells you, I need to get there. I'd rather be there already. Therefore, I need to get this out of the way quickly.

And then whatever you are doing here is not, you're not fully present with it, which is reflected in the quality of the doing, which has infinite repercussions because other people are affected by it also. And so your life then continuously is experienced as unsatisfying because you never arrive at the next thing because when the next thing comes, it's the next thing. You're trapped in a mind pattern that says you live for the next thing.

So if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you're in a state of lack, of insufficiency, of not enough, and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible, then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack in order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough, spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary.

Focus on the realization of being. It's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack, which is ego. Go within and discover who or what you are beyond.

That's the person. If dreadful things happened in your past, it is especially liberating to sense that. And it's often people who have had a very difficult life that come to this realization.

They have had their crucifixion and then there comes the transcendence of suffering. And again, please remember, I'm just using words. So it's not the ultimate truth cannot be expressed in words.

It's only a distant approximation. That which you sense when thinking subsides, if only for a moment, and you can sense the beingness that is always there underneath it, the timeless presence, you sense that. Is that, and then as you can sense that and you become more rooted in it, even in your daily life, you begin to be able to sense that in the background through the simple fact that you're aware that you're aware, even when you're doing things.

You're aware that you're aware when you're looking at something, there's not only what you're looking at, there's only the awareness that you're aware of. So that's there, the awareness of awareness. And that, now, is that God?

I would suggest not quite. It is, I'm speaking purely intuitively, but some mystics and others have had similar realizations. It's the emanation of God, in other words, the consciousness that inhabits you and temporarily disguises itself as a person is an emanation of the source, of all life.

And that source, which cannot be named, which does not exist, because exist means to have a location in space and time, everything exists is somewhere. So in that sense, God does not exist because God does not have a, God is beyond this dimension where existence unfolds. But like the sun emanating light, God, or the source of all life, which cannot be named or understood at all, emanates consciousness into this dimension.

And gradually, this dimension evolves. Gradually, it expresses more of that light that emanates from the transcendent source of all life. Gradually, because this was an important discovery of Darwin that there is an evolution of life.

It becomes increasingly complex. What he didn't realize is there's an intelligence that expresses itself through that. So there's a source of all life beyond the transcendent source, which is God.

And God shines like the sun shines. And the light of the sun, you can feel it on your skin. Now, whether you say this is a sun, in some sense, the light of the sun is the sun because there's no separation.

But in another sense, the sun is not different, but infinitely faster than the light that you feel on your skin. In the same way that the emanation of God, which is consciousness, yes, it's God in the sense of it is an emanation of God. And so this is what you are.

You're an emanation from source, source emanation. And the consciousness in you is the light, as Jesus said to his disciples, but he meant really every human being because his disciples were not that special. You are the light of the world, he said.

And he said it of himself in another gospel. He said, I am the light of the world. He said both things.

He told others, you are the light of the world. And he said, I am the light of the world. What could that possibly be except that because the people he was talking to were not special, particularly important VIPs in this world, but you are the light of the world.

The light in you is the consciousness in you. And without the consciousness, you are the consciousness of the world. You are the light of the world.

Without the consciousness, the world would not even be. And that is when you realize that, that your essential identity is being consciousness, which is an emanation of source, whatever you want to call that, and your essential identity is that, the being. And then that, then that is where you derive your sense of identity from who you are.

It's no longer the memory of your past becomes relatively insignificant. Yes, you remember it, but the wonderful thing about your past, it has brought you to this point of awakening, no matter how senseless it seemed at the time, because every life is kind of messy in one way or another. And many things seem, why did this happen to me?

Why did I do that? That was so stupid. Or why did this have to happen to me?

My childhood could have been, it was so unhappy. Why did this? But all your past, it brings you to this point of awakening.

So it fulfilled its function, but it no longer gives you an identity. You recognize it. You acknowledge it, you know it, but you no longer derive your sense of who you are from your past.

That comes from a deeper place. Ah, you can sense the presence that you are, the being that you are, not conditioned by your past whatsoever. And this is especially liberating if you have a very heavy past.

If dreadful things happened in your past, it is especially liberating to sense that. And it's often people who have had a very difficult life that come to this realization. They have had their crucifixion, and then there comes the transcendence of suffering.

As it's pointed out, even for non-Christians, even if you're not a Christian, you don't have to be Christian to understand the deeper significance of the cross, which is no different from the Buddha's teachings. Buddha said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. And in the Christian cross, it's there as an image.

The teaching is that suffering is, the cross is the instrument of suffering. Jesus is nailed to the cross, the deepest image of suffering. But the cross is also the symbol for transcendence of suffering.

The cross is also a symbol for the divine. It's both. It's a torture instrument, and it's a symbol for the divine.

That's amazing. The two together. This can be, a teaching can be transmitted in this way, even to people who would never understand it conceptually, as I'm talking about it conceptually.

There's a deep truth embedded in that archetypal image. Jesus is the archetypal human, and the cross is the archetypal journey of every human being. So be thankful for all the suffering that has brought you to this point.

It's brought you here. That's amazing. Awakening.

Does it mean that from now on, life will not be challenging anymore? No. The challenges continue.

But they may be of a somewhat different kind, no longer produced by the dysfunction of the egoic mind, as is often the case with many humans. But still, challenges come in many forms. The difference is, as you become increasingly rooted in the being of yourself, the transcendent self, not the being, the challenges are no longer converted into suffering.

So there's no longer a personality that complains about what's happening to me. The challenges are simply accepted for what they are. Action is taken if action is necessary or possible.

No action is taken. A simple surrender happens when a challenge comes and there isn't really anything you can do. Then that's what is.

And then once you reach this point, every challenge can deepen. If it's a real challenge, it deepens your state of consciousness. It makes you more present.

And that is a wonderful thing when you've reached that point. I have noticed with the so-called pandemic for the last couple of years, some people have become very, very, become less conscious than they were before the pandemic, some. This is the same with any, also the challenge that happens to you individually, anything going wrong in your life, a breakup, loss of a job, loss of home, a desk from one close to you, a court case or whatever threat.

Some people become more unconscious when they're being challenged, but are more reactive, more deeply entrenched in their conditioning, in their ego. Every divorce lawyer meets people at their most unconscious, usually, unless they're already evolving, in which case it's fine. And even realtors and people like that find people that are so, why are people, they get so attached to the outcome, result.

It really pulls them down. A challenge can make you unconscious or more conscious, depending where you are at. And some people through the pandemic have become more present.

They've accepted, they have had perhaps been affected in different ways, financially or jobs or life situation or relationships have been affected by it. All kinds of things have happened. And some people have been able to use that and become more, go more into being.

Sometimes there wasn't that much doing anymore. You had to go more into being. And others have become more reactive and more angry and more fearful.

Fear has been a big thing. More fearful of the fear of, ultimately the fear of death, what could happen to me, the fear of, oh my God, that's ultimately, fear is always ultimately the fear of death, the fear of the greatest loss of myself. And that tends to go away when you are rooted in the being.

It's hard to explain why it goes away and how it goes away, but it does. The fear of death seems to disappear. I have to, I'll just mention, the challenges continue to come.

I've had my entire life, I've had virtually no health challenge until last, late last year, early this year, late last year. And I'd never been in a hospital as an inpatient, hardly ever see a doctor. And suddenly I was hit by a, just a few months ago, a huge challenge, what normally people would consider a huge life challenge to a medical condition.

And immediately comes the possibility, okay, well, I may only be here for another few more months or not, who knows. And after the initial diagnosis, I just went, okay. I became even more emptier than I normally am.

I'm normally fairly empty, but I would just like that. And there wasn't any, no fear. I was basically dead already.

There was no, but there was a presence left. The person didn't matter very much. And then I spent many hours in just complete presence.

And then I was operated on. And then I, they looked at it again. And for the time being, the challenge seems to have dissolved completely.

Will it come back? Who knows? So that's it.

They continue to come, but just the greater the challenge, the greater the intensity of presence. I've often found that in other situations in my life too, and the challenge has come, they go more. So there's no longer a person that reacts to what's happening.

It's just the beingness, just the presence, just the consciousness. That means you become aware of your thoughts. You still have your opinions, but yourself isn't in your opinions, which means you hold them more lightly.

You are not possessed by your opinions because otherwise, humans that have no awareness, they don't have opinions. The opinions have them. They don't even have thoughts.

The thoughts have them. So that's the shift is the person remains, but there's a suddenly a depth to you that was there all the time, but because of the seductive or hypnotic nature of sensory experience, and more importantly, mental experience, you didn't know it was there. You didn't know the dimension of depth.

You had been seduced out of the depth of who you are onto just the surface level of life, thoughts and perceptions, surface. And it becomes a very unsatisfying experience to live on the surface of life only because on the surface of life, nothing is fulfilling for very long. So there's the continuous search.

Getting what you want and not getting what you want is a very strange thing, because I feel that when I walk through life, you don't even know you're getting whatever you want.

away from the mind is to transcend the thinking mind. Transcend doesn't mean it becomes completely abolished, but you discover in yourself a deeper dimension. It's only by discovering that depth in you that you can become free of being the slave to conditioned thinking, the voice in the head that never stops.

So we are here to find or deepen that dimension that is in everyone. One could call it a dimension of consciousness that has been pointed to by ancient teachers for thousands of years, the possibility that there is another dimension in you, not something that you need to bring about, but something you just need to discover because it's already there. It's just being overlooked continuously, very much like the fish may be tempted to overlook the presence of water and spend his whole life looking for it.

And says, I've been told there is this incredible thing that pervades everything and surrounds us and is within us, and I've been looking for it all my life. And it's very much the same with what is sometimes called a spiritual dimension of life. It's already here within you, and yet most people haven't found it.

You're just directing your attention to sense perceptions rather than thinking. So there's a shift from being absorbed in interpreting sense perceptions and just noticing the sense perceptions. I cannot predict what your reaction or response will be to this gathering.

It could be a wonderful beginning of discovery of a deeper state of consciousness, or it could be that you are finding this gathering and this talk incredibly boring or irritating. I can't, what is he talking about? I can't stand it anymore.

And then the mind goes on.

Sorry, sir.

Help is coming. Thank you. So this is all about what we might call the awakening of consciousness.

So just, I'll be coming back to it again and again, this terminology, but just to summarize what that means for those of you who are new to it, is when you discover in yourself the ability to know what's happening in your inner space, either on the level of emotion, on the level of mind, so that you are, you're beginning to find there is an observing presence there. The observing presence can observe whatever happens in your mind, the movement of thought, instead of being totally drawn into it, totally identified, identified with it. That is the awakening, the disidentification from thought plus emotion, the disidentification from thought.

So that's what it's all about. We can approach it from many different angles and directions, but the core of this is always that. So as a little exercise in awareness or presence, let's do this.

I call it do, but it's not really a doing. Becoming aware of sense perceptions, because that is part of your experience of the present moment. Sense perceptions, visual, auditory are the main sense perceptions, but the others may come in too.

So there's the totality of this room. There's a man sitting on a chair. You see him on the chair, you see him on the screen, stage, people.

So you take that in, the voice. You're becoming aware of that. You're giving it attention without any strain or effort.

You're just directing your attention to sense perceptions rather than thinking. So there's a shift from being absorbed in interpreting sense perceptions and just noticing the sense perceptions. Huge shift.

And that's already an enormously wonderful and empowering and important spiritual teaching to become aware of sense perceptions, sensory perceptions, and remove the interpretation of the sensory perceptions. Very fundamental, deep spiritual practice. It may sound a little strange, but to be aware of something, you can either direct your sense perception towards a particular noise that you hear in the background, whatever it may be, a bird singing or the engine noise of cars or whatever, or visually a flower or a tree or the sky or the totality of whatever surrounds you and take in the various sense perceptions and just be with it, be alert.

They build an alert presence for the sense perception like now. There's no need to interpret. So what can you add to it?

You let go of the, sometimes one should say, compulsive need to immediately find some kind of interpretation for it, naming it, the continuous naming. Every moment has to be immediately classified and personalized and named in some way. I'd like it, I don't like it, or this person is not quite right.

And a lot of the naming is of a negative kind. You might notice when you name, there's a difficult person around or you observe an unconscious person behaving in an unconscious way because what else can an unconscious person do? You can't ask them to behave in a conscious way.

So you're looking at an unconscious behavior and say, awful person. And then you let go of that. It's easier with trees and flowers and with people, of course.

With people, it's a more advanced stage, but I'm just pointing it out already because you have ample opportunity in this world, in your life to practice with people, continuously. You may have noticed people are not easy. They're difficult.

And some are quite crazy, but we'll go to that. And there are moments of craziness and relative sanity, and then they got crazy again. That's another story you might remember your ex-husband or wife.

So sense perception, bringing just awareness to sense perception like now. You can do it in your room. You sit in your room alone and look around the room, let go of the mind wanting to say something.

We don't need it. So instead of naming, there's just an awareness behind the sense perception. That's a spiritual practice.

You can do it anywhere. I recommend that you do it whenever you're waiting for something to happen. Even a simple thing like waiting for the elevator to come or while you're riding in the elevator or you're waiting at the traffic light or you're waiting on the phone, you're waiting for your bank to speak to a human being.

Half an hour, an hour. That may be too much for this spiritual practice to start with. So whenever you're waiting, and you might be surprised how many times of your day you're waiting for something.

Now, most of the time, unfortunately, these days, when humans are waiting for something, even at the elevator or in a lineup in the supermarket, whatever it may be, airport, oh, there's a lot of waiting at airports these days. Wherever they are, unfortunately, most humans immediately get hold of this device. Even I have one.

Here it is. They can't wait. They cannot give themselves even half a minute without needing to fill this half a minute with something.

Now, before they invented this, it was a little bit more difficult. You had to fill it with something. You had to think of something or you became restless, waiting, the elevator's still not coming.

It's only been 20 seconds. But now, of course, you have this. You can immediately go because everybody else is doing it, too, so you have to do it, too.

So you pull this out. There's nothing in particular happening, but everybody's doing it, so you do it, too. And you're adding to the clutter of your mind and you're adding to the unawareness of the present moment.

And even worse, it is when you're out, let's say you're out in nature, and then even there, you're on a bench, you're sitting on the beach or somewhere, wherever it may be, going out. Even there, some people cannot let go of this because this is an extension of the thinking mind. The thinking mind was already a huge challenge and a problem for thousands of years, and it grew and grew and grew, and then the thinking mind was so clever that it came up with an extension of itself in the form of this.

And now it's even more challenging because it amplifies the thinking mind. It amplifies and adds to the clutter of your mind. Clutter meaning useless thinking, just going around in circles, ruminating at night even when you can't sleep.

And a lot of the thinking is not pleasant for most people. You don't think for very long about a wonderful sunset that you saw last night or two days ago that was such a wonderful sunset. You can't do a lot of thinking.

The mind needs something else. It needs a difficult person to think about, somebody who was rude to you last week, and you cannot let go of the memory of that and what you should have said to him, but you didn't, but now you can do it in your mind. Or what may happen tomorrow or the next week, you have to think about that now because otherwise it'll all fall apart if I don't think about this now.

And people don't realize that they live with a burden of unconscious thinking. I'm not talking about useful thinking when there's something to apply your mind to. There's a problem that needs to be solved.

And what can we do? What can I do about it? Let's look at this and that and that.

The mind is a very wonderful thing when you're not the slave of your mind. So a lot of that thinking is actually destructive and unpleasant. People don't realize that the burden they carry in their minds, the burden of, for many people, an unhappy story they carry in their minds and they think about it.

And what is that unhappy narrative they carry in their mind? What do they call it? They call it my life.

Oh, my life. So why did it go wrong so many times there? And that shouldn't have happened.

I had imagined it when I was 17 and 18. I imagined something real, very different, but that didn't happen. And then, of course, there are good things too.

It's for many people, it's the narrative of my life is a mixed bag of good and bad. But for many others, my life is very problematic and I cannot stop thinking about it. And the story, I have to tell myself, the story of me and my life.

And anybody who wants to listen, I'll tell them the story too, of me and my life. Are you ready to listen to my life? Okay, and then I'll tell you mine, okay.

That is the narrative in your mind that you confuse with who you are, which is all your memories, accumulated memories, not necessarily objectively true, some maybe, but many of the memories are colored by faulty interpretations of what people did or said or did. You can verify this. If you have siblings and you're grown up and then you talk about events that happened in your childhood, when we were six years old, you talk to your brother or your sister, do you remember this event when I was six and you were eight or you were seven?

Do you remember what happened? And then your sibling says, no, that's not what happened. So this is what happened, completely different.

But each one thinks that's exactly how it is. And in some cases it may well be, but whatever it is, it's a memory in your mind. You replayed an old movie, it replays itself.

And often involving people, but if somebody did to you, undoubtedly, they did do that to you and they shouldn't have done it. This is very true. Many people have had relatively unconscious parents.

They did their best, but nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness. I realized that it was a wonderful liberation when I realized, I was ready later in my life, I realized that my parents could not have acted differently because they would have been beyond their level of consciousness at that particular time. I would like to explore with you this afternoon the deepest truth of human existence.

When I say that, that may sound a little bit abstract, interesting, but abstract human existence. And it may sound a little bit philosophical, but this is not a lecture on philosophy, nor is it a lecture at all. The best way to look upon it is as a meditation.

Although somebody is speaking, look upon it as a meditation. So when I say the deepest truth of human existence, it sounds a little bit removed from your everyday concerns. So let's put it in another way.

We are here to explore the deepest truth of who you are. Because you are human existence. We are here to explore the deepest truth within yourself, knowing yourself at the deepest level.

A level so deep that knowing yourself and knowing God become one and the same. There are two levels to this talk, if it can be called that. One is the words, and one is the gaps between the words, a certain stillness.

I just point this out because it is helpful as you listen to be aware not only of the words, but of an underlying field of stillness out of which the words come, nothing personal. There's a field of stillness that is both within and without, gaps between the words, a silent space in between and underlying the words. And simply to be aware also of that dimension.

Then listening to these words is more than absorbing information because there isn't that much information here. It's not an information-based talk. Then it becomes a meditation to just sit here and listen.

And the deeper teaching, if it can even be called teaching, is not in and through the words. The deeper teaching lies in the dimension of stillness because the moment you acknowledge that underlying dimension, you have accessed a realm within yourself that is deeper than the stream of mind with which most people are identified as themselves. Simply as we sit here to acknowledge, to notice, to listen to an underlying stillness, that which acknowledges that in you, that which is able to listen to that dimension, listen not to something, listen to nothing, to nothing, just the act of listening, that in you which is able to acknowledge that dimension, to be attentive to that dimension is a realm of stillness underneath the stream of mental noise.

In other words, the moment you pay attention to that dimension of silence, there is a stillness in you because through thought, you cannot pay attention to silence because thought is noise. So already, although through words, we are going to progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence, even as you sit here and follow the words that progressively explore the deepest truth of human existence, that deepest truth of human existence is already emerging in you as you sit here and listen, even now, simply by paying attention to silence through the inner stillness. That is the only way you can notice.

The stillness in you notices that. And you have gone beyond the continuous stream of mental noise that for most people is who they think they are. Everybody, every human being in life form is an expression of that one formless and timeless one life.

And that is beyond anything that could be destroyed. It's life itself. It has no opposite.

The one life has not, death is not the opposite of life. Death is the opposite of birth. And birth and death apply to the forms that appear on the surface of the sphere.

So when death happens to life forms, even violent death, yes, it is from the perspective of the surface reality is dreadful, but from the perspective of knowing the transcendent dimension, even that is no longer dreadful. It is transcended because the realization is there. The life that you are and the life that I am can never be destroyed.

The essence of every life form is eternal. It derives from the one. It's an expression of the one.

To know that, not just as a belief, but deep within yourself to know that which cannot be destroyed, what the Buddhists call amara, the deathless, this is the closest perhaps that the Buddhists come to talking about God, the deathless dimension, timeless, deathless, that which cannot be destroyed, every human and every life form is a temporary expression of that. When you know that within yourself, you look with deep compassion upon the madness that happens on the surface reality, perpetrated by humans who don't know who they are. And because they don't know who they are, they don't know what they are doing to themselves, ultimately, because every other is yourself.

Thank you for being my spiritual teacher.

[Speaker 2] (8:50:09 - 8:50:32)
You've really helped me a lot. You say in the power of now that you are here to enable the divine purpose of the universe to unfold. Could you please explain what the divine purpose of the universe is?

No. No. No.

[Speaker 1] (8:50:36 - 9:50:00)
No. No. No.

Coming into this dimension is the divine purpose, but the divine purpose is twofold. One is the universe delights in creation. It delights in creativity.

It delights in creating new forms. How do I know that? Well, just look around on the planet here, the millions of life forms in the sea, on land, in the air.

The universe delights in creating this multiplicity of forms and it delights in experiencing itself through all those forms, because you are not a separate entity. It's not the case as sometimes the ego, ego itself believes here's me, and there's the rest of the world or the universe, or the ego thinks that it is in the universe. It somehow suddenly appeared, fallen into this universe, and then where am I?

On this, I'm in this universe. You're not in the universe. You are the universe.

The one life expressing itself through countless life forms. And there's a growing complexity in life forms. And with every experience, the universe is experiencing itself.

Your life is extremely differentiated in human beings. The way in which life or the universe or the one consciousness experiences itself in this dreamlike world is extremely differentiated. It is amazing.

Every human being is different of those billions of humans on the planet. Every human not only looks different, you could recognize if you know one person out of these billions, I can't remember how many billions are on the planet now, you could recognize this person out of billions of other human beings just by looking at their face. This is how differentiated it is on the surface level already.

And then every life experience, of course, there are many similarities, but there's a uniqueness to every life experience. Every life experience is a world that arises and subsides. My mother's life, your mother's life, your parents' life, anybody's life, was a particular world.

The way she experienced the world was very different from the way I experienced it. It's like my mother and I, and I'm just taking one example from my personal experience, seemed to inhabit completely different universes. But we were in the same place.

But experiencing life in a totally, totally different way. And the universe delights in that complexity of experience, so it wants to experience itself as form. It means, and so the forms become evolving more, more complex.

The humans that are alive now have far greater complexity than the humans that were alive 10,000 years ago, or 50,000 years ago. Life at that time was more simple. Gather the food, gather the plants, or hunt an animal if they did that.

Prepare the meal, go out hunting, come back home. It's fairly simple. There wasn't the complexity of New York City, LA, freeways, and all that's behind that.

There were nuclear physics, whatever, and so on. And so the universe delights in that, and you are an expression of that. It wants to become conscious of itself through you.

And it's doing that, attempting to do that through humans, but that one consciousness is not separate from you. You are an expression of it. But the universe also wants to know itself deeply, its own source.

It wants the source realization also. So I know that because I know it by looking within myself. There is an outgoing movement into creation, and there's a return movement that wants to realize itself in its essence.

The universe wants both. It wants to go out and create. It also wants to realize its own essence through you.

In a human life that expresses as wanting to do things in this life, wanting to contribute to this life, wanting to create something, to make something of your life, your so-called life, it expresses as that. And the other, the return movement, so you have the outward movement of the universe. The return movement expresses as coming totally into the present moment, stepping away from becoming into being.

Becoming is the outward movement. What can I do now? I need to do something.

I want to create this. I feel that this wants to, there's something coming through me. I feel a piece of music wants to come through me.

A book wants to be written or something, whatever, I want to do this or create this, set up this business or that or whatever. And then it's this becoming, doing, but then there's another movement that says, I just want to be and be still. And this present moment, go deeply into this moment.

I don't need to become anything at all. I just want to be fully who I am already and go deeply into being. So you have, it's almost this contradictory movements.

In some humans, the outward tendency is greater. In others, the inward tendency is greater. Both are necessary and somehow both need to be there as long as you're here in a human form, both to some extent will be in you, but there will be different to different degrees.

Some are much more going within and to being, to the source. But I would suggest that it's not either or. There are certain spiritual additions that look upon it as more as either or.

They say, forget about the world, just realize who you are, and then you can just sit in a corner for the rest of your life and never do anything again you don't need to. That's one way. But for us, it's finding a certain balance, which doesn't mean it needs to be totally in balance.

A very few humans who are totally balanced between the outward movement of creating and the inward movement of connecting with your inner being and the source of all life, you need to have both. So that the universe can create through you without losing itself in its creations. So you can create not from a place of egoic need where you depend on the outcome.

If I don't get that, I'll kill myself. If I don't achieve, if I don't get famous and rich, I don't know what I'll do. Not that, but a playful participation in the world of form and contributing to it, to the world of form without losing itself in the creation and in the doing.

If you become stressed, means you're losing yourself in the doing. This is more important than you completely forget, you become uprooted. You're no longer connected to the spaciousness, the unconditioned, the one within.

So to be and do at the same time. But some humans, yes, are much more drawn to being. I call them frequency holders.

They hold the frequency of being on the planet. They're not interested in creating huge things out there. They're interested in doing perhaps little things, gardening, cooking, looking after animals, being with animals, helping humans in some capacity, helping even physical, helping humans with their bodies and so on.

So they are frequency holders. They are more into being than there's some doing, but you cannot, you always have to do something. You can't, but they don't put the emphasis on doing, the emphasis on being, and then they allow presence to flow into what they do.

And they affect the world also very significantly. Others have a greater tendency to performing creative action. They need to go out there and become active, but their challenge is not to get lost in what they do and thinking that's all important.

They forget that this is a play of form. And then there comes a seriousness and a heaviness into the doing, and they get unhappy. And when you are unhappy, whatever you create has some flavor of that unhappiness.

So the divine purpose of the universe, to summarize my long explanation, is to know itself both through the creation of form and through realization of the formless essence of all life. And that is the divine purpose of the universe and that you are here as part of that. That's it.

Thank you. But even if it is a dream, there must be something that is more real than the dream, without which the dream could not be taking place, could not be. Here we focus on being because most humans are suffering from the dreadful affliction, which we may call forgetfulness of being.

And because there's forgetfulness of being, they are lost in doing. They lose themselves in their doing. Or if they're not doing anything, maybe they're hanging around at street corners, then they are lost in semi-consciousness.

They'll have moving below thinking, or they're trapped in very dysfunctional mind patterns. And even the thinking we could even categorize as that's also a kind of doing, that doing is not just activities that you're engaged in in daily life, but underlying this external doing, there's the doing of thinking. The thinking is happening and that belongs to the realm of doing.

Although, in most cases, it's not you who does the thinking. You are not doing it, it is a doing, but really thinking is something that happens to most people. It's not something they do voluntarily as a choice.

So your thinking happens to you, one could say. So I sometimes say you don't think, you are being thought, you're being created by the involuntary and compulsive movement of thought that is conditioned by the past. And this involuntary compulsive movement creates a mind-made kind of entity, a sense of self, and this entity is the ego.

And for most people, that's who they perceive themselves to be. And so you live with this entity, you are, there's a good analogy one could use, and that is that you, as the deeper consciousness, are asleep and you're dreaming the dream of your life. Occasionally, you might wake up briefly and then you fall back into the dream state, which is the, whatever drama is happening in your life, whatever situations are happening in your life.

So there's a personality or a person that's a dream-like entity. From the point of view of the awakened consciousness, you can clearly see that when you retrospectively, perhaps, as you awaken, you look back on your life and you can see how many unconscious things happened that you were involved in, that you participate in, and so on, and there was a whole drama unfolding, sometimes not so bad, and at other times, really dreadful, and a kind of nightmare in some cases.

And so if you go back in all traditions, whether you go to Western philosophy or Eastern spiritual traditions, there's often the comparison of unawakened existence with a dream state. Many Western philosophers also have questioned it. Is life a dream?

A famous play by Spanish playwright, Calderón de la Barca is La Vida is when your life is a dream. It's an ancient play. So the extent to which you are still identified with you as a person, you may still be trapped in the dream.

It is possible that as you sit here or wherever you sit or stand or lie, the awakened being is emerging, has emerged partially or maybe fully. And so there's a, you might be a hybrid between the dream, the dreamt entity and the one who is doing the dream, which is the consciousness. You've probably heard of lucid dreaming, which means this is actual dreaming when you're asleep and you dream.

It can sometimes happen you're in the middle of a dream, you suddenly realize that you're dreaming. It's a very interesting point. Oh, it's all a dream.

And then you might think, okay, I could do anything now. Let's, what can I create in this dream? In most cases, this doesn't last very long because the awakened, the wake, the state, the state of wakefulness in conventional terms is not really compatible with dreams.

So it's very brief. If you become aware in the dream, it's most likely that very quickly you'll wake up out of the dream, then it's gone. And then you wake up into normal wakefulness, which is another, spiritually speaking, another kind of dream.

Now, let's assume that this, right now, this room here, a man speaking, you sitting there with your history, with your person, conditions created by your history. And we could perhaps assume, could this be a dream? Could you be dreaming this?

Were you, in the middle of the dream, you're dreaming of a man who says, you may be dreaming. Oh. And let's assume for a moment that that is the case, that you're actually dreaming this very place, that situation, everything is part of your dream.

And we don't know, it could be the case. It depends how you look at it. From certain perspective, it is.

From another perspective, it's not. Let's assume that it is for a moment. But even if it is a dream, there must be something that is more real than the dream, without which the dream could not be taking place, could not be.

And this prerequisite is, of course, there must be a consciousness in which the dream happens. So it becomes of secondary importance whether you're dreaming this moment or not. Even if you are dreaming this moment, there must be an essence within that dream that is real.

And that essence is the light of consciousness in which the dream images appear. And that light of consciousness is creating the dream. But the moment you realize that light of consciousness within you, that's the same thing as awakening within the conventional dream, the normal kind of dream which I just talked about right here now.

Now, let's assume this is a dream, a dream-like thing. In many ways, it is, because dreams evaporate very quickly. They come, and then something else happens.

After this retreat, you might wake up the morning after and say, did I just dream of this retreat? Or did it actually happen? So let's assume it is.

And suddenly you become aware of something within this dream, if that's what it is, of something beyond, something that transcends the dream, is not separate from it, but without which the dream could not exist. And that is the sense of beingness or presence of I am, of consciousness, the realization that you are conscious, or rather, language is very deceptive. Mistakes can easily creep in the moment you verbalize something.

When I say you are conscious, it's not quite right. You are consciousness. The essence of who you are is consciousness.

If I say you are conscious, and there's two of you, the you and the consciousness. So in the dream, if you suddenly realize that which is beyond the dream by becoming aware, not becoming aware of something that arises, because everything that arises would be part of the dream, not becoming aware of any new form that arises as a thought or a sensory perception or an emotion, but becoming aware of awareness, which is not something. It's not, you can't say, there it is, I got the awareness, there it is.

Or no, it's over there. I just had it, but it's gone now. So awareness or consciousness cannot become an object of consciousness.

Everything else is an object that arises in consciousness. But if you attempt to make consciousness into an object, then you're lost again. You cannot make consciousness into an object because consciousness is the very thing.

If you're looking for, let's say you're looking for yourself beyond the person, where's the real me, where's the real, I want the being behind the person that I'm looking for it. If you're looking for it, waiting for an experience in which this thing happens, that would be very misleading because you would be waiting for some experience, fireworks, spiritual fireworks. Tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk, tsk.

The ultimate vision, as you see in some ancient paintings of Christian mystics, and they go. And you can't have that for that long. I mean, the vision is there.

How long is it going to last? So if you're looking for yourself in the realm of experience or in the realm of manifestation, phenomena, object of consciousness, you can't find it there because the very thing or no thing that's looking for yourself is you. It's like a flashlight.

You use a flashlight to find the flashlight. I'm looking for the flashlight. Becoming aware, right?

For example, now, becoming aware that you are conscious right now. That's a strange thing. There's no content to that.

There's simply a presence. And for that to happen, and I'm finally getting to it, that is, there needs to be the cessation of thought. And so this is my invitation to you.

You do not need to think continuously in your daily life. It's if your mind tells you that if you do not think and do not worry, then your life is going to collapse. That is not true.

It's a lie. But your mind might either explicitly or implicitly say that I need to really think about my life. Thinking has its place.

It's a wonderful tool. It can be used for manifesting. It can be used for creating.

It's a tool, but if it takes you over, if you're identified with a tool, then it comes to possess you, and that's a terrible limitation. So the new state of consciousness is a mixture of thought and spaciousness so that you can go about your daily life, walking from point A to point B in that state of simple aware presence. Let's do it now.

I'm calling it do, but it's not doing involved. Simply become aware of yourself as you sit here, just as I am aware of myself as a conscious presence. This is a very strange thing.

It's not, you can't say, oh, you cannot become an object to yourself in this. Everything else is an object that arises in your consciousness, an object of consciousness. But knowing yourself, you cannot be an object in your own consciousness.

So you cannot know yourself in a subject-object relationship at the deepest level. You can only know yourself as the eternal subject. There is a space of stillness in that moment of knowing yourself as the essence identity.

There is an alive sense of stillness and presence. Like, let's separate. Let's just say my two hands, this is thought, you're thinking, and then you go, and here's a space of no thought, just awareness.

You can't define what that is. You can't think about it. You can only be it.

Stillness is one word we could use to point to it. Stillness has nothing to do whether there's noise outside or not. It's inner stillness, is the cessation of thinking without loss of consciousness.

And that is realizing yourself as the unconditioned consciousness, because everything else is conditioned by the past, but that is the unconditioned in you. That is your essence identity. You cannot, by exercising willpower, that is not the way to go to stop yourself from thinking.

I'm not even saying stop thinking as an active practice, but simply become so alert that thinking stops by itself. One way you can do it is by becoming aware of sense perceptions, acutely aware of sense perceptions. I give the example in the power of now of a cat watching the mouse hole, and the cat watching the mouse hole is in that state of absolute attention.

And the cat goes, no, you don't have to stare like that, but that is the state of, that is this state of awareness, consciousness. That's the only thing in your life that you cannot question, that the only thing that is absolutely and undoubtedly real. Everything else you can question, for example, whether our gathering here is a dream or not, you don't really know.

It could be that you are dreaming, that you're sitting here and there's a man talking on a chair, suggesting to you that you might be dreaming. You cannot, as many philosophers have pointed out, you cannot know for sure that this life that you're experiencing is not a kind of dream. And from one perspective, it is a kind of dream.

Look at, I like to sometimes look at old photographs made, taken in 1900, early days of photography, 1920, whenever, of street scenes or gatherings. And you look, you can go to secondhand shops and they sell sometimes old photographs. You can buy one for a penny or two.

You have no idea who these people are, nor has anybody else an idea who these people are, but they are running around the city street excited about this or that. And then there's another gathering, see people sitting around a table, eating and laughing in this old photo. And where is that now?

It has evaporated like a dream. Nobody even remembers who they are. And that is the same with anything that you experience here.

It quickly evaporates. So there is a dream-like quality to human existence, any existence. So you could say, okay, maybe it's all a dream.

That may well be, but one thing you cannot doubt that is that you are conscious. Because if you're not conscious, there couldn't be a dream. A dream can only arise in the light of consciousness.

So the one thing, whether or not this is a dream or not, it becomes irrelevant. The only thing that matters, if it is a dream, is whether you can realize what the essence of the dream is, consciousness. And you can only realize that directly here and now as this.

Oh, Descartes, of course, the French philosopher, said, I think, therefore I am. If he had waited a little bit longer before saying anything, he could have come to the point of cessation of thinking, and then he could have made the more profound statement, I am conscious, therefore I am. Thinking is only an expression of consciousness, a surface expression of consciousness.

So this realization of, we could call inner stillness, of spaciousness, of presence, of, well, there's a term that's very popular these days, and that's a good thing. It's called mindfulness, which I use almost never, except when I explain why I don't use it. I don't use it because it seems to imply that your mind is full, but it's not what mindfulness is.

It really should be called mind emptiness. The entire practice of, for example, people find certain esoteric spiritual practices very strange and hard to understand. Zen is one of those.

So what does it all mean? What's Zen all about? Cessation of thinking without loss of consciousness.

That's what the Zen masters are trying to show you, non-conceptually, as the Zen master became famous, because when he was asked, please explain the meaning of Zen, all he would do is raise his finger and look at you. Is that it? Yeah.

And I was in the, I've been in the monastery for 15 years for that. Yes. Sometimes it takes a long time before realizing that it doesn't take time to know who you are.

That's a paradox. So I'm not saying don't go to a Zen monastery. Perhaps you have to.

It may take time to realize that it does not take time, but it doesn't have to take time. It's here and now. I'm saying this to especially the spiritual seekers among you who have made it your life purpose to seek whatever it is, the ultimate spiritual experience or transformation.

And the very seeking has become without you knowing it, the greatest obstacle to spiritual realization. Because by being in the seeking mode for some spiritual realization or awakening, you're in the same, basically the same state of consciousness that everybody else is in, except they are seeking through material possessions, achievement, relationships, this or that. They're seeking there.

What's the next thing that I can? It's a mind structure, the seeking mode. And spiritual seekers adopt that.

They see themselves as more spiritual than the one who is seeking after the latest model of that particular car or seeking a life partner who enhances their sense of self, the trophy husband, the trophy wife, the beautiful arm hang. And seeking and never being satisfied because if you're in the seeking mode, you never reach the satisfaction, you get stuck in the seeking mode. So to the spiritual seekers, I would suggest that you stop seeking and come into this present moment and find out whether it is possible for you to stop thinking.

You won't surrender, which means, surrender means only accept this moment as it is. But you won't be able to surrender unless you're completely fed up with suffering. You've had enough suffering.

And at some level, you recognize that most of your suffering is self-created. It is created out of resistance to what is. It is created out of an interpretation of something that is.

It comes from a thought, from an interpretation, not from the situation. So you realize really that I've had enough suffering and only when you've truly had enough suffering in your life, are you able to say, I don't need it anymore. Suffering is a wonderful teacher.

Suffering is most people's only spiritual teacher. And suffering deepens you. It gradually erodes the mind-made sense of self, the ego.

And for some people, the point arrives where they realize I have suffered enough. And that, for example, is the case with almost all the people who come to a retreat. If you ask them, they've all had their share of human suffering, otherwise they wouldn't be open to the message.

They've had their share of human suffering and they have reached a point where they are ready to listen to the message that says there is another way to live. There is another way in which you can live that does not create further suffering. For yourself.

Because to a large extent, humans create their own suffering. And so, when you are ready to hear that message, and that's really the message that is in every religion. That's the message, the central message of Buddhism is the end of suffering.

And even the central message of the teaching of Jesus is finding the pearl of great price, finding the kingdom of heaven that is within you here and now, as Jesus says. And that, of course, is the end of living in a state of suffering. So, one could say that you need suffering for you to realize, for you to come to a point of realization that you do not need to suffer anymore.

There's a paradox here. If I had not suffered, I would not, this teaching would not exist. So you could say it has come partly as a result of intense suffering.

Because as a human being, I would not have evolved spiritually if I had not suffered. So suffering was my main teacher. And suffering is for many people their main teacher.

But then, some people are, when they are ready, they come into contact with a spiritual teaching or teacher, and that can speed up the process of realization that you don't need to suffer anymore. You're ready to hear that. So that was, the Buddha talked about nothing else already 2,600 years ago, that there can be an end to self-inflicted suffering.

And when you don't inflict suffering on yourself anymore, and remember, it's the thoughts, your thoughts make you suffer more than anything else. It's not usually the situation, it's your interpretation of the situation, of how dreadful it all is. And so when you see that, then you see there is another way to live in which I no longer mentally argue with what is.

And that's the end of self-inflicted suffering. And if I no longer inflict suffering on myself, I no longer inflict suffering on others because the two go together. Once you know that also, it's the end of fear, because there nothing can be destroyed.

So it's wonderful, that's your practice. It doesn't matter where you practice, wherever you are in your life, you practice. Every situation, every moment is the two dimensions and that's the end of fear comes with that.

Fear being a normal human condition for most people, sometimes buried under something else. Fear and its many manifestations, nervousness, tension, anxiety, anger really comes out of fear. Stress really is a form of fear.

All many forms of fear, quite normal. Why? That's all you know, that's fear.

You don't know that. Once you know that also, it's the end of fear because there nothing can be destroyed. That's why they cause in miracle starts, which is all you need to know, the prologue, the first before it all starts, it says this course can be summarized in the following words.

Nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists, herein lies the peace of God. Nothing real can be threatened and that is here because nothing unreal ultimately exists in the world of form. The form is ultimately not real in itself.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein, which means knowing that, lies the peace of God. God, of course, is the formless, timeless, eternal, unmanifested, that is both within and beyond the world.

But some of you, as I mentioned earlier, are able to step out of their mind and you can practice that through a conscious choice. Be present. Nothing to think about right now, just be present.

You don't carry your history with you when you're present. Your life situation, I use that word in power of now, very important, your life situation, everybody has one. Past, future, relationships, job, health, finances, where you live, what happens to you, and all your life situation.

You have a life, you're here with, you have a life situation, of course you do, but you also have, it's not that you have a life, you are life itself. And when your life situation is all you know about yourself, which is another way of putting, that's all you know, then you miss life. Now, you're very good at dealing with your life situation, but you miss life.

You do all the right things, but it never really gets you anywhere because you miss life. Life is now, and life is not in the doing. Life is in the being, now.

Step out of thinking, into alert stillness, if you can. And also, another way is not to completely believe in every thought that comes into your head. Realize it's a thought, it's a position, it's a judgment, not completely identified with it.

It's a story that you are telling yourself. It's amazing how many stories people tell themselves in their head. Many are completely distorted.

It's not the reality, it's the stories, how you see the reality. The reality usually is much more simple and more benign than the story. One of the early lessons in A Course in Miracles says you're supposed to look at things around you in the room and say, nothing that I see in this room means anything.

This table doesn't mean anything. This glass doesn't mean anything. This hand doesn't mean anything.

This floor doesn't mean anything. Now, what does that lesson mean? It doesn't mean anything.

What it means is it's attempting to erase the continuous conceptualization of reality, like scribblings on a blackboard, because whatever you think it means is a concept in your mind. And if you deny the continuous and compulsive conceptualization of reality, it's like erasing the conditioning of your mind. And coming to the place where the Dalai Lama is, you just don't know.

So this lesson in A Course in Miracles, all it's teaching is to come to the place of spacious emptiness, alertness, no longer trapped in conceptual thinking. Doesn't mean anything. And of course, that's another, you're moving into a different dimension by living in this way.

It's just you inhabit, suddenly life opens up. And all the narrowness that the mind had imposed on it dissolves and life becomes spacious because you found the space within. There's suddenly a spaciousness to life, not a threatening place anymore.

What's life going to do? Where's my next threat coming from? And again, the same thing, for example, there's an entire spiritual teaching based on denying the reality of your story.

And Byron Katie's teachings is based on the simple fact of denying your story. How do I know, do I really know that this is true? No, I can't really know that.

So it takes you to the same place where the Dalai Lama is, don't know. So it's a wonderful thing, you can enter that not knowing and then, but it's only not knowing from the viewpoint of the conceptual mind. You're actually connected with a deeper intelligence, unconditioned.

And if you really need to know something, it comes. But it comes out of the spaciousness of not knowing. Well, it's a little bit like jumping off a cliff and then seeing if you can fly.

To the ego, it's a little bit like that. The ego says, don't go there. Because the ego has worked it all out.

It explains the whole, it has its philosophy of life. It might be very defective, limiting philosophy, but it has some kind of philosophy of life. Every person has their story through which they interpret reality.

And usually, it's not a pleasant work of fiction. But at least you think you know. It gives you some illusory foothold.

And of course, the ego thinks, if I let go of that, I won't know anything anymore. Which in a way is true, but not completely true. In a deeper sense, it's you only let go of a distortion of reality created by the conditioned mind, which is part of the collective human mind in its present state of evolution.

And so the collective mind of which your mind is part has created this human-made world, which is full of problems, and they seem to be, they pop out one after another. When you think one thing is better now, suddenly, oh, God. Now it's the economy, and then it's that, and then it's that.

Another war. And see what happens when you pay attention to the way in which you interact with objects and what is, okay, every minute of the day, you pick something up, you put something down, you unbutton your shirt.[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 1:01:20)
You take off your shoes, you lift this, put this there, open your zipper back. You look inside, take something out. Can you feel it as you take it out?

Can you feel the texture of that? And then you put it on the table. It makes a sound as you put it on the table.

And then you have a glass of water and the light is reflected in it and it moves. Perhaps you drink and it tastes and you put it down again. And then you look at a familiar object and instead of using it always as a means to an end, here you have the luxury of occasionally just taking an ordinary object that you handle every day and just for a few seconds give it attention and acknowledge its being just as that object.

Just feel it, see it, as it makes a noise as you put it down. And again you bring in sense perceptions. Getting dressed in the morning, putting pants on, they make a noise as you put them on a little bit.

Listen. Do things. You pick up the toothpaste, you hold it for a moment, open, put the cap on the sink, click, and then turn on the tap.

And then while you brush your teeth you turn off the tap because you don't want to waste water. But that's not part of the exercise, that's the natural thing. And you can actually begin to like and to enjoy the tiniest things around you that would normally be completely overlooked.

So the way in which you interact with the world of objects and that brings a richness into your life that doesn't depend on how many objects you own. You don't need to own them to interact with them. And so here you acknowledge their beingness and you sometimes you might just put your hand as I'm doing now, here's a table, it's wood, and I'm putting my hand on it and for a moment I feel the smooth texture surface of this table.

And it feels very pleasant. But I don't need the mind to tell me that. I can sense that.

And the strange thing is even so-called inanimate objects in a strange way have a life of their own. Forgiveness is something we need to be very careful with because it's often used in a superficial sense. People say you need to forgive yourself for something you did and they say you need to forgive somebody else for what they did.

And then sometimes people say I forgive you but how deep does it go? Perhaps they have an image of themselves as quite spiritual and then that what they say corresponds they want to simply to reinforce the image they have of themselves as a spiritual person who does not harbor resentment. I'm too spiritual for resentment.

I forgive you, you're fine. But deep down there's still many negative emotions when you have a strong self-image of a particular kind for example spiritual or religious. You have that this is who I am and then it can easily happen that you deny certain things that contradict your belief in who you are.

They're the exact opposite of your belief of being a spiritual or religious person.

So if there are many cases that happened over many centuries to many religious people, impossible to recognize the negative emotions within themselves because they would have conflicted with their self-image. And if you then repress them they get even worse and then they come out in bursts of extreme anger or even violence.

And then the mind, even that is justified then by the egoic mind. So the unconscious parent who beats their child in a rage but who thinks of themselves as spiritual say I'm doing it for your own good. So they reinterpret what they are doing which is bad.

They reinterpret it so that it fits in with their self-image as a good person. So you lie to yourself continuously. Crazy.

So all these things happen when because there's lack of awareness and there's a you're looking for an identity and you're grasping some wherever you can find your identity in the past. You're grasping at some things, certain memories, images. So you haven't found your deeper identity which is the indwelling consciousness itself.

And then you need some substitute identity. So these are all cases where people have substitute identities. They have conceptual identities of who they are and basically you live in a kind of in your own matrix conditioned my egoic mind.

And you cannot see reality. You can't see what you are doing. Jesus said the famous words on the cross, forgive them for they know not what they do.

What he means of course maybe if it had been in recent times he would have expressed it slightly differently, would have said forgive them for they are totally unconscious. Now the forgiving, the real forgiving happens when you recognize that there is a dimension in you that has not been affected by whatever happened to you, whatever anybody did to you. There's a dimension in you which is why we're here to access that more deeply.

And again whether we call that this the stillness, the consciousness itself, the unconditioned consciousness or if you are religious Christ consciousness, the Christ within the inner Christ, the inner Buddha, Buddha nature, whatever you want to call it. There is something that actually cannot be touched by anything that happens to you as a person. As a person you can suffer a lot in this world and some people suffer more than others but everybody suffers.

As a person you suffer. As a human you suffer. The being beyond the human, because as you know you're a human being, the being beyond the human is actually not touched by suffering.

So you have to find that, that timeless essence that is within you, that is the inner aspect of what we call the world soul, which also the world soul also is beyond suffering. Among the many questions I found this one. I'll answer that first.

That was the answer. On the surface of things the retreat comes to an end but in the same way that the Buddha image really represents the state of consciousness, so the the real retreat underneath the surface of surface appearances is a state of consciousness. That's the essence of the retreat, deepening presence.

It is that state of consciousness that's the retreat. In that sense you could be on a permanent retreat after this and in that sense the retreat doesn't leave you and you don't leave it. Although the scenery around you is going to change.

Some of you are leaving today, others are leaving in a day or two, one or two days time. So soon the scenery is going to change and there's a continuous flux of things as described by Heraclitus or Heraclitus, one of the first philosophers of ancient Greece, pre-Socratic, so he taught before Socrates taught, and he's famous of course for the saying everything flows and also for the saying you cannot step into the same river twice. He emphasized, he lived about the same time as the Buddha, but of course in Greece, he emphasized the impermanence just as the Buddha did.

It must have been in the consciousness, there was an awakening at that time. So this retreat on the surface is impermanent of course, everything is, but soon after Heraclitus or Heraclitus, another philosopher came whose name was Parmenides, also a pre-Socratic, and he said to Heraclitus, I'm not sure, nobody knows if they actually ever met or he just read, he said you got it all wrong, nothing real ever changes. At the heart of the universe there's a timeless essence, this is a very free translation.

So he said impermanence is ultimately a kind of illusion from his perspective and he said reality remains constant and timeless, the rest is just fleeting forms like dreams. Of course both are correct, Heraclitus and Parmenides, so there is at the heart of you and at the heart of the universe, which is the same thing, there's a timeless essence. So there's the temporal you, the person, and we saw that when we watched these movie clips of the city scene in Berlin 1900, the temporal selves moving about the surface of things and then disappearing.

And so there's the temporal you, the person, and then there is the transcendent you, which is connected to the transcendent dimension of the universe. In some teachings it might be called the higher self, that's the consciousness, the conscious being that you are, because as you go within you don't immediately dissolve into God, there's the non-physical being, the higher self, but they're not divided and then there's the transcendent dimension. I don't normally use the term higher self because it makes you look upward, to look for you, you're looking for yourself.

I'm getting a message from my higher self, it's coming through. A better expression might be the deeper self, deepening presence, and if you can sense as you move away from here this unchanging presence in you, then you can enjoy the short-lived nature of all things. You don't need to attach yourself to anything in particular, you can appreciate everything, you can honor everything, see the beauty and aliveness in everything, without needing to attach yourself to anything.

Attached means in some way it is linked to your sense of self, then that creates the attachment. You can create things, enjoy the act of creation, without attaching yourself either to the outcome or mentally projecting yourself forward to the outcome, or when you finally achieve the goal, attaching yourself to the goal and claim credit, feel, I did that, look at me. Why sometimes you people go, yeah, yeah, a little bit of ego in there.

If there's no ego you create and then you step back. So this non-attachment is something that comes with being present. As a natural result of being present, you become less attached to outcomes, to achievements, to things, even to people.

Although you can love, you love, there's a loving, an outflow of loving kindness, but not the clinging attachment. I love you, don't you ever leave me, because you know it's going to happen then. As I mentioned in a book, the Spanish for to love, te quiero, literally means I want you.

It's the same word, and that's the normal word for I love you, so that's a very honest way of saying it, because most love comes from the ego. It might have other elements mixed in with it, but most of that kind of love is egoic and can easily turn into its opposite. So it's not real love, if it can turn into its opposite suddenly.

I want you. In English it would sound strange. There's a poetic way in Spanish to say I love you, but not many people use it.

Te amo. It's like a poem, and it's beautiful. I want you.

I really want you. You want me? As strongly as I want you?

And so when wanting is thwarted, and things happen, then anger arises. Even hatred can arise quickly. So that's attachment.

So many teachings, spiritual teachings, speak of the importance of non-attachment, but it's not really possible to practice non-attachment in the absence of sensing the presence. You cannot sense the transcendent dimension of who you are, and you cannot sense yourself as the presence. You may do your best to practice non-attachment, but it's almost impossible.

And then you will end up getting attached to your practice of non-attachment, and feel unhappy because you don't quite manage it. In the same way, loving your neighbor as yourself, your neighbor being anybody you happen to be with, not your next-door neighbor, that's not... people have tried to practice that because they were taught to do that, but it's been a struggle, and most people have failed, unless presence arose within.

They connected with that transcendent dimension within, stillness, awareness, and then there was a natural outflow of loving-kindness, and that's loving your neighbor as yourself, because as you look at another and listen to another, you can sense that what you share, what is one, your oneness is consciousness. The essence of the other also is consciousness. It's the same consciousness that you are, and that is seeing your neighbor as yourself, and seeing your neighbor as yourself is valuing and appreciating him or her as yourself, and that is loving your neighbor as yourself.

And since the teachings of Jesus have come to us as fragments, there was nobody there who was taking things down in shorthand when he was talking, and there were no recorders, so we had to rely on people's memories and defective understandings also. So I'm sure that Jesus didn't quite say, you must love your neighbor as yourself, because he would have known that that's impossible, unless you find the kingdom of heaven that is within you. He always talked about that, and then he said, and when you find that dimension within you, that realm, that kingdom, that dimension of heaven, heaven is the sky, and the sky is vast, spaciousness, it has no form, it's the closest you can get in the physical reality to the formless dimension of consciousness itself, it's the closest thing you can find, the sky, because it's not even a thing, you can never reach the sky, there is no sky, it just seems to be a sky, it's just emptiness, spaciousness, it's the Buddha's emptiness, and it's the kingdom of heaven, so it is the kingdom, it is around the dimension of vast spaciousness, inner spaciousness, the kingdom of heaven, so my translation of kingdom of heaven is the dimension of spaciousness, oh, okay, now I get it, and if you find that within, and are rooted in that, then as a natural byproduct of that realization, you love your neighbor as yourself, because you recognize your neighbor as yourself, and this love your neighbor as yourself has been misunderstood, most people think it's about you have to love him or her as much as you love yourself, so you look in the mirror, I really love myself so much, I'm really in love with myself, I'm so great, I love myself, okay, now I'm going to try and love you too in the same way, I love you in the same way that I love myself, but at least I'm trying, but I still love myself more if I really have to admit that, and so when you're rooted in that dimension, you're not really on the surface of things, you're going somewhere, but really you're not going anywhere, just things change around you. I know you say that whatever you feel the world is withholding from you, in my case true love, you already have, and you just need to let it out, so I know you say that whatever you feel the world is withholding from you, you already have, you already have it, and you just need to let it out, in this person's case it's true love, do you have any more practical tips for doing this?

I wrote about that in the New Earth, because there are many people who go around life saying or thinking that life is depriving them of something, in some cases it may be, yes, as the questioner says, true love, we'll have to see what that means, or recognition, people don't appreciate me, or care, nobody really cares about me, or I'm deprived of, say, wealth, I'm lacking, the world is withholding from me abundance, these are all beliefs that seem to find confirmation in external reality, because the person who has these beliefs says, well, it is a fact that life is withholding abundance from me, because I have very little, or it's a fact that life is withholding love from me, I haven't found anybody, nobody loves me, or it's a fact that life is not giving me any appreciation, nobody appreciates me, and so on, so many people feel then it's something that's being withheld, and I wrote that what you believe is being withheld, you are in reality, you are withholding it from the world, because what you think the world should be giving you to make you happy, recognition, care, love, abundance, whatever it may be, is really something that is inseparable from the essence of who you are, it comes out of that, and so you have to discover that it's already inside you, what you think the world is not giving you, it is already in you, but you have to allow it to flow out into the world, and then that very quality comes back to you. Love, can you love that which is, the isness of life, love is connected with to appreciate, to appreciate the being of any life form, can you love on a daily basis, do you love what is, do you love when you look at the sky, do you appreciate the beauty that you see in the sky, do you appreciate the flower, do you appreciate whatever it is that is around you, the fact that you're breathing, do you appreciate a simple object that usually one takes for granted, its silent presence, so are you giving out that appreciation of things which is a form of love, and then you can notice there's an outflow of attention onto things, rather than somebody says, I'm not getting it, you can sense energy moving out, nobody cares about me, nobody calls me, well do you care about, or do you call them, not because you call them as a means to an end, no, because you're truly interested in them, you're truly wanting to know, you're giving them attention, how are you, not as an empty question, truly being able to listen to somebody, giving them attention, appreciation, listen, which means an outflow of attention, so if you care for people around you, or strangers, then you always get back what flows out, life always reflects that back to you.

Abundance, how do you get in touch with, and again I say, abundance is inseparable from your state of connectedness with being, that's where all abundance arises out of the one, the unmanifested one life, that's where abundance arises, the fullness of life, Jesus calls it, so can you appreciate the fullness of life and the abundance of life at every moment, before life gives you things that in conventional terms would be called abundance, abundance comes when you see the abundance of nature, you walk past a flower shop and see the abundance of beauty and the flower, all these flowering plants, you see, you don't even need to have a plant, a flower, even to appreciate what you see as the infinite abundance of life, or you see the vegetables and the fruit in a store, the abundance of that, the abundance of the Sun pouring out its abundance of energy continuously upon the planet, can you feel that on your skin, how the Sun pours out its abundance for millions and millions and millions of years, no end to it, and it's given the very warmth in your body is derived from Sun energy, because you eat plants and it's the energy that the plants have accumulated from the Sun, and so you appreciate the incredible abundance of the Sun, the abundance of rain that comes down from the sky, the abundance of water, no matter where you are, you will find some abundance in one form or another, and you don't need to own anything to appreciate abundance, you must respond to it and recognize it, so your attention moves there, the abundance of life forms, when you look around the street where all the people and the cars going by, life is producing billions of different life forms everywhere, as humans, as animals, or going to a forest, or anywhere in nature and see the incredible abundance there, but of course the essence of abundance is not multiplicity, when you see it in the outer world, abundance is many things, many beautiful things, all kinds of forms, but the essence of abundance isn't in the forms, the forms are manifestation of abundance, but if you appreciate the manifestation of abundance outside of you, that puts you in touch with the source of abundance that is within you, as the fullness of life, before life becomes a form of life, so by appreciating the manifestations of abundance around you, you get in touch with the feeling of abundance, which is the aliveness that is behind and within every life form, so the more you appreciate it, you can actually feel that, go to a little store where they sell fruit and vegetables and look at that for just a few seconds or half a minute and really see how alive everything is and how so many beautiful things are there, the vegetables and the fruit, you can do the same in a shopping mall with other things, but let's keep it simple, and feel the aliveness that's there, amazing, and at that moment you feel it in yourself, because you can only feel the aliveness that you see in the manifested, you can only feel that through your own, which is basically residing in the unmanifested, and you begin to feel alive, you respond to the world's aliveness, and that's abundance, beginning to arise, the feeling of abundance, so you acknowledge that abundance is already in your life, you don't need to own anything to feel that, it's all around you, and that initiates the process of outflow, of recognition of abundance, and then you'll see that life brings things to you that confirm your innermost feeling of abundance, and actually, things tend to come to you, they like to be acknowledged, strange as it may sound, they seek you, and it's no longer that you then need the external abundance to feel abundant, you feel abundant first, external abundance follows, it's no longer primary, you just feel just as abundant as before, so for many years I lived below the poverty line in official terms, not in third world terms, but in Western official terms, below the poverty line, and yet I didn't feel poor, I continued to feel the abundance of life, and I was surprised when I read in the paper a person who has that much, less than this amount of money per year, is below the poverty line, oh, I must be poor, that's strange, I knew I couldn't, there are many things I couldn't buy, but it didn't seem to matter, and I had this love, strange thing for, let's talk about just this seemingly trivial thing, my means of transportation, and I still have that, a love for, it's almost as if it were alive, in my 20s, my means of transportation was a bicycle throughout my 20s, and so I felt some connection with that bicycle, and the strange habit which I still have, even now, once I parked the bicycle somewhere, chained it to a railing or whatever, I would walk away and still occasionally stop for a moment and look back at it, why?

I felt a connectedness, and I loved just its presence, that's the bike, and then when I was 30, somebody gave me an old car, and I had that again, when I appreciate just its being there, and I felt a connectedness, even a form of love, one could say, perhaps, but feeling appreciation for it, and it's, again, I did, whenever I parked the car, I would just walk a few steps and look back at it for a few seconds, and I still do the same now that I have a much better car, I still do it, what I did once with my bicycle, there's still a, it's a strange thing, it's an inner, it's a sense, I have that with many things, that things are, actually have some life, even so-called inanimate things, and so you feel there's a fullness to life, and that whether it's a car or a bicycle, didn't really matter. And now, this questioner talks about true love, so he or she feels, he, I believe, that what the world is withholding from him is true love, which I presume means another human being in their life, and again, do you love other humans in your daily life? Are you able to look upon them, not with what is conventionally called love, that would be a little silly to, you can't go around and say to everybody, I love you, I love you, you can try, but it's not advisable, most humans would not be comfortable with that, and you don't even have to say in your mind, I love you, because you can't force yourself to love, it's not like that, but are you able to give them, to appreciate their being, when you look at them, to give them space to be, for example? Judgment and love obviously can't go together, so if you compulsively go around judging other humans, there can be no love.

To use a slightly different term, the Buddhists have a term that's translated as loving-kindness, which is quite nice, it's an outflow of loving-kindness meta. You have that loving-kindness towards other humans, but that implies a spaciousness while you relate to them, perceive them, or interact with them. The loving-kindness towards another human can only arise if there's some inner spaciousness in you, like here now.

And from there you look upon that human with appreciation and loving-kindness, and you can look through the ego in the other, because the moment you judge another, you get stuck in their ego, and you strengthen your own ego. Looking through the ego, or egoic behavior, or whatever front the humans present to you, some role they play, and you immediately see that there's the role, you see it without naming it, you see the role and you don't react to it, you look through that in stillness. In stillness, you look through their roles, and there's something emerges that's underneath that's more real.

And sometimes the roles collapse or are relinquished temporarily by the other person, and there's a true interaction. But the important thing is, do you give out love as you move through life? And again, it's really all, when we talk about care, love, recognition, appreciation, abundance, but it all, when you go deep into those things which seem to be different things, when you name them, if you go deep to their source, you realize it's all, they're all really one.

They're all manifestation of one underlying state, so to speak, and that is the unconditioned consciousness. They all arise out of that. As you look at me on the screen, and as you listen to the words, you become aware that there is a background to this experience that you are having at this moment, which is visual, mainly visual and auditory.

There is a background of, could say, stillness to that experience. So the surface reality is your experience of looking, hearing, listening, then in your mind, decoding the sounds and the visual signals. But then, becoming aware that there is a background of stillness, which is in between the words and behind the words.

And that is a dimension that, if I perhaps had not pointed it out, some of you might not have become aware of. And you would only be interested in the words or in looking at me for some reason. But you can also be aware that there's a background to this experience that you're having right now.

Which is a little bit like the canvas on which the artist paints. The difference here is, of course, this metaphorical painting, which is the experience that you're having at this moment, is not fixed. A painting, once it's done, is fixed on the canvas.

But this is a fluid, continuously moving painting, which is your present experience. And you can be aware, simultaneously, as you're having this experience right now, which, from a conventional viewpoint, could not possibly be called interesting. But there is something deeper to this reality than what is conventionally called interesting on the surface of things.

If I start screaming now, then it becomes interesting. Or something happens. A house collapses.

Oh, that's interesting. That's the surface reality. So, meditation is deeper than interesting.

You can now be aware, simultaneously, of the experience you're having at this moment. Words, visual image, mainly. Some thoughts, because the words I speak become thoughts in your mind.

They become your thoughts. But these thoughts point elsewhere. They are pointers or signposts.

They are not self-serving thoughts. They don't say, look at me, believe in me, adopt me as your opinion, identify with me. That's not what these thoughts are saying.

The thoughts are simply pointers beyond thought. And what is it that the thoughts point to? The thoughts appear, they are part of the surface appearance on the canvas, the metaphorical canvas, that on which your present experience is painted, appears.

But these words that appear on the canvas point to, speak of, the canvas on which they appear. They say, don't just be aware of me, the thoughts say that, don't just be aware of me, be aware of where I appear and how I appear, how I emerge, where I emerge. Don't just be aware of what makes it possible for me to be.

Now, what makes it possible for a painting to be? The canvas. So, you become aware that there is a stillness, as I said, in the background of your present experience, in the background, and it even interpenetrates your actual experience.

It becomes into, it goes, you find it in the cracked of between words. It's there everywhere. And what else could we call it?

So, I want to give you a few more pointers, helpful pointers. In addition to the experience you're having, and whatever makes up the experience you're having at this moment, and right now it's a very simple thing, because there's only a few simple words, and a man talking to you through the screen. But in addition to that, there is a silent presence that has no form.

You can't say, there it is. You can't say, look at it. You can't grasp it.

You can't analyze it. In fact, you can't know anything about it, and yet it's there. It's the one thing that is beyond doubt about the reality of this moment.

Everything you're experiencing at this moment could be a dream. So, you can doubt that. And in some ways, it is a dream.

It evaporates quickly. It dissolves, and then something new appears. So, you can doubt that what you're experiencing right now is absolutely really real.

What you cannot doubt is that you are experiencing something, whether it's real or unreal, whether it's dream or reality. You cannot doubt that something is being experienced. You don't even have to say, I am experiencing, because the I that says, I am experiencing me, the person, could be part of the dream, and in some way it is.

But even if the person is a dream, and in some way, yes, the person is a kind of dream, but the dream is happening right now. What is it that enables the dream, if it is a dream or if it's not a dream, what is it that enables the reality of this moment to be? And since I use the word to be, we could say, it is the being that is behind everything.

The silent presence, which is being. So you become aware of that, this again is the canvas, as we called it. But what is that?

The mind may ask. And many answers are possible. Not one answer is the correct one.

Every answer, what is to the question, what is that? Every answer will limit it, will not be absolutely correct, will distort it. And yet, let's say this, it is you, that canvas, that silent presence, is the essence of you.

Not the surface you, the essence of you, the surface you knows what that is, a kind of dream. And you become aware of that underlying silent space or presence.

I do have a question for you, this is a terribly personal question, and we can edit this out of the tape if you don't want it in the program. But I want to know whether, because I want to tell you, and I'm not pumping sunshine into your ear, this is the truth for me, you have stood for me as as close as I have come to see on this planet as a living master, who understands, but who does more than understand, because to be honest with you, I think I understand. But the difference I see between you and me, to be honest, and totally transparent is, we both understand it, we can both say it really well, but he lives it.

I don't.

Except when I do. But what I notice is that I live at probably 20, who can give a number, not enough of the time. And when I'm with my beloved, with my family, in private, I somehow get into all of my, you know, thoughts.

And I forget what I'm saying right here to you, as if I didn't even say it, to the point where my loved ones look at me sometimes and say, you ought to read one of your own books. And it's well deserved. It's well deserved.

So I've come to you for a personal counseling session on television. How do I take what I think that I am? How do I take what I've experienced?

I'm going to not even say what I think I am, because it's out of thought. It's not from thought. How do I take what I experience myself to be?

And wash the canvas of my life with it, especially when it matters to me the most. In the end, honestly, I don't really care how it is with you. I'll never see any of you again.

That's the truth. But that lady sitting over there, my wife, I see her every day, every hour. Why can't I summon this, then?

First of all, in certain situations, the presence is there fully in you and comes through you, such as here. You know that. In a so-called teaching situation or writing situation, the presence moves through you, and then there's the rest of your life.

And it is sometimes there, I would assume, and sometimes not. Is that right? Or is it mostly not?

I think it's more there now than it used to be, but it's still the majority of time not. And people who know me would tell you that. They'd say, you think this is a nice person, you should work for him.

[Speaker 1] (1:05:12 - 1:07:29)
So all it means is your mind still takes over, and either you relinquish it voluntarily in your daily life, which requires the minimum of awareness that this is what's happening right now, my mind has taken over. But I believe that you do have that. It comes in sometimes that you realize that your mind has taken over.

And in that moment, you can relinquish that and invite presence into your life. Whenever any conflict situation arises or any kind of suffering arises, irritation, anger, whatever it is, then it can be used as an alarm clock to tell you, oh, something has happened here. I sometimes say it's an alarm clock that tells you, I've lost the present moment.

I'm not present in the now. So in other words, you're trapped in your mind. So you can use any conflict situation, and the moment you notice it, you can invite presence back into your life, and so immediately the alertness comes back.

It's a voluntary death. If you don't do it, you'll need more suffering, and then it'll happen. But if you voluntarily relinquish, because you know how it works, you know how it works because you experience what you do in a situation like this, there's that complete openness.

You are not identified with old mind. Your mind is simply a servant of the deeper awareness. As you speak to us, it's beautiful.

You're not here. You're not protecting your ego, which is a wonderful thing, and because there is one thing much vaster here speaking through you than the limited ego that still arises in your daily life. So as you sit here, the ego is not operating.

Otherwise, you would have to hide the fact that you don't live it in your daily life, but something much greater than the ego is speaking through you right now.

[Speaker 2] (1:07:29 - 1:07:32)
You think he's going to miss a chance to talk to Eckhart Tolle about this? You're crazy.

I am a therapist, and I now feel that I don't take people's problems seriously. I don't know if I can continue to be a psychotherapist. Okay.

I also find myself, when I listen to people's problems, a smile arises sometimes, not because of their problems, but because I'm in touch with a deeper reality where their problems are relatively unimportant, and to be in touch with that deeper reality is liberating, and there is a joy in knowing who you are beyond your problems. There is that joy that's there, and I can feel the reality for that person beyond their problems, and that is, I'm not laughing or smiling at them, but at the relative unreality of their problems, and that is actually a form of healing. So if that is the case with you, then you can continue to be a psychotherapist.

You're not just, you can continue to listen to their problems without giving their problems this absolute reality. A relative reality, yes, but be in touch with that level deep within where there is no problem, where that person is already complete and whole, and that is the formless consciousness. Every form identity is not complete.

It never has the feeling of being complete and whole. There's always stuff missing in your form identity, and there are things that didn't go according to what you imagined when you were young. How did you imagine your life to unfold?

Well, you had all kinds of ideas. In many cases, that didn't quite happen, and then people come and say things like, oh, I would have imagined when I was, I imagined my life to unfold very differently from the way it did unfold. It's really a sad story, and I feel I haven't, my form identity is really, there's so much still missing in who I am.

There's so much that I could have achieved, but things happen to stop me from achieving it, and then there's that stuff that I did achieve, and it all came to nothing. It dissolved. I tried so many things, but why didn't I, why didn't I succeed in this or that?

Or if you did succeed greatly in this or that area, you go, why was I, why am I still so restless and unhappy? I've had, everybody thinks I'm so great, and I've got all these fans on Twitter and Facebook. Why am I still, why am I still unhappy?

Why do I need more of this or that, even though my picture is in People magazine, and other magazines that are not that great? So whatever it is, there's always something wrong with their form identity, and if you think everything is right about your form identity, it won't last for very long. Then you happen to just have hit a period, a brief period, when you feel it's all, everything is going great in my life.

I've got a great place to live. I've got a great relationship. I've got a great job.

I've got a great income. I have a great car, and people recognize my importance. They tell me I'm a VIP.

Everything is great. That's how life should be. Now, it is possible for human to, for brief periods to be in that place, but they would be quite brief, because life just isn't like that.

It is designed for things to go wrong. No, no matter how much positive thinking you do, which is all good, but no much, no matter how much positive thinking you do, there is this thing designed into life. It's a, we could call it a sabotage element of sabotage or disruption, which universal intelligence has built into everybody's life.

You, you might have noticed it, but you, what you might not have noticed is that it is built into everybody's life, and you might have thought that life singled you out to sabotage your life, because some people are very good at hiding the, that element in their lives from others, and they wouldn't even admit it, that at night they lie in agony and, or whatever it is. So that's an interesting fact. Once you know that this disruptive thing is built into your life, then you may come to actually accept that fact, that that is a universal thing that every human is meant to face.

So there's always, in some area of your life, there's always some disruption happening, or just happened, or happened a few years ago, but still leaving a lot of traces around, and you're still influencing the way in which you experience life. And then the next thing comes in, and the next, and once you've resolved your financial problems, and you're okay there, finally I've got financial security, ah, and suddenly a health problem comes up, or the other way around, or the great job, you suddenly have this wonderful, fulfilling job, but, and suddenly your company gets taken over by another company, and suddenly you're told, we don't need you anymore. Who am I now without that? No matter, you can, you all know examples from your own life, so, and with some of you, it seems to be just a succession of things going wrong, but they can't have gone that wrong if you are sitting here now, because it's taken you to a spiritual awakening.

Nobody would go to a spiritual awakening, well, nobody I know, without experiencing the unsatisfactory nature of one's life situation. So I am grateful to that in my life, and you can be grateful to that in your life, because otherwise the evolution of consciousness would not have happened. If you had been totally happy all your life, no evolution is possible, no development is possible, no deepening is possible, you would be dancing on the surface of things.

Let's have another drink, and good food, and lots of other good movie and sensory pleasures, and sex, and let's travel and go to another place and explore that, and isn't that nice? And just no depths whatsoever. Of course, you would be incapable of compassion or empathy with other human beings.

You would have no deep insights, which all come out of suffering, just surface existence. But fortunately, very few humans or no humans have that, and if they had it, that would become the disruptive element. The fact that there is nothing disruptive would become the disruptive element in your life.

So on the level of form identity, you never arrive at complete satisfaction. You can't. I can't get no satisfaction.

And once you realize that, you're actually, it's liberating to know, okay, you can still try to improve your life. It's a wonderful thing. Of course, you try to make your life better.

If you're not happy where you live, if you can find a better place to live, or if your health is not well, maybe you can do something about it. Maybe you can't. If you can't do something about it, take action out of, but the foundation for action needs to be present moment acceptance of the isness of now, and then you take action.

But it'll never be totally satisfying. Therefore, the only satisfying thing is to realize that there is another dimension to who you are. And that's where all satisfaction comes from.

The realization that there's more to you than the person, the personality and the personal history. And that is consciousness. You are in essence, timeless consciousness.

This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. Most humans, except for those who already are in touch with that dimension within that lies beyond this superficial realm of delusion.

Most humans then have a number of things that may derive their sense of self from partly collective, partly personal. Collective could mean your nation, your tribal identity, which relates to sport teams, and so on. Religion, my religion, our religion, or particular church or movement within one religion as opposed to another church.

That's different. Nationalism, in some places is still strong, not as insane as it perhaps as it was in the 20th century in many places. And many other collective identification from my club, my town, my this, my that, or our, and then personal possessions, status, recognition from others, or lack of it.

Knowledge, personal appearance, external appearance, and so on. All things the mind identifies with. Very precarious, because basically they're all mental fabrications, stories.

There's nothing wrong with mental fabrications and stories, you can enjoy those as long as you know that's what they are. But if you take them to the ultimate reality, then very quickly you begin to suffer. We continue to live surrounded by these stories.

Enjoy them, you can watch the game, can even be happy if your team wins and the other team loses, but it doesn't go that deep anymore. So if your team loses, yes, there's a surface dissatisfaction which you observe, or if your team wins, there's a surface elation, you go, oh yeah, but it doesn't go that deep. Because on a deeper level, you know that that has nothing to do with who you are.

It's a game, it's a story, a play, a dream-like formation. Now mostly in a dream, you don't know that you're dreaming. Occasionally it happens that you have a lucid dream, and you suddenly, in the middle of a dream, realize that you're dreaming.

And then there's a fundamental shift in the way in which you experience the dream. And the same in daily life, most people are so identified with mental formations, things, events, and so on, which all become mental formations, that the lucidity factor is missing. So they are in the dream of daily existence, but so identified with it, they don't know it is a kind of dream.

So they try to derive a satisfying sense of self from it, which is impossible. Now the equivalent of having a lucid dream, or realizing in the middle of the dream that you're dreaming, is, of course, to become aware in your daily life. Suddenly there is an awareness, which is not a thought.

The awareness, sorry, from the dimension of awareness, you can recognize a thought is just a thought. And you realize who you are, essentially, is that deeper aware presence, the lucidity that enables you not only to have sense perceptions, but also enables you to have thoughts. That is lucid living.

So you have, you can have lucid dreaming, but more important, it's much more important to experience lucid living. And that is the beginning of the end of misidentification with who you are. And what then happens is that there can still be minor manifestations of happiness and unhappiness.

But it doesn't go that deep anymore. Now some people might say, okay, I'm okay with unhappiness not going that deep. But they might feel uneasy with happiness not going that deep anymore.

What I mean, of course, is the what is conventionally called happiness is a temporary surface phenomenon. But there is a deeper happiness, if we even still want to use that term. Usually I don't.

There is a deeper sense of presence of rootedness, of vast spaciousness, of aliveness, that is sometimes called joy. But you can call it inner peace. You can call it a deep sense of contentment in the background.

And this is why we're here to be reminded that that dimension is there within you, waiting to be discovered, or waiting to reveal itself to you. Or if you already live in connectedness with that, to deepen it. That's why we're here.

So the question then, of course, is, do I know who I am, beyond my physical body, or beyond my external appearance? Beyond my place in society? Beyond whatever country I happen to belong to, because I happen to be born there?

Beyond my religion, which, again, in most cases, is my religion, because I happen to be born in a particular place? Beyond my social function, status in society? Or beyond my possessions?

And all those things I mentioned are really, they may have an external existence, but you experience them as images in your mind. And of course, you are the presence behind those images, and even within those images. So right now, there's a chance for you to stop thinking, not through any kind of effort, not through any willpower, act of will, not through suppression of thinking.

But simply because you realize that right now, thinking is not really necessary. You don't need to figure out what I'm talking about, by thinking about it. You understand the words.

So of course, there is some mental activity. But the words are not understood on the level of mental concepts. They are understood by you at a deeper level.

Where the truth that these words point to is immediately recognized as your own presence. So the only presence, when words point towards presence, only the presence in you can recognize the meaning. You go, oh, you might not be able to explain it to anybody.

It's just the simple fact that you are conscious right now, which is beyond doubt. Everything else may be a kind of dream, but there must be a consciousness for the dream to appear. It appears in the light of consciousness.

I am that I speak for you and for myself. I am that I am. I am conscious presence.

I am consciousness, formless, timeless. And I know myself as the formless, timeless consciousness. But that knowing can only arise between two thoughts or in the absence, temporary absence, cessation of thought right now.

Between this moment, because on the external, there is time. The deeper, there's no time. Between this moment now and this moment now, there's no thought.

It's a very amazing thing. So let's try it again. I say now twice.

And in between the two nows, see if you can just be there as the presence. Now. Now.

Well, that wasn't that difficult. Now a little longer. Now.

Now. You can either close your eyes, or you can look into my eyes. It may be helpful to look into my eyes because I'm not thinking.

And that can connect you with the state of not thinking. Do it again. Now.

Now.

There's nothing more important in your life. And I'm totally 100% confident and certain that that's the absolute truth. There's nothing more important in your life, no matter who you are, then accessing that dimension, which is not only the dimension of your true identity, but also the place where true intelligence arises and creativity and peace and loving kindness towards all beings, because that is the formless realm of life itself, of consciousness itself, that then recognizes itself in all other forms.

So it's vitally important.

[Speaker 2] (1:40:40 - 1:41:21)
To this special three-part video series on Conscious Manifestation 2020. In this series, Eckhart addresses how we approach conscious manifestation right now, right in the midst of the global pandemic, when so many people are feeling so much instability and economic insecurity. Here's Eckhart Tolle with part one on the first step of conscious manifestation.

So whenever you encounter adversity or loss or extreme limitation that suddenly comes into your life, some kind of disruption that comes into your life, that is a call to come more intensely and intensely into the present moment, first of all. So allow the, whatever form the adversity takes, whatever it is that you're experiencing right now, allow it to, one could almost say, force you into the present moment. If you're not in the present moment, you will be in a state of fear.

So the first step for manifesting something better is to forget about manifestation and be completely concerned with the present moment only and give your fullest attention to the present moment. That includes not only whatever is happening around you at the present moment right now, your sense perceptions and so on. This is, of course, part of the present moment.

It also concerns the thoughts that you're going through your mind at the present moment. So there's a huge difference between having thoughts go through your mind and being aware that certain thoughts are going through your mind at the present moment. This is something very important, easy to overlook.

Thoughts go through your mind all the time. For most people, particularly people who have not awakened yet in any way, who are still unconscious, which means completely identified with a thinking mind, for those people, there's no awareness behind the thought. This is why we say they are unconscious.

Without awareness, there's only the movement of thought. And the movement of thought reacts to whatever is happening around you. And the way in which the movement of thought reacts to whatever is happening around you depends on the way in which your mind has been conditioned by past experiences.

So the conditioning of your mind determines how you react to things that are happening around you, how you interpret them, what kind of narrative you create around what is happening around you. You talk to yourself, that's the voice in the head, the thought processes. This talking to yourself becomes a narrative.

Without awareness, you are completely identified with the stream of thinking that is reactive to whatever is happening around you. And if something is happening that is challenging, in other words, some kind of adversity, limitation, loss or disruption of your life, then the normal thing for most people is a very scary narrative that arises in your mind. The way in which you interpret what's happening is scary because you're not only looking at what's happening now, you're also extrapolating from there and saying, how is this going to affect me?

What's going to happen tomorrow, next week? There's the future. You project yourself into the future where you see things are getting even worse than they are now.

You see already how whatever is happening now, how it's going to affect your life and you play out scenarios in your mind, which are not pleasant. And you don't know what you're doing. You believe that what you're experiencing is the reality, but it's not the reality.

What you're experiencing is what your mind has created. It is a narrative that your mind has created as a reaction to what's happening around you. So you're not experiencing reality, you're confusing what is happening in your mind with reality.

So once an awareness comes in, awareness, another word for it is presence. When awareness comes in, you suddenly become aware of the kind of thoughts that your mind is creating. And that is the beginning of awakening, spiritual awakening, the awakening of consciousness.

That is to become aware of the way in which your mind functions and what it says. And this is why it's so important to become conscious of the present moment, because that is an intrinsic part of being present is to become aware of what your mind is doing in this moment. And this is why I said, the first step is to forget about wanting to manifest something different.

We can go there later. The first step is become more intensely, more acutely aware of the present moment, because if you're not without that awareness, you are at the mercy of your mind, the conditioned mind, without even knowing it, you have become a victim of your mind. And so it is true to say that for many people, their worst enemy lives between their two ears without, and they don't know it.

So the most foundational step is coming into the present moment, which implies the arising of awareness or presence. And as that awareness arises, you become aware not only of your immediate surroundings, which is part of the present moment, but you also become aware of the thinking mind and what thoughts is your mind producing. And you look at the, are these thoughts reflecting truly a reflection of reality, or are they a fiction that my mind is creating, projecting itself into the future where things are usually seen as going to get worse.

And then you experience the emotions, the emotion usually reflects mind activity. So if your mind is producing thoughts that are telling you that your situation is dangerous or critical, although in the present moment, it is very unlikely, highly unlikely that your situation is dangerous or critical in this moment. If it is dangerous or critical, of course you take action.

You have to do something to get out of this immediate challenge, but it's highly unlikely that in this moment, there is immediate danger or your situation is critical right now. So it's, first step then is coming into this moment and realizing, okay, this is, you become aware of sense perceptions. Then you become aware of thoughts.

It may take a little while for some people who are deeply identified with the stream of thinking, it may take them, it may not even be very easy at first to become aware of sense perceptions, which is part of being present. Why is it not easy for many people to become aware of sense perceptions? Because the entire consciousness is continuously being absorbed by the conditioned mind.

And so their entire attention is in the thought processes. So their entire attention is consumed by unconscious thought processes. And so they go, and if somebody says to them, become aware of your surroundings, it may not be easy at first for people who are deeply, deeply trapped in fearful thinking, particularly, to even liberate some of their attention, so to speak, to extract, to take some of your attention away from thinking and direct it towards sensory perception.

So you may find, particularly when you find yourself in a challenging situation, when the mind has become very reactive and is thinking and thinking, what am I going to do now? What's going to happen to me? I need to do something, but I don't know what, and all kinds of scenarios.

So your mind is, your attention is completely taken up by the unconscious thought processes. And if then I say, or whoever it is says, become aware of your sense perceptions, you may find there is an almost magnetic pull by your mind. It wants to continue thinking, and it has a certain, I sometimes call it a certain gravitational pull.

There's a gravitational pull like a magnet, and that, and you cannot free even a small part of your conscious attention and give it to sense perception. And sometimes you have a, your mind may even be creating a thought that tells you why you cannot give attention to sense perception. And that thought might tell you, what's the point?

I've got other problems now. I have to think about my life. I can't, this is completely irrelevant.

I have to solve the big problem of me, my life, my life situation. I have to think about this. Don't tell me about, become aware of my surroundings or sense perception is pointless.

So that the gravitational pull of the conditioned mind is there, and it might even find some kind of justification to prevent you from taking attention, even some attention away from unconscious thinking. But once you discover that, you say, okay, you don't have to believe in every thought that arises in your mind. You don't have to believe every thought.

Okay. Even that little realization, that little realization, I don't have to believe in every thought that comes into my mind is already the beginning of a liberation from your mind. Oh, I don't have to believe in every thought.

Interesting. Because that already implies that there's at least a minimum of awareness. It's not just the thought processes.

When you realize that you don't have to believe every thought in your mind, then that already implies that there's some awareness there from, because it's only from awareness, you can be aware of a thought. This is a very subtle thing. It's fundamental to understand this because your mind, your consciousness has another dimension.

There's a dimension of consciousness in you that we can call awareness or presence. And many people, most people still don't know that. And millions on our planet still are so identified with the mind, they have almost no awareness.

Some awareness occasionally arises, but they don't recognize it. In other words, there may be occasional moments when the mind subsides briefly. And that's a little bit of a liberation, but they don't really, they don't know, they don't recognize that and immediately the mind starts up again.

So you become aware of your thought processes. And then you realize how much of your thinking is directed towards the future, how much it is creating a scenario that is fearful. And you realize the connection between what your mind is saying, the voice in the head, that says, it's partly, it may be, it's partly a voice in the head that thinks about, it could also be a visual images that arise to accompany the voice in the head.

There are visual images that arise. And when these visual images arise, then for example, you see yourself suddenly as a homeless person sitting on a bench. Oh my God.

You see yourself living in your car. Oh my God. And fear arises.

But the thing is, if you were actually living in your car for a while, some people are, and if you became present in that moment, it wouldn't actually, wouldn't be that bad. It actually, there were times, occasionally I spent, somebody once gave me an old car that was the first car I ever had. And that was shortly after I spent a period of homelessness.

And there were sometimes nights when I spent in that old car and I enjoyed it tremendously. It was just almost romantic to be in this little bubble. This is just a little anecdote.

What this is pointing to is really the present moment is never quite as bad as the mental projection of some future bad moment. And in the mental projection of some future bad moment, there's nothing you can do about it. But if you have something in the present moment, you can meet whatever arises with the power of your conscious presence.

This is what is. And you, so you become, you come into this moment and become aware of this moment and realize in this moment, there is no problem as such. That's a very strange realization.

It's not a denial. It's not a denial. It's, it takes you to a deeper level, a deeper consciousness, and that is presence or awareness.

So you realize coming into this moment, you've taken some attention out of your thinking mind and some attention now goes into sense perceptions. This is a very important part of becoming present. And in this moment, sense perception means you look around and you listen, whatever noise may be there.

And not just, you really give attention to whatever it is you're looking at or listening to. You become, come to your senses. If you come to your senses, look at the sky, trees, anything natural is the best thing to look at if you can, but it could be anything.

So you come to your senses means there's less mind activity, more presence. And then you become aware that the mind activity that you have been engaged in is ultimately not helpful. That the mind activity itself, the narrative, these unconscious scenarios that the mind created, they are not helpful.

You become aware that worrying is not helpful. And worrying, which is thinking in circles, thinking the same things in the same lines again, without any possibility of taking action right now. You're just, it's not only not helpful, it's actually destructive.

And when you become aware of that, you can more and more let go of unhelpful mind activity and replace it with aware presence in the now.

That state of spaciousness is already in you all the time.

[Speaker 1] (2:02:29 - 2:49:26)
There is an equivalent of dreamless sleep in our ordinary existence, but most people are not aware of that. And that is a dimension of consciousness that is possible for human beings that has certain similarities with dreamless sleep. And although spiritual teachers and so on have spoken about it and pointed to it for a long time, thousands of years, it still is not common knowledge that there's a potential in every human being for realizing within him or herself a state of consciousness that is deeper, infinitely deeper than the ordinary state of thinking and doing normal life.

I sometimes call that state spaciousness, inner spaciousness, or sometimes call it presence or stillness. In Indian spirituality, India, I mean India, they have a word for, they talk about, they have been talking about it, they have a term for this, they call it the fourth state of consciousness, Turiya, which is, I believe, you have dreamless sleep, you have the dream state, you have ordinary wakefulness, and then you have the fourth state, which most humans don't know that it's there for them. They don't know.

And that is the greatest, one could almost say, yes, tragedy of a human life is to miss that the possibility that there is in a human life to realize that fourth state of consciousness. There is an assumption by spiritual seekers, even in India, and anybody who hasn't realized it for themselves or even had glimpses of it, there's an assumption that that fourth state is extremely hard to attain and you need countless years of spiritual practice or countless lifetimes to finally achieve the fourth state of consciousness. And that belief actually prevents you from realizing it within yourself because that state of spaciousness is already in you all the time.

So if you have the belief that it's something that you need to achieve at some future point, that belief, that thought would continuously prevent you from realizing it now because you mentally will always project. And then you say, I'm going to meditate because I want to achieve at some point the fourth state. And that can be a great hindrance in your meditation because it prevents you from going deeper into the present moment where the fourth state is.

Or one could almost say, it's not just where the fourth state is, the present moment is the fourth state of consciousness. The space of now, not what happens in the now, but the deeper, the space in which it happens, the background to your life is continuously there. And continuously also often seeps through one thought, in between two thoughts, you go, three seconds.

For three seconds, you are free of yourself. And you might look at something or whatever it is, or just experience a moment of peace and aliveness. And then of course, you get drawn back into thinking.

And then at another time, a little space comes in again when you're maybe all kinds of, when you're tasting something, perhaps there's just the perception of the taste without any mental interference, just an aware presence behind the sense perception. And then you notice that the state is always there. Every thought exists in that space, is only a wave movement in the space.

And so it's not something that you need to attain as if you didn't have it, but because it's already here, it is essentially who you are. It is intrinsically one with the essence of your being. And if you don't know that, then your life is very limited to just a little person with no transcendent dimension to your life whatsoever.

And so here we are in order to deepen our realization of inner spaciousness, that's all. It's so you realize something that is already here rather than needing to look for it. So why do you often not realize it?

Because you overlook it, just like the fish may overlook the fact that the fish is surrounded by water and starts looking for it. Where's the water? People keep talking about the water.

And the more the fish looks, the less likely that it will find the water. So that spaciousness is something that at first may appear in your life as a glimpse. And then, and at first in many people's lives, they don't know that that is spaciousness.

They experience it as a heightened aliveness or a deeper sense of peace or joy, an absence of problems for a little moment. So they don't know that this is a different dimension of consciousness that has suddenly arisen. They can still confuse it with something else as I did when the shift happened and that was a rare thing.

In my case, it didn't, it happened and then kind of stayed. For most people, it's a more gradual thing. It comes gradually, first in glimpses, and then suddenly it's there for a longer period of time or you go deeper into it.

And there's a gradual transformation of consciousness. Might be so gradual you don't even notice it. And when it happened to me, I didn't realize that there was spaciousness.

I didn't have the word spaciousness. I didn't know anything about the fourth state of consciousness. I knew nothing about presence or even mindfulness.

I didn't realize even that my mind had subsided and become spacious. All I knew is suddenly life is very peaceful. It feels so, this moment feels so good.

That's all I knew. And where does this peace come from, I asked. Didn't know.

I didn't know it was the depths of who I am. Realizing the depths of who I am was joy and peace. But I didn't have a word for that.

I couldn't call it the depths of who I am. I just, why am I suddenly so peaceful? And I started keeping a diary which said, I don't know why I suddenly feel so peaceful.

I just want to write down my daily experience of peace in case it leaves me, then at least I can remember it. And I wrote, it's still somewhere. I don't know where it is locked away.

I don't need to look at it, but it's interesting that there was no understanding of where did this peace originate? What is this peace? How did it come about?

The understanding came later. So you too, you may, well, not you, but people in your life, anybody who is not totally, continuously unhappy, anxious, angry, fearful, or continuously upset, or continuously in a state of deep discontent. And there are people like that.

Don't know what the percentage of the population is. Not insignificant percentage of the population live in an almost continuous state of discontent in one form or another. There's always a residue of anger.

They're just waiting for the next thing to be angry about, to be upset about, or there's a continuous, whatever the state is. Certain percentage, yes, or they're totally unhappy and depressed and everything is just dreadful. Or they are approaching the borderline of what we conventionally call sanity and insanity.

And then they step beyond this borderline and then they're declared clinically, whatever, insane or what. And so there are many people in mental homes who are so obsessed with their minds, but no space whatsoever. And people are very unhappy, totally unhappy most of the time.

Also they experience virtually no relief from their mind. So no spaciousness at all creates, makes for very unhappy life. So, and that is the equivalent of somebody who cannot, if that were possible, who cannot go into dreamless sleep.

All you ever experience is your dreams and something prevents you from going into dreamless sleep. That would be awful. And of course you would go insane.

The same applies to ordinary wakeful state. Somebody who has absolutely no access to the spaciousness within will be extremely unhappy in their ordinary wakeful state and will make others unhappy. Some become violent and create violence.

And then sometimes they are, sometimes people, of course, violent people are so unconscious and unhappy that they create, become violent. Often they attract, get attracted to each other. Then you have a group of people, thousands, hundreds, thousands, sometimes a million, millions who are violent, no spaciousness.

And then they create whatever, what we call genocide and so on. All these things, the most awful things created, life becomes a nightmare. They create a nightmare, either a collective nightmare or a personal nightmare in their personal lives.

So that is like somebody who has absolutely no access. Imagine you could only dream but never reach the dreamless state. You would go insane because you need the dreamless state.

Now, in ordinary wakefulness, you also need the spaciousness. And if you have absolutely no spaciousness, you go virtually insane. You switched off your cell phones, I hear.

And what about your minds? Not as easy because it's not just, well, it is a voice in the head, but over the years and centuries and millennia, it's more than just a voice. There's a kind of entity.

It has turned into a kind of entity. And me, not ultimately real, but seemingly real enough when you confuse who you are with the talking and reacting entity in the head, energized, amplified by emotions in a vicious circle. The emotions are created by whatever the entity is thinking and the energy of the emotion further amplifies the entity.

Ego, the ego. And the strength of that varies from person to person. In some way, we could say that the entity is an aspect of karma.

What is in the East is called karma. It's the patterns inside you, inherited patterns inside you that you confuse with who you are. Consciousness identifies with the patterns.

And in some humans, it's a very heavy entity, extremely dramatic or angry, or very heavy and sad, easily upset, always looking out for some perceived injury or slight, always ready to jump to its defense, even questioning somebody's viewpoint because you identify with the mind, which is ego. So any viewpoint is invested with a sense of self. The ego is in your viewpoint that you're expressing about this or that.

So even somebody questioning your viewpoint can lead to extreme defensive measures or aggression, as you can witness everywhere on television or in daily life. A peaceful discussion with that entity is not really possible because a peaceful discussion about something implies that there's some degree of disidentification from that mind-made entity. There is at least a little bit of space in you and the other person, primarily in you.

That's the main thing is not to demand that there should be space in the other person, but to make sure that there's space in you when you're discussing something. And you can see if the other person is already getting upset. You can see why immediately.

Identification with a mental position, ego. The entity feels threatened and is barking back at you. Oh.

Oh. Some dogs do that also. But the same as in humans, even in vicious dogs, they are only vicious because of their past.

Underneath the viciousness in every dog, there is a goodness. And underneath the madness, of the egoic entity, there is also the truth of who you are or who that other human being is. So your task as you're confronted with these entities, and you are all the time, occasionally your own still takes over perhaps.

One or two of you may still experience it occasionally. But the task is to be there as the observer or witness of your mind. Then you're no longer in the grip of the egoic entity.

So ego then is the unobserved mind, complete lack of awareness. In other words, there is only mind. And that's the state of, one could call it hypnotic state or dreamlike state.

In which you dream up your life. And then things happen around you. Because in every human, every person's life, there are, you come into this world here and there are, you're surrounded by a certain situation.

Things happen to you. And then you react. The entity reacts without any awareness.

It reacts according to its aggressive, defensive conditioning. So it's completely at the mercy of what happens around it. And it perpetuates its own state.

So an event that for somebody who is relatively free of the ego, at least in that particular area of their lives, the same event happening to one person is relatively unimportant. Oh, Eckhart didn't reply to my email. To one person, that is, he must be very busy.

Or maybe he doesn't even read it. And that's just how it is. And the other person feels deeply offended.

I wrote to him three times. Nothing. Didn't even bother to reply to me.

And that's the beginning of the story. And that proliferates into how dreadful a person he is. And then you find other things that you can focus on.

And that's how the entity strengthens itself. It grows. It inflates itself by this reactivity.

So a relatively insignificant thing is this entity of course personalizes everything that happens. It's to do with me. They're trying to do something to me.

He's ignoring me. How dare he? And so it grows.

The next thing is the emails become angry and accusations or phone calls. I'll get you. That's how it grows.

Next time you walk out of your house, I'll be behind you. That's how it can grow. These are more extreme forms, but not uncommon.

So it doesn't matter to what extent it grows, but you can see the simple fact of somebody not replying becomes something dreadful that's happening to me and proliferates into a story. It can occupy a large section of your life. And another person said, well, that's how it is.

When the power of now first came out, some people suggested to me it would be a good idea to send a copy to Deepak Chopra. And I did because that maybe he'll read it and there was only, it was published in 3,000 copies the first edition, which had to be taken. I carried it to bookstores in a paper, in a plastic bag.

And so I signed it to him and nothing. As if it had disappeared into a hole. And now this is what happens when people send books to me, but now I know why.

Because you can't even read them all. You can't possibly read them all, the manuscripts and the books. But luckily that entity was no longer operating inside me so there was no complaining that Deepak had not, it just, there was no reply.

Well, that's just how it is. He must be busy. Maybe he read it, didn't like it.

Maybe he didn't read it. Who knows? The moment I interpret something, I'm projecting.

So it's futile to interpret something, you have no clue why. It's just, that's how it is. It's the simple isness of fact.

And of course the truth is, sure, he never even saw it because he gets too many books. It's impossible. By the way, later, when Power of Now was already doing very well, he did write an endorsement when it wasn't needed anymore, but it was, that was very nice.

But if I had sent him angry emails, I still have not heard from you after three months of sending 10 emails, you still neglected to inform me whether, et cetera, et cetera, then I don't think he would have written an endorsement. So your reaction determines also what happens next. So if your reaction is an egoic one, it's not simply the reaction to something that has happened in the present moment, it also determines how the events unfold from now on.

So if the egoic reaction is aggressive, negative, demanding, complaining, whatever the ego does to strengthen itself, to feel stronger, then that creates an echo in the external world. It's like you're shouting a particular sound, you're shouting it out into the world, and then it echoes back. So what you're putting out then as in your reaction, which comes to words and actions, then comes back at you.

People react to your reaction because they are not perhaps totally enlightened, in which case they wouldn't react to your reactions, but they are also, they have their egos, so they react to your reaction, and you create a whole train of reactivity, and this is how the drama develops and grows. And it's all taken for absolutely real, and that's how it is. You don't realize, the entity doesn't realize, it's creating the whole story.

And all it hears back is the echo of its own conditioning, coming back to you from the external, the outside world. And so, and of course that then serves as a very powerful confirmation that your initial interpretation of events was absolutely correct. So, because, as you see, his original intention was to deceive me to whatever, and then when I confronted him, he got angry because I was right, and so on and so on.

And if you have ever tried to argue with him, the egoic entity with someone, you can see the futility of it, it is impossible. You cannot convince this egoic entity of its own illusory nature, you can't. You only strengthen it.

Arguing with the ego is quite funny ultimately, but it's an absurd enterprise. On its own level, it will always win, and it will draw you, well, the moment you start arguing with the ego, you're already trapped in your own mind patterns. So the karma then, this being an aspect of karma, karma is what happens, usually people say karma is what happens to you, but more importantly, karma is how you react to what happens, because that is what perpetuates the conditioning, and that creates what you experience as your life, and it creates how other people react to you, so how you experience interactions.

Amazing. Amazing. So often I observe the futility of egoic reaction to nothing, to reacting to nothingness, and blowing it up like a huge soap bubble, talking about it for days on end, until finally reality confirms you were right all along.

It's quite a trap. So you need to, the heavier the egoic entity in you is, the more dense it is, because the density, we could call it that, I'm talking about ego, the emotional aspect of ego is a large part of the emotional aspect of ego is the pain bodies, pain body really is the emotional aspect of the egoic entity, and the density of the ego in you varies from person to person. There is probably nobody listening to this here or there, this is the wormhole of the camera through which the words are reaching out, and there's somebody at the other end.

Hi. Hi. Hi.

Not just somebody, far more people than sitting here, there's thousands of people at the other, through some, but there's nobody, people sitting here or at the other end of the wormhole whose ego is extraordinarily dense, or if they are, they won't stay here for very long, or they would switch off this screen saying, this is awful. There's nothing that the ego likes less than to hear about itself. So it is then not so likely that in you there is this great density of the ego and pain body, but you still encounter in your daily life, you will still encounter many humans who manifest extreme density of ego and pain body.

And of course, those people create suffering for themselves and others. That's their purpose in life. That's where they are at in their evolutionary journey.

They are here as spiritual teachers. They are creating suffering, which eventually will awaken them when they realize that the suffering they experience is self-created, but that could take a while before they realize that. In the meantime, they might attempt to create suffering for you at the same, it's because they go together.

And so they become your teachers because they force you into more intense presence, or they draw you into the egoic unconsciousness. So when you are confronted with dense egos, as one spiritual teacher in India called them ego Gs, G being a term of respect, so eat the ego Gs. There are still many around.

And they're here to teach you more presence, of course. They don't know that that's what they're doing, but within the totality, that's ultimately what their function is in the evolutionary journey of humanity. The greatest obstacle is probably when meditation comes out of a sense of lack or neediness.

So you feel you are deprived of something, be it money or a relationship or a living situation, and you feel there's a great lack in your life and you desperately want to get out of it. You desperately want this to change. And so you perhaps use manifestation in a way that is not likely to work.

When, for example, you use affirmations, such as I want a better job. I want a job with a good income and a life situation and a nice place. And I want this and I want that.

By making these statements, you're actually, by implication, saying that you don't have it. So you're also, by saying that you're, there's a reverse side to your statement, I want, and on the reverse side of the statement I want, there is the statement I don't have and I need. And similar things, please give me, if you pray to maybe God, maybe you pray to Jesus, maybe you pray to Buddha.

They do that in Buddhist countries. Maybe you pray to a saint or whatever it is, or you pray to the universe and say, please universe, please give me this, please give me that. That also doesn't work very well.

If it works, it could be accidentally, who knows, but usually that greatly diminishes your power of manifestation because the manifestation practice arises out of a state of lack or neediness. So there's no powerful manifestation there. The secret of manifestation is expressed in one simple statement by Jesus, and that encapsulates all the books that have been written on manifestation and will ever be written on manifestation.

It's just one simple sentence. It says, when you pray for something, believe that you, that it has been given or that you already have it, and then you will receive it. So the important thing is he doesn't say, believe that you will receive it.

He says, believe that you have received it. So there, the secret is hiding in that statement, believe that you have received it. Now, the second obstacle to manifestation is, yes, people understand this statement, but they just cannot get themselves to believe that they have received something when they know fully well that they have not received it.

So it almost looks as if you had been asked to deny reality and you just cannot get yourself to deny reality. So that becomes the second obstacle to manifestation. And the reason why this is the obstacle is the people do not understand what it actually means, what is required for you to believe that you already have it.

How can you overlook external reality and believe that you already have it? And that, the answer to that takes us even deeper where you have to become into full alignment with the power of the present moment and go deep into yourself. That is the most fundamental practice where you discover who or what you are beyond the thinking mind and beyond the ego.

Discover that in essence, you are consciousness and consciousness is the unmanifested life that is the essence of all life, the source of all life and contains everything that could ever be manifested in external reality. I sometimes in a slightly humorous analogy compare that realization of your inner essence with having found the cream and all external reality is the skimmed milk that is a diluted version of the cream, which is the essence of all life that is within you as your deepest reality. So the very foundation for successful manifestation is finding who you are in your essence.

And once you've found that, that already contains everything that you could wish for on a feeling level. So you then, whatever you attain then comes out of the state of fullness, not out of a state of lack. So when you feel the fullness of life that is within you, that's inseparable from the present moment, it's inseparable from who you are in the depth of your being.

When you find the fullness of life, you virtually have everything already. Nothing that you could obtain, could possibly obtain, could improve upon this realization. So let's say you want to obtain great wealth or whatever it is, who knows?

How will you feel when you have it? Or you want to have some specific purpose. I want to create the most beautiful thing that helps millions of others.

How would you feel if you've had it right now? And this is exactly how you feel right now when you get in touch with the essence of who you are. And when you finally obtain it, you will feel no different.

So you feel already that fullness. Whatever else, whatever comes to you in the external is only a reflection, a distant reflection of what you have found within. And so the foundation for true manifestation, of course, lies in the present moment and discover the depths of the present moment.

That's the foundation. If you cannot come into alignment with the present moment and discover the secret of the present moment, that is inseparable from who you are, then no matter what you achieve, either through hard work or through manifestation practices will not satisfy you.

And your powers of manifestation will also be greatly diminished.

[Speaker 1] (2:49:47 - 3:01:37)
So it's when your surface reality, your surface reality becomes frustrating, that's the beginning of potentially finding the portal into the awakened state. But when your surface reality is relatively pleasant, by the way, it doesn't stay like that, but for the time being, let's say it's relatively pleasant, you're not really motivated into finding the deeper essence of who you are. Because why not?

Let's fly to Paris, we'll have a great meal there where you feel a little bit uncomfortable and discontent. Okay, let's go there, let's do this. Let's try this, more sensory experience.

You can buy any sensory experience. And then after a while you find being in your comfort zone, after a while it becomes your discomfort zone. And then finally you've made it.

And then finally there's a possibility of awakening. And so this is the challenges that we encounter in life. Many people have an attitude of resentment or a feeling that there's something very wrong with the world, or there's something very wrong with my life when they're being challenged by difficult situations, difficult people, loss of some kind, did I mention difficult people?

Oh, yes. You may find a lot of your suffering, unhappiness, strangely enough, comes from other people. They are so difficult.

And often the very people that were supposed to make you happy, suddenly they don't fulfill their purpose anymore, and they make you unhappy. It's called the divorce court. And there's an implied belief that this shouldn't be happening.

Life should unfold beautifully without all that stuff going wrong. And to some extent, yes, to some extent, especially as you live more consciously and no longer totally in the grip of ego, you're beginning to awaken. There's an awareness.

You no longer create unnecessary suffering in your mind through reactivity. We are able to drop the unnecessary baggage of creating narratives and creating your own suffering through your narratives. You let go of that.

So it's a huge chunks of suffering begin to fall away. But challenges still come, even then challenges. And even then, it doesn't mean everything will now go totally as expected and as it should.

There's still loss happening from time. There's still, you still come across difficult people. How is that?

I don't want any more difficult. Yeah, but they're everywhere. As the famous French philosopher said, hell is other people.

He looked very unhappy by the way. Well, the only photo I ever saw of him, he looked unhappy, so I don't know. Jean-Paul Sartre.

Oh. It's true, other people are difficult. So your life improves immeasurably as you become more conscious, but it will still challenge you.

And it won't mean you will never experience loss again. It doesn't mean things may not go wrong still occasionally, not perhaps as drastically as before. You don't create your own mayhem and chaos anymore.

But challenges, yes, different kinds of challenges come. And if you no longer complain that a challenge shouldn't exist, difficulties shouldn't exist, obstacles shouldn't exist, things should not be canceled, they shouldn't go wrong. If you drop that expectation, then it's actually fine.

But be careful that if you still have an unspoken assumption that there's something wrong when challenges happen, that would draw you back into unhappiness. There's nothing wrong when challenges happen. We grow through them.

And if you hadn't had yours, you wouldn't be here. If I hadn't had mine, I wouldn't be here. So we wouldn't be here.

We would not be here without it. And so retrospectively, we can actually be grateful for the suffering that we've had, retrospectively. The question is, the challenges of life, when they come, do we transform them into unhappiness or are we able to just face them and then go with it, go with them and do whatever action is possible or necessary or totally accepted at this moment, this is how it is.

So when you live more consciously, you no longer convert the difficulties of life, the inevitable difficulties and challenges of life, you no longer convert them into unhappiness, which means they don't contribute anymore to your unhappy personal identity. You're no longer becoming a more unhappy person. You'd be surprised how many people's main sense of identity in this world is unhappiness.

And they're just looking for the next thing to be unhappy about. And they always find something or to complain about, to be angry about. There's an expression that then you become a grievance looking for a cause.

And of course, you always find the causes. So important thing then to realize that if I'm sure there are some of you who have carried the burden of a very unhappy self for many years, and perhaps you're just beginning to step out of it. You're just perhaps beginning to transcend it.

And there are still millions in this world who carry the burden of an unhappy narrative in their minds, unhappy self. And that means my... And you think about then my life.

Why did it come to this? Why didn't my own... These are my expectations that I had when I was 20.

Why didn't they work out? Why did my marriage collapse? Why did I lose that job?

Why did I succeed and made millions and then I lost them? Why, why? Why did I work for nothing for 15 years and then the whole thing that I built up collapsed?

Why is it dreadful, dreadful? All this begins to dissolve because you realize you're unconsciously creating suffering and strengthening the egoic personality through that. And then my life then is just memories.

And you begin to realize, as I sometimes put it, or people find it a little weird, when I say my life isn't a correct way of putting it because you don't have a life. You don't have a life. Because if you have a life, there's you and life.

How can you be separate from life? So if you don't have a life, one could even say you can't even lose your life. You can only lose something that you have, but you are life, you don't have a life.

I am life and life and consciousness are synonymous. It doesn't mean that every form of life is conscious, but every form of life is, the way I see it, is matter, the table, a rock, mineral, it's like frozen consciousness. Plant life is like liquid consciousness.

It's an analogy. And the mind and thinking and beyond that, consciousness itself is like vapor, mist, it rises, this isn't a water analogy. All life is manifestation of the one underlying life or consciousness in manifold forms.

So you are that, I am life is a wonderful realization. I am consciousness, I don't have a life. Yes, I have a history, but the history is not my life.

It's stuff, it's stuff in the mind, it's memories. And these are, all these things are wonderful that they happen to you because they have brought about your awakening. They all make sense if you now look back on all the things that happened, including, and not only including, but especially the so-called bad things.

They brought you to this point. They brought you, they pushed you into awakening.

Hello. As the now becomes more and more my experience, I started to question why be in a relationship with another. And I guess I want to know a little bit more about how things shift in what we're seeking in a relationship.

And again, through observing yourself in relationships, you can actually find the answers to your question or the answer to your question. Nevertheless, I will continue to speak. It's to ask, to find, try to find some mental conclusion about the function of relationships when you are present or awakened.

Actually, isn't that helpful? Although many people actually wanted to know the answer to your question. That's why you're here.

But you can observe yourself how relationships operate in your life and or how new relationships, if they come into your life, how they differ from the old relationships when you were not present. You may notice that when you're not present, you seek something from the other person. It may be a very subtle thing, or it may be not so subtle.

But when you're not yet connected to the source within yourself, which is the transcendent dimension, which is the stillness, which is consciousness, when you don't know yourself as the light of consciousness, as a living realization, which is not difficult, it's right here, but when that gets obscured, you seek, because that's the only source of true satisfaction and peace and aliveness. And then, but if that is blocked, you're unaware of it, then you seek it through something else. And often it's through another human being.

So you seek something that the other human being cannot really give you, nor any other situation can give you, because you may seek it through some imagined situation. I have to work out the right structure for my life, good income so that I don't have to worry anymore, nice place to live, lovely relationship on top of it, and be able to travel, wouldn't that be great? And even that would not provide permanent satisfaction, it would provide short-lived satisfaction, always followed by dissatisfaction.

So you would be seeking something in the other human some kind of completion, make me complete, make me at home in the now, help me find myself through you. I will have a deal, I make you feel complete and you make me feel complete. It sounds good when you say it like that, but when you actually begin to live it, it doesn't work, not for long.

So you'd see in the old way of seeking relationships, there's the seeking, something through the relationship. It could be just physical pleasure, that is often the case, or it's, and then of course comes the psychological pleasure through the relationship, some kind of psychological completion through the other. And as long as there's the seeking for completion through the other, the relationship is doomed ultimately.

And as presence arises, the mind may still ask, well, would I still need a relationship or want a relationship? You don't need to find some kind of answer, abstract answer or arrive at some kind of conclusion about relationships and then live the rest of your life on the basis of it mentally derived at conclusion about relationships. The mind loves that, it says, I need to sort out my mind what relationship is all about and whether it's still needed when I'm present.

And once I have the answer to that, I can use that for the rest of my life. And build my life on that. Of course, you would be back in mind activity and that kind of conclusion is just a limitation you would impose on yourself.

So that, some mental conclusion about relationships doesn't help you. It's only the direct observation as relationships happen and relationships happen the moment you look at another human being. It's not just intimate relationships because that remains when you look at another human being who knows where it may lead.

But if you already have a conclusion in your mind that says, I don't need relationships anymore, for example, or whatever it is, or I only have relationships with highly evolved beings. And that's another conclusion in your mind. And then you would look through every human being on the basis of that conclusion, which really is mind stuff, and say, are you highly, sufficiently evolved for me?

And probably not. And that's the end of all relationships because every time, every person that comes in is, what's the biblical expression? Weighed and found wanting, for example.

So any kind of conclusion does not serve as a valid basis for your life. So you don't need to have an answer on that level whether relationships are still needed when you are present. Just start living the presence.

You live in presence and then find out how it goes when you look at another human being and you listen to another human being. And perhaps the words coming out of your mouth is, let's have a cup of tea. Without some kind of mental baggage about, I'm now entering a relationship.

Or even when you get, let's have a meal. And then, you know sometimes the person asks, is that a date? They want some kind of concept to fit that into the meal.

Is the meal a date or is it not a date? It's just a concept. We're having a meal together, that's all.

Is this a, does this relationship have a future? No, of course not, there is no future. There is no future.

In fact, it's probably best to let go of the whole idea of relationship and just relate in the present moment. Just, which means you look, you listen, you sense your presence, and then you find words come out of your mouth. You say something.

Or you may even touch the other person without saying, should I touch or not? It's just, there's a more, there's a flow to life when you're present, where you don't need to live from conclusions, but live out of that presence. So the answer, the real answer to your question comes as you bring presence into your contact, not calling it relationships now, bring presence into your contact with other humans.

And then you'll see how that evolves. Who knows where it'll lead? But an important thing is you begin to enjoy just simple relating, perhaps just looking and listening.

You enjoy the presence of the other because you enjoy your own presence. That's where the whole neediness disappears from relationships. When you enjoy the other's presence, you don't need it, you just enjoy it.

But you can only truly enjoy it if you enjoy yourself. And you can only enjoy yourself if you know yourself as consciousness, the light of consciousness, the aware, still, vibrantly alive presence. And you are then, primarily you are that.

In second place, you are still a person, of course. So that's the, and then it becomes a beautiful thing. And less and less do you need these mental judgments about what to do or what its place is.

So what the answer then is, enjoy relating in the present moment. And then whether or not there can still be a close relationship, an intimate relation or not, you have to find out. That's the adventure of it.

But it will be enjoyable. Thank you. Thank you.

So we are moving beyond thought, not back. We step beyond thought. This is humanity's destiny.

And it's urgent now, not in the sense of, oh, we must get there. It's urgent in the sense that there is an intensity now to the arising consciousness. Because the madness that is the dysfunction of the old consciousness is also getting accelerating.

It gets worse. And at the same time, the new is already arising. The two movements, the old still not even having reached yet the end of its madness.

And the new arising at the same time. The old is still much more visible in this world. The madness of the old state of consciousness with its need for conflict and problems.

And the violence that arises out of that state. And the immeasurable suffering that humans inflict on each other and on themselves out of that state. That madness is continuing on the planet.

You only need to watch the news on TV or read the paper. That's a continuation of what we have seen in the 20th century and before that. And the new is arising, not so much visible on the surface of things yet.

Rarely mentioned in the media. Occasionally it is mentioned already here and there. This is why we are here.

Simply not to make it happen, but to allow it to happen. We are simply opening the door wider so that less and less, we're not offering resistance to that anymore. So your practice here is continuous, but don't make impossible demands upon yourself.

Of course you will get drawn even here, back into mind streams. Yes. You may reincarnate into a reactive mind stream.

And then a moment comes when suddenly there's an awakening out of that. Oh. Oh.

Oh. You can see how clear, how obvious the difference between the states of the awakened state. A moment ago, you were in that heaviness, that dense energy.

And suddenly you step out. And it's also like having left, when you're on the plane, it goes through the clouds and suddenly the clouds are underneath you. Oh.

And there's vast clear space, infinite. And so, and the clouds are still there, but you're not in them anymore.

Oh.

And so as you walk here through the gardens, along the river, see if you can be in that state where the sense perception does not absorb your attention entirely, nor the mental labels that arise to do with those sense perceptions or to do with something totally different. They don't absorb your attention totally. Attention remains free as the field of attention.

In other words, you perceive in and through stillness without needing to label everything immediately through the mind. Of course, you know you're looking at this flower. You know it's a flower without having to tell yourself that this is a flower.

You know it's beautiful without having to tell yourself that it's beautiful. And so you realize that there is vast knowing beyond mental labels and concepts. And then you know far more than you could ever know through labels or concepts, because you sense there is a depth to that which we call flower and an aliveness to that which we call flower, that mystery that is not explained by the label flower at all, that mystery that is covered up by the label flower and gives you the delusion that now you know what it is, just a sound.

You've made a sound that has come out of your mouth or you've uttered the sound in your mind, and that gives you the delusion that you know what that is. Children are told that when they learn a language, the delusion is reinforced every time you tell a child, that's called such and such. I have forgotten the names of flowers.

And the child will believe you, dreadful. So what can you do to, do you tell a child, don't call it anything, that doesn't work either. Yeah.

But you might say to a child, well, look at it, smell it, touch it. Look. And then as an afterthought, after thought, yeah, you can say, oh, by the way, we call it such and such instead of saying it is such and such.

Then that creates some distance from the label so that the child doesn't totally believe in that label because then you get more and more trapped in concepts and labels until you reach the age of, then finally at 18, you're totally impressive. You've been through the system that has done it even more to you. And you're totally impressive in a conceptualized reality of mental labels that concern both the world around you.

And they're all conditioning, all the surrounding culture has conditioned you with whatever mental labels they've put into you. And you inhabit a conceptualized reality, not knowing how dead your universe has become, how dead and deadened your reality has become. And you live in equally in a conceptualized sense of self.

You make yourself into mental concepts. And so this is the essence of not knowing who you are. That's the essence of this false self.

Once you have a false self, nothing is seen as it is. And everything is misinterpreted through that conditioning. Everything is distorted and deadened through that conditioning.

And that's how people live. And that is our entire civilization has come out of that. And is it surprising how mad the civilization is?

Of course, it's not surprising considering the state of consciousness out of which it has come. So we are stepping out of that, the compulsion to label continuously. And so you move here, you walk through the gardens and along the river.

And what arises is the state that is free of the need to label. And should a label arise in you as you walk, which is a thought, you recognize it as just a thought and not it. And then it arises and passes and you're back in just, and then perhaps another compulsive label comes.

Okay. Okay. And then somebody comes towards you on the path, walking.

And some mental judgment comes in concerning the form of this being. And you recognize it as a thought, no more. You no longer completely believe in it.

You're not completely in it anymore. You allow that to be also. And then, so gaps arise in which there are no labels, in which seemingly you no longer know anything.

And that's why it's a little bit frightening for some people to enter that realm because it seems at first as if you no longer knew. And how can I, I need to know what's going on here. I need to judge it in some way, classify it in some way.

No. And you see how beautiful, powerful, intelligent, and deep that state is of not labeling. And great intelligence operates here, but it is not the limited intelligence of the human mind.

It's only a small aspect of the vastness of intelligence that ultimately you are. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Just to remind you, as I'm sure everybody knows, the quick way of dropping out of thought is to take a conscious breath, which means in, and out. Conscious breath means what? Conscious breath means you observe the inflow and the outflow, not visually, but with your internal attention.

Some people may put their point of observation on the nostrils, but it's probably best to observe the inflow of the air. In other words, to feel it. So you feel yourself breathing.

You're doing it anyway, but usually it's unconscious. If you had to remember to breathe, of course you would die very quickly. Oh, I forgot.

Too late. So conscious means your attention is there. Your attention then follows the breath as it moves into the body, and you feel that.

And it follows the breath as it moves out. That is one conscious breath, in and out. And immediately your attention has disentangled itself from thought, consciousness.

So that's how you can discover inner space immediately. Even one conscious breath means one in, one out. That's one breath takes about, who knows how long it takes, 15 seconds, whatever, 10 seconds, 10, depends on the length of your breath.

You don't need to particularly make it very long or any different. The body is doing it anyway. So you're just observing what's happening anyway.

And you will find, if you're really there, if you're there with your attention at the beginning of the breath, and the middle of the breath, and the end of the breath, and again, the middle of the out-breath, and the end of the out-breath, you're not thinking. So if your attention is really there, you can't think at the same time. That's why it's such a wonderful meditation tool or method.

Of course, it's recommended as a meditation method. Some people practice it for an hour. I'm saying here, you can intersperse your life with many meditations, consisting of one or two conscious breaths.

Those are many meditations you can do anywhere, wherever you are. And that means every time that you do that, you're not thinking. If you're thinking, you're not observing your breath.

It's as simple as that. So, and it's an interesting thing to observe that in yourself when you are, when there is breath awareness, there's no thinking. When there's thinking, there's no breath awareness.

So it's a very simple way of, especially at night when your mind is telling me you absolutely need to think about your problems now, three o'clock in the morning. And if you don't think about your problems now, your life is going to collapse very soon. Don't believe every thought that comes into your head and then say, okay, let's say, let's take a conscious breath.

And then immediately you notice a shift in consciousness because you stepped out of thinking. And that will feel so good that you might want to take another one. And it's not a drug.

It's not another fix. A drug would mean, a drug usually quickly takes you below thinking, but the awareness that we talk about here takes you above thinking. It requires an alertness.

There are certain similarities, of course, between the state below thinking and the state above thinking, but there are huge differences too. So the state below thinking is the state of the, in human terms, a simpleton, a person who is so simple that his or her mind is not creating any problems yet. Just enjoying things as they come, just enjoy eating and drinking, and just like the hobbit in the, and they're lovely, lovable creatures.

They haven't got an ego yet, or just a very rudimentary ego because they haven't been totally absorbed by thinking. So they are in a deeper state of connectedness with being than the mind absorbed person. That's why they can perform important tasks that the more intelligent people cannot perform because the fool, this is the traditional mythological figure of the fool, very important in different mythologies, has certain powers that the more advanced people don't have.

So often the important task is given to the fool to perform because, and this of course is not made explicit, I'm saying it now, because there's an intuitive knowing that the fool is more deeply connected with the source of life and of being. He's not totally lost in thinking yet. But you don't want to become a fool again.

We're here as the awareness of thought means there's an alertness, you rise above thinking. There are some similarities. One is that you're not creating unnecessary problems anymore like the fool, but you've risen above.

There's a much deeper knowing there. There's a same state of connectedness, but you've been through thinking and you're still able to use the tool of thinking without being used by it. That's an enormous step forward in evolution.

But to an external observer, sometimes the fool and the so-called awakened human they can't tell the difference because they both look very simple, they go. And so there are stories about some Zen masters when they had visitors, occasionally they mistook them for, there was one visitor arrived to see a famous Zen master and there was a person working in the garden and he said, where's your master? And he said, in there in that room.

And when he got into that room, the same gardener was sitting on the chair of the master and said, what are you doing on his chair? And then it turned out that the gardener that looked so simple, he was the master. And often, a long time ago, there was this TV series about Kung Fu with Karen D, what?

Karen, David Karen D. That was very well done because the main character was often, and that was part of the attraction of watching it, the main character was often mistaken for somebody weak and totally ineffective because he always, he had no ego. So he moved in a very simple, he just had a bamboo flute or something he carried with him and he always kept, and then he met these huge egos.

He would visit tech places like Texas where they have, the egos are even bigger than, can be, not necessarily, but. And then the meeting of this person who took him to be a fool and only in moments when suddenly action was required, this fearful being would suddenly, enormous energy would flow into him and so to defeat the evil people, whoever they were, but the particular episode, and suddenly the energy would flow through his body and he would go. And then immediately he would go, there's no ego that said, I did it.

Not immediately, no identification with this action, immediately going back to a presence as if nothing had happened. So it's the person who did that, the director or script writer must have had some insights into the state of egolessness. So on conscious breath, out breath, and you rise above thinking, you don't become stupid.

Don't need to fear that. You don't become stupid when you're not thinking. You actually connect with a more powerful intelligence that can then use thought when it's needed.

You only become stupid when you're not thinking, when you're drifting off into sleep or unconsciousness. It's a state of relative torpor or whatever the word is. So when you get tired, a certain torpor, if that's the right word, comes over you and you would go to, and you're not thinking anymore.

That yes, there perhaps you're moving towards a certain state that could be called stupid, but this is very different. You rise above thinking and that is actually, you're connecting with that deeper intelligence that is consciousness itself, the unconditioned consciousness. And then as you make that your habitual place where you dwell, your mind can actually work more effectively because it can be used by that.

It's because you have developed it already. You've had, you developed it, it became an ego. And now you transcend it, which means you don't leave it behind completely.

It's still there to be used effectively, but you cannot use the mind effectively as long as the mind is using you. Then you have an imposter pretending to be you and thinking all kinds of thoughts according to its conditioning, which have nothing to do with you. They're the conditioned thoughts.

They're conditioned by your upbringing, by your environment, by the culture you grew up in. And so on. And so all this continuous stream of thinking that is invested with a sense of self takes over and pretends to be a person.

Well, basically that's what a so-called person kind of is. A conditioned thought activity that is, that has a sense of self in it. So the Buddha already explained all these things.

And that self is an illusion. It's the same self that Jesus tells us to deny, deny thyself, the illusory self that the Buddha said doesn't even exist. Anatta, no self.

I'll take a, so remember the breath many times during the day. And that may take you into also, you begin to feel your body more easily as you take a conscious breath or two, and you feel the inner aliveness in the body. You can take your attention also directly into the body.

It's another way related to breaths because breath takes your attention into the body, but you can focus on the body more. So that's another way of taking attention out of thought. So if you think you can't, your mind won't leave you alone.

I just cannot stop thinking. I must, this is not true. That's just another thought that tells you you can't do it.

So if you believe that thought, then that becomes true for you. But if you realize that thought, you can't do it, I have too much on my mind, or whatever expression you use, I have too much on my plate, which means your mind. Can't do it now, maybe a little later.

Or, of course, it never comes the moment when your mind tells you, okay, now you can stop thinking. But you can, so attention in the body. Immediately you step out.

It can be a choice. There's enough awareness in you to have the choice. There are still millions on the planet whose awareness is not developed enough to even have a choice as far as their inner state is concerned.

They are totally, totally run by their conditioning, totally conditioned entities. So to tell them that they have a choice would be wrong. They don't.

You need to come to a place where there's already a certain degree of awareness. There's already to a limited degree you have separated from thinking and realize there's an aware space and there's my thoughts. Then you begin to have a choice.

And ultimately, of course, everything you express in language is a limited perspective. It's never the entire truth. So whenever anybody says anything, it can never be the complete truth.

You always have to look at other perspectives too. When I say you have a choice, this is what it appears to be. And it's a useful and helpful perspective.

Ultimately, you are not separate from the totality of consciousness. So I might as well say then, consciousness chooses to express itself through you. But to you, it looks as if you had a choice, but you are consciousness.

Let's not confuse it too much because language can complicate things excessively. And don't demand some ultimate truth to be expressed through concepts. Concepts can only point.

The famous finger pointing to the moon, the Buddhists talk about the finger pointing to the moon. Now, usually your dog will think when you point somewhere, the dog will usually look at your finger. I've heard there are some dogs who are advanced enough to look beyond the finger.

I haven't met any yet. So when there's spiritual teaching, when you take a statement and believe in the statement rather than go to where the statement points, then that's mistaking the finger for the moon. There's still, for example, I say, the stillness is already in you.

It's just covered up by mental noise. And then somebody could come and say, I believe that the stillness is already in me. I believe that completely.

Yes, but have you tasted it? No, I just believe it. It's not enough.

That is mistaking the finger for the moon.

[Speaker 3] (3:45:14 - 3:45:50)
Thank you, Eckhart, for waking us all up. My question concerns the cultivation of virtue. I hear many traditions speak about cultivating loving kindness, cultivating compassion.

And in our previous session, I heard you say that loving kindness comes naturally out of presence. So can we cultivate virtues like you practice, and you become it?

Thanks. That term tends to be used a lot in Buddhist teachings, the term cultivate, cultivating virtues. And so in Buddhism, there's a list of nice things that you swallow.

I only know the essential Buddhism. I can't remember the long lists that you get in Buddhism of virtues and so on. I know the basic thing, which undoubtedly is what the Buddha taught is the origin of suffering and the way beyond suffering, that's the Buddha.

I think all the longer lists were compiled at a later stage by monks who wanted to make things more understandable and accessible to other monks, but they were not fully present when they did these long lists, but that's okay. So ultimately, of course, it is better that somebody should at least attempt to cultivate the various virtues, the primary one in Christianity would be, of course, love your neighbor as yourself. That's the primary.

And really, it all boils down to that. In Buddhism, metta, loving kindness towards others is important, but ultimately to cultivate this, it's a wonderful intention and it's better than not trying to cultivate it, but ultimately you won't really succeed unless there's a shift in consciousness in you that is primary. Once there is that shift in consciousness, and this is what our gathering is all about, it's virtually impossible to sustain the virtues for very long from the old state of consciousness because the old state of consciousness is dominated by ego.

And if you want to cultivate the virtues, it's very often a desire of the ego to improve one's self-image, not only for others, but for oneself too, because one wants to feel virtuous. And so the ego feels better if it can convert its sometimes negative self-image into a good one. And so the ego decides, okay, I'm doing this, I'm virtuous now.

But in Christianity, this for hundreds, thousands, 2,000 years, Christians have tried to live, well, not all, many haven't even tried, but to love your neighbor as yourself. Not that many succeeded because I don't believe that Jesus actually said, love your neighbor as yourself. I believe that they took, that was taken out of context.

He said, the kingdom of heaven, which I translate it, as you may remember, as the dimension of formlessness or the dimension of spaciousness is within you. And there's only one thing that matters. There's only one thing that of primary, it was of primary importance.

There may be many other things that are important, but there's only one thing that is of primary importance. And that is to find within you that dimension of consciousness and then live from that dimension of consciousness. And if you live from that dimension of consciousness, then naturally you will love your neighbor as yourself because you recognize your neighbor as essentially one with who you are.

And then you will also love God as yourself because you will then recognize essentially that God is the source of your very being. That's what he said. But perhaps people who wrote it down, they got to the bottom of the page where it said about the kingdom of heaven.

And if you enter the kingdom of heaven, if that's the dimension of consciousness, turn over the page, then you love your neighbor as yourself. And then at some point, the two pages got separated. And so all the virtues arise naturally out of that state of connectedness with being, which is presence, love, benevolence, goodwill towards other human beings, which is all aspects of love.

And whatever else, whatever other virtues, really it all comes down to no longer feeling that acute sense of separation between yourself and other human beings and between yourself and the source of who you are, the source of all life. So as God being the source of all life, the unmanifested source of all life. I'm not, when I use the word God, I'm not speaking of an authority figure, a controlling authority figure, but the source of all life.

So your question was good. I had selected your question. I saw it on a piece of paper and it had been selected for an answer too, but I'm glad you asked it.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (3:52:12 - 3:52:29)
This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 4] (3:53:00 - 3:53:02)
This applies in many cases.

People have, let's say you might feel a sense of lack of something meaningful in your life, or you might feel a sense of lack of feeling that you are not good enough. You are not enough in this world. And some people then come up with, what is it that I want?

And the ego, so I might say, in many young people you have that, you might say, I want to be a famous this or that. I want to be, if you ask young people, because they're always online and doing things in the virtual world, I want to be a famous YouTuber. I want to be a famous, okay.

Now what, let's say somebody says, I want to be a famous YouTuber. That is not good. That is not enough.

You can sit down and then you imagine, I'm a famous YouTuber. And even if you feel the power of beingness, there's still something missing. And what is missing is in the dimension of doing.

Let's say you have the dimension of being. You're rooted in the being and you feel the fullness of life. And then you say, okay, I am, if I meant, I am an influential and famous YouTuber.

I am influential. But what are you doing? Do you have anything to convey to people on YouTube?

Is there anything that you are enthusiastic about? Is there anything that people would love to hear from you or people would find helpful? It's not enough.

The foundation, yes. The foundation is to be rooted in the dimension of being. So that this sense of fullness of life within you here and now.

But then for many things, maybe not for all things, but for many things, you need to also address the dimension of doing. You have the being dimension, but that's the foundation. The doing dimension is, okay, let's come back to the famous.

I want to be a famous YouTuber. Do you have something that you feel enthusiastic about that perhaps other people would appreciate and it would help them? What could it be?

Is it music or singing or information, conveying information or entertaining? Whatever it is. And then you focus on that, develop technical skills because putting things on YouTube, you have skills of editing and cameras, producing videos and enjoy the doing of it.

When you're engaged in the doing of it, this enjoyment of being flows into the doing. And again, do not be attached too much to the outcome. That's very important, but enjoy the doing of it so that the being flows into the being dimension, flows into the doing dimension too.

So you enjoy learning how to produce videos, learning editing, video editing, learning. And then whatever subject matter you have that you feel enthusiastic about that would help the world and other people, then you will learn more about it or you go more deeply into it. And then you begin to practice and it's all a wonderful thing.

And you're not attached to the outcome, but from time to time, then you're able to, from time to time, you go within and you imagine yourself as a famous YouTuber that's reaching hundreds of thousands or millions of people who are being helped or you contribute something to other people's lives by doing whatever it is you're doing. And by doing that, you are a famous YouTuber. Then it's more powerful if you feel that this is already the case.

It's already, I'm already a famous YouTuber. Perhaps for the time being, you only get 20 views per video. It's, that's fine.

That's at the moment, that's all that, that's fine. But even that, you appreciate those 20 views. Great, I've reached 20 people.

And then you go within and again, you feel you're already a famous YouTuber and you're helping. It's not just this image of me as a famous YouTuber. There must be another dimension to it that relates to the world.

How does that affect the world? Whatever you want to achieve, that can be, that empowers you. What does, how do you help?

What does the universe want to manifest through me? When I say universe, I mean the intelligence that pervades the universe, that's behind it all. The universe or the intelligence behind it all.

The divine intelligence behind the phenomenal world. What does it want from me? And maybe it wants me to become a famous YouTuber.

But the most important thing is not the famous.

[Speaker 4] (3:59:13 - 3:59:20)
It's just, what is it that's the energy that's flowing through me?

[Speaker 1] (3:59:28 - 4:14:27)
So you can look at the world wars. You can look at all the terrorism and all the other mad wars that are being fought as just, it's just a question of degrees of unconsciousness. Not different.

So when you go into that state of unconsciousness, it takes you over, you lose it. Basically then, that is the same energy field that has created what we see as the madness of human history and what we see of the madness of the so-called world news. The same energy.

So don't complain about all these violent people who are doing all these dreadful things. All that it is, is human unconsciousness in a more pronounced form than yours or your partners. And so that helps a little bit to find perhaps almost some compassion towards all these crazy people that are doing such crazy things and creating such terrible suffering.

Now, if you become compassionate towards them, don't worry. It doesn't mean that they will not experience the consequences of their unconsciousness. That still happens.

You jump by being compassionate to another human being, you don't necessarily remove the karmic consequences of their action, but you yourself become free from being drawn into the karmic cycle. So the act of forgiveness does not mean that this person is not going to suffer the consequences, but life makes sure in whatever form that they do suffer the consequences of the suffering that they inflict on other human beings. It's a karmic law.

But if you don't want to be part of that anymore, if you want to step out of the karmic law, the first step out of the, and the most important step out of the karmic law is forgiveness. Then you do not feed it, you don't become part of it. That's why traditionally in spiritual teachings of various traditions, forgiveness is always emphasized.

It must be real though. It's, there are many forms of superficial forgiveness when just the mind is, okay, I forgive you. It's not deep, it's not real yet.

The mind is trying to forgive, but you can only forgive if you realize that whatever actions have been perpetrated are the effects of human unconsciousness. In other words, what Jesus said on the cross or is reported to have said, forgive them for they know not what they do. Very profound statement.

It is a profound statement that can be applied to any act of violence perpetrated against other humans or life forms. Forgive them for they know not what they do. Not knowing what they do, of course, means they are unconscious.

The word unconscious probably in that sense wasn't used at the time. So he said, they don't know what they do. Karmic law still operates, but without you.

And you can notice karmic law when you see a movie, some movies like to manipulate your emotions. And so there are particular types of movies where they first, they build up the tension by showing you some very evil person. And this evil person is killing all these people or hurting all these people.

And then you're being manipulated to feel that incredible pull that this person should suffer for what he or she has done. That's the manipulation. And the audience loves that.

They love watching things like that. So then the emotion builds up. And finally, there are even some movies like the movies about vigilantes who take justice in their own hands because the justice system doesn't deal with the criminals anymore.

So finally you have this guy who goes out and kills all the bad guys. And your emotions have been manipulated so much that the audience says, yes, yes, he must die. Not realize, no, what you are feeling this incredible, it might also happen if you read about some dreadful crime that somebody has committed.

And then if you read it on the internet, you can read on some news websites, you can read the comment section. And in the comment section, every other comment says, we should have the death penalty. He needs to sit in electric chair.

He needs to be done to what he did, they should do to him and all these. And this is an enormous pressure that people feel inside. And this is connected to karmic law because there's a compensatory factor in karmic law.

And you can feel that as the pressure inside you, but it keeps you trapped in karma. So in that sense, watching these movies is not helpful because it keeps you trapped in that wheel of karma. So they don't teach forgiveness there.

So this is, we are talking about something very important and that is dealing with human unconsciousness and what looks like evil. So there are many things that are quite dreadful. So how do we, how does that affect our state of consciousness?

And what role does our state of consciousness play in this whole scenario? It does have a role to play. So it's for us important that we are no longer part of action and reaction because the definition of karma is action.

Karma means action and reaction. And it goes on and on. And as you can see in certain societies and so on, the karmic thing goes back centuries and centuries, the same grievance transmitted from one generation to the next and the next and the next, and they are all asleep.

This is why spiritual teachings say you are asleep. They are all so unconscious, they get taken over by the collective mental emotional pattern and the mental story. They just inherit it from their parents and then they pass it on to their children.

And then they, and each generation suffers. They suffer, they call much suffering great for each other. And at some point, the suffering becomes almost unbearable for certain people within that society.

And that's beginning of a shift when it gets too much. So suffering drives humans to a point of awakening. That's a strange paradox here is the suffering is created by the unconsciousness in humans, but in some strange way, eventually it wakes you up, it awakens you.

That's the redeeming feature behind the suffering that humans create for each other. Eventually it leads to a spiritual awakening. So it all is a good thing to realize it all comes down to your state of consciousness and how you relate to the people around you.

And that spreads, that is what creates the world. And even how you react to when you listen to the world news has certain influence because all human minds are connected at a deeper level. So the way in which you react to what you hear on the world news contributes either to the unconsciousness.

If you get on your computer or the iPad and you type in, this guy does not deserve to live. He should die slowly and they should torture him. Then you become part of the same karma.

If you've ever done that, please forgive yourself. And if you enjoy reading those comments, also forgive yourself. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. The greatest mystery of the universe is not out in outer space, the mysteries of the galaxies, the mysteries of the black holes, the billions of galaxies that exist, that it is phenomenal, it's unbelievable. And the greatest mystery is not on the atomic level, which is also unbelievable, the world that is there, the atomic and subatomic level that scientists explore, which we only understand a tiny fragment of, just as we only understand the tiniest of fragments of what is out there.

So you have the two realms, the two mysteries, the outer space, and then the macrocosm, and you have the microcosm. And people write books, great scientists write books about the mysteries of the universe. And the amazing thing is, many of these books, very good books, fail to mention one word.

They explore the mysteries of the universe, but there's one word, you can have a whole book on the mysteries of the universe, either the macrocosm or the microcosm or the two together. The one word that's not mentioned is consciousness, which is the foremost fundamental mystery, the fact that the universe is conscious. That is the most amazing miracle.

How do I know that the universe is conscious? Well, I am conscious, you are conscious. The universe is conscious in us.

The universe is experiencing itself for a brief moment as a human being. It's also experiencing itself for brief moments as a plant or an animal. And that's an amazing thing.

Now, scientists are probably never going to figure out what consciousness is, if it's even possible to figure out what consciousness is, because scientists is concerned with looking out there. You can either look out into outer space or you look into the most, the innermost of matter. But what scientists don't look at is their own consciousness, which is the universe looking at itself.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

[Speaker 7] (4:14:33 - 4:14:33)
Oh.

[Speaker 3] (4:15:22 - 4:15:25)
I am, I go to bed with you at night.

[Speaker 7] (4:15:32 - 4:15:35)
It's very nice to see you here in person.

So I'm here asking a question for several people. We were all praying that I would get chosen so I could ask this question. We're just curious.

Do you still experience moments of losing, losing it, losing consciousness? For example, if someone cuts you off in traffic, the person who called you or said, slow driver, the story you gave, bad driver. Do you ever still experience yourself losing it and what is that like for you and calling yourself back?

[Speaker 1] (4:16:20 - 4:19:31)
No, in those cases I don't. I'm just fine, it doesn't affect me at all. But sometimes I don't, there are emotions.

They can come when I see violence inflicted on humans or animals. I can experience weeping. There are, sometimes when I see human suffering, there is an emotion.

It doesn't last very long, it passes through. But there's no reaction to those things, traffic or humans. I think people who have worked with me can probably tell me if I'm wrong because when you work with somebody, then you get to know them, especially when things need to get done.

So there's a fairly constant sense of presence, but it's not always the same intensity of presence. The intensity of presence varies. It can be, it sometimes recedes into the background, and then more of my attention is taken up with the foreground.

I have to deal with this and this and this, and the attention goes there, and there's just this kind of background presence, like a humming, like an alm in the background, and here things happen. But then times, because I love doing nothing, and I do that quite often. And then sometimes presence comes completely, so the person is virtually obliterated, and there's just consciousness.

In teaching situations, for lack of a better word, like this, the person is not really here. It's not the person who is teaching. It's consciousness.

It's using the vehicle of the person. It's using the mind of the person in order to manifest this. So in a teaching situation, there is just consciousness.

Eckhart is only the frame or the window frame, but the light comes from somewhere else, the light that comes through the window. Yes, there are degrees of intensity of presence, but it's always there, either obliterating Eckhart or in the background, and then the person deals with things as best he can.

And did that come after you had your experience of awakening? Was it like that from the very beginning, or did that come with your practice?

Well, the peace was there, has been there since then, but there has been an integration of that into life that took longer so that it went into every aspect of my life. I was still deluded in some ways, even after the shift happened, because the personality was still working, and I still thought at that point my destiny was to be in the academic world, and I continued to pursue a PhD, not knowing that it was no longer what I was meant to do. The personality still had a momentum, and went on with that for a few years.

There were also times after that when a few times I could feel the pull of suffering in the form of the mind tugging me, like occasionally went like, come this way, come and suffer. And what that did was, there was an intensification of presence suddenly when that happened, so then it went, so I'm not going that way. And so suddenly the light went up, and then a few more times it happened, and, come, be unhappy.

You have so many reasons to be unhappy, don't you remember? Now, if you, any mind can, if you want to remember reasons for being unhappy, I'm sure everybody here could do that. I could, even now I could.

Reasons for being unhappy, anybody can do that if you allow that kind of thought to take over your mind, and then confuse it with reality, a story, a sad story in the head. So a few times the mind tried, but didn't get very far. And then another shift came to a deeper level when I started to work with people, because that required a further deepening.

Working with people required a further deepening, especially people who were in suffering. And I noticed that when I started seeing individuals who came, often very unhappy people or suffering people, or people who were suffering from serious illness or had great loss, and I noticed whenever I sat in front of these people and listened to their story, I would go into a very deep state of presence, deeper than I'd experienced before, very deep and intense presence. And some of those people, if they were sensitive enough, it happened several times, they stopped and said, what, you're doing something.

I wasn't doing anything. Yeah, you're doing something. One lady said she was a former nun in the Catholic monasteries and became, after 15 years, became very unhappy because she hadn't found God.

And so then she came to me looking for God, but of course she was looking for herself, the deepest source of her being. And I was sitting, listening to her, and then she said, oh, you're doing healing. You're healing me.

I said, oh, because I didn't know that I was doing that. And for a while, because I didn't, at the time I wasn't, didn't fully understand the consciousness and the process, it just was there, but I didn't understand it. I thought I was a healer suddenly.

And then she sent me some people who wanted just physical healing. But I noticed when people who just wanted physical healing, I didn't go that deep at all. It's only people who are ready for a deeper transformation, then I would go very deep.

And then when groups happened again, a deepening happened again of a different kind, because a group is a different energy field again. So there was a deepening there that was somewhat different kinds, it's hard to describe. But my great learning was with individual people, spiritual counseling, also the words that came out of that deep state of connectedness, surprised me many times.

I know that some of you have already had similar experiences when people came to you with problems and you were able to just be still and listen. And then you found yourself saying some words that were just right. But there are always two parts of that.

One is the words and one is the energy field that's behind the words. And sometimes words are not even necessary in a situation like that. So there was a process, and then later the teachings became a book.

And there itself, the writing of the book was another way of connecting with presence and allowing presence to use this mind to express itself through. It's a long adventure of ways in which presence manifests it through this vehicle as it is for you. Nobody can predict in what ways presence will flow through you and manifest through you, but it is doing it already and it will.

Who knows what situations you go into and become a healing influence in those situations. You are meant to do that, to be there, because the universe needs that. The evolutionary impulse behind the universe is behind you.

It wants you to go through that transformation and then be the agent for transformation in this world. So that is our common destiny. Thank you.

This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. When you go out into nature and you see something extraordinarily beautiful like a sunset, and it's a moment of intense aliveness and you feel that was such a beautiful moment.

Why? Because that freed you from the incessant stream of thinking. I don't know if you're familiar with the famous Zen story that the, I mean, everybody knows a bit about Zen.

Well, for many people, Zen means simplicity of interior design or whatever. But that's not what Zen is. It was not created by an interior designer.

There was a story about a man comes to the Zen master and he's a university professor who has studied all the Zen scriptures and all the other Buddhist scriptures. And so he comes to the famous master and the master says, sit down, please. And the professor says, well, I've started it all, but I want to hear from you also what really Zen is.

Can you explain the essence to me? And the master was making tea. So the master was, there was the cup, the professor's cup, and the master took a teapot and started pouring tea into his cup.

And he didn't stop pouring. And then the tea overflowed and the professor was looking and saying, stop, stop, can't you see the cup is overflowing? And the master said, well, just like this overflowing cup, you are full of your opinions, viewpoints, knowledge, and speculations.

How can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup? That was his main lesson. How can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup?

So the cup here stands for the full cup, the cup that's overflowing with stuff refers to the clutter of your mind, the incessant thought stream of your mind, the accumulated clutter, the incessant repetitive thought stream. And that and the personality that I talk about, the personal identity and the thought stream are really go together. So you are familiar with that.

Now the difference between you and a unawakened person is that you know that there's a voice in your head. There's still millions of people out there who don't know that there's a voice in their head that never stops speaking because they are so identified with the voice that they have become it. There is no separation.

There is no awareness. There is no presence. Their entire consciousness is trapped in thought.

And that is the state of being trapped in your personality. So every thought that comes into your head immediately grabs you and possesses you and you're so identified with it that you believe in every thought that comes into your head and that's how it is. The simplest thing, the simplest thing, you don't see it clearly.

You see it through the thinking, veil of thinking, which is conditioned by your past, your culture, your upbringing, the country you grew up in, the culture, the society, the family, your personal circumstances, your collective circumstances determines the type of thinking that has you in its grip that varies from person to person and culture to culture. But the basic mechanism behind it is the same. They are all in the grip of the unobserved mind that is invested with a sense of self.

Every thought has a sense of self in it. This is what the word identify means. You identify with every thought that comes into your head and you believe in every thought that comes into your head.

This is the case if there's no awareness whatsoever, then that is your fate. Then awareness is the dormant faculty, presence, awareness, whatever you want to call it. That's the dormant faculty in you.

It's still dormant. And as long as it's completely dormant, you're totally in the grip of your conditioned personality and your conditioned mind. You are basically possessed.

It thinks through you. It acts through you. It is an energy field that has you in its grip and you don't even know it because you think you are it.

And for many, the beginning of spiritual awakening is to realize that there is this stream of continuous commentary in their minds. And that is the thing. Oh, that's interesting.

That's a thought, of course. But before the thought, that's interesting. There's the recognition.

It's the voice in the head. And the recognition is not the voice in the head, although you might say it after the recognition. But in the moment of recognizing there's a voice in the head, that's not a thought.

The recognition of thought is not a thought. The recognition of thought comes through awareness or presence. And awareness or presence is the higher consciousness, the arising new consciousness.

Wow. So that is really the meaning of spiritual awakening. By the way, in this first half of our gathering, I will be talking more about it.

In the second half, we will do more experiential. But even while I talk about it here, I would hope that if it works for you, there's already also an experiential realization of what it is I'm talking about. So there's the voice.

There's the voice in the head. And people say things like, I think. They don't think, because thinking is not a voluntary action for them.

So it's a delusion to even say, I think. You don't think. You are being thought by thought.

You are created by thought. There's that energy field. It's amazing.

So the master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup? Now that's a huge demand. If I'm full of clutter, mental clutter, how am I going to empty my cup?

I would immediately be enlightened if I could empty my cup. But the teaching points to something. It points to the word empty.

And that's interesting. That is an important word in Buddhism. And I don't think it's a good translation.

Who first came up with it? I don't know. In the 19th century, the Europeans started to translate ancient texts from Sanskrit.

And one person came up with a translation, probably of the Sanskrit terms sunyata, and translated it as emptiness. That doesn't sound so nice. It sounds like something missing or something like that.

So I have an alternative translation for the Buddhist term emptiness. So that empty is an important word. So remember, the Zen master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup?

Empty. Emptiness, my alternative translation for that is spaciousness. Spaciousness is a dimension of consciousness in you.

And that is what we could call the spiritual dimension of consciousness, the deeper or the higher consciousness, just words, doesn't matter. And that is, in every human, it's there. Many don't know that it's there because the clutter is so dense that they have no realization of the underlying spaciousness.

And that is why I say, in millions of humans, that is still a dormant faculty, so to speak. So the most important realization in your life, much more important than what you have achieved on the level of the world, whether your life in worldly terms is regarded as a huge success or a dismal failure, or for most of you, probably something in between. That's normal.

Sometimes you fail. Sometimes you succeed. Sometimes you move from gaining, losing, high, low, up and down.

That's the identity for most. So the clutter of your mind is there, but there are moments in your life when you become aware of something spacious underneath it. But you may not call it that.

You may not call it anything. It may arise, for example, in many humans who may never have heard of anything spiritual. They're still out there.

They don't know that a little bit of that is in them. But they don't know it. Little glances come occasionally into their lives of that dimension.

It's not enough to actually say that the spiritual dimension has awakened in them, but little flashes come up now and then into their lives. And that is enough. Those little flashes from that dimension come into their lives, and that is enough to keep many people sane.

And those flashes can come when they're... You might think when you go out into nature and you see something extraordinarily beautiful like a sunset, for a moment you go, ah, or the vastness of the ocean, or the sky, or the elements, the wind, the storm, and for a moment you go, ah, and it's a moment of intense aliveness and you feel, and then you may remember that moment a little later, that it was such a beautiful moment. Why was it?

Yes, maybe what you perceived was beautiful, but you felt something in that moment. You felt a heightened sense of aliveness and a deep peace and connectedness with being, so to speak. Why?

Because that moment of sense perception of something vast or beautiful freed you for a moment from the incessant stream of thinking. So the incessant stream of thinking, let's say you see this vast, this incredible sunset or whatever, and for a moment you give it your complete attention, and for a moment you're not thinking about yourself, your problems, your problematic life history, or your even more problematic future. Actually, you're not thinking about anything.

For a moment, the stream of thinking subsides, and it goes, and that is without knowing it, you have a little flash that's come up from that dimension, and then the next moment, it may come up a few days later again, when you look into the eyes of a baby, one year old, maybe just in the street or in a cafe, and the baby looks at you, and the baby is one year old, and the eyes are like the baby's. And you know instinctively that the baby is not thinking about you, because thinking hasn't started yet. The words have not accumulated yet, the thoughts haven't started yet, and yet there's a consciousness there, and you can see very clearly there's an intense consciousness that's looking through those eyes at you, without judging you in any way.

And in that moment, for just a few seconds, you feel so good.

And you say, ahhh.

[Speaker 1] (4:41:43 - 4:42:53)
Why do you feel so good? Because at that moment, the baby liberated you from your stream of thinking. And again, a little bit of spaciousness opened up inside you.

For those few seconds when you looked into the eyes of the baby, you were not thinking. And the baby wasn't thinking. So through the baby, you are able to be in that dimension, and it felt so good.

And yet, spontaneously, they can arise. They're not recognized by people as ultimately spiritual, but they are. And so, many people, there are millions of people who experience those things briefly, but that's enough to give you a sense still of life is worth living.

And then there are others who are so burdened by their minds, they cannot even communicate with the baby. They cannot even perceive the beauty of nature anymore, because their mind is so noisy that they never... There's a total veil.

So they don't look at the baby like... They look at the baby, oh, that's a nice baby. They don't really see the baby.

[Speaker 4] (4:42:54 - 4:42:56)
Immediately, it's labeled.

Keith Baker asks, I have owned the audio version of The Power of Now for over 10 years, but I feel that I still get stuck around my pain body. There must be something very seductive about it, as I feel like I spend a lot of time in negative thoughts, like, what's the point? And, you'll never get past this, so why even try?

Which can lead to feelings of hopelessness and depression. I've read that emotions generate chemical compounds in the brain, which can be addictive, like drugs, so that it's possible to be addicted to negative thinking in a sense, and I think I suffer from that addiction. Do you have any insights as to how to break free and above the summary of the process for dealing with a pain body on page 33 of your book?

Laughter Laughter Laughter Let me just visualize my book. Laughter Laughter It's not working. Laughter Laughter It is true that negative thinking can be very addictive.

From my point of view, it is not caused by the chemical that's generated in the brain, although I do not deny that the chemicals in the body very often reflect certain things that happen on the mental-emotional level, but what comes first, the chicken or the egg? So if you become very angry, of course there are certain chemicals that are released in the body, and if you become peaceful, then they go. The addiction is not in the chemical, although I don't deny that there is a chemical component to emotional states, but it is the addiction to negative thinking, and the addiction to negative thinking is usually connected to the pain body, which is the emotional field that feels fed, fueled by the negative thinking.

So addiction means it feels, on some level, it feels good. If you're addicted to something, on some level, it feels good. If you're addicted to alcohol, the drinking feels good while you drink, not afterwards, but while you drink.

So if you're addicted, to whom does it feel good? Not to you, not to the physical body, because the physical body suffers through it, but to the pain body. This emotion loves to get more of the same energy by generating further negative thinking in your mind, and it feeds on it, because it doesn't get enough food through the drama in your relationship.

Either you don't have one, or your partner doesn't cooperate enough. So how this you are aware of these negative thoughts that you mentioned that are repetitive and happen frequently. You give two examples.

One is you'll never get past this, so why even try? And what's the point? That's another one.

And there are probably others. So you are aware of these thoughts, but it seems that you are not aware in the moment that these thoughts arise. You are aware retrospectively.

After the thoughts, you realize, oh, there was that thought again. The question is whether there's enough presence in you to be aware in the moment, or immediately after, a thought of that kind arises to notice it, to notice also its futility, to notice its repetitiveness, to notice its pointlessness, its untruths, to notice that you don't want it, because you don't want it. When you notice it, you are the awareness, and you as the awareness don't want it.

The pain body wants it. So the awareness has to come in so that you break the link between your pain body and your thought processes. That is the key, is to sever the link between your thought processes and the pain body.

In order to sever the link between those, there needs to be enough awareness, presence. Only the presence can sever the link. The presence comes in, and so you no longer, the emotion is no longer controlling your thought activity.

That's the key. And that's the beginning of the end of that vicious circle that otherwise will take over your life. So, what is needed is for you to be there in the moment these thoughts occur, or immediately after.

And then immediately look at the thought and say, there it's again. And do not believe it. You know, some of you, or many of you might know, Byron Katie's work, and Byron Katie's work questions your thoughts, and that's a wonderful thing, so that you no longer believe every thought that comes into your head.

What's the point if you believe it? So what's the point? It's not working anyway.

Nothing works in my life. It's never, never has anything worked in my life. I remember these thoughts I used to have in my 20s, and even in my teenage years, for a long many years.

One of my favorite thoughts was bad things always happen to me, of course. Bound to happen to me. It's always to me.

Always bad things happen to me. And the strange thing is, they always did. There was one, my early awakening, an awakening, not the real awakening, an episode, an awakening episode I had, which actually to some extent already transformed my life in my teenage years, when I was 17.

And already, in my 20s I was unhappier even, especially the second half, but well, first half too. But But in my teenage years I was still, I had such thoughts like, of course bad things always happen to you. And there was a lot of anger and resentment about life.

And the first awakening came when a woman, we were living in, I was living in Spain with my dad, and a woman left some books with us. She was going back to her country. German books.

And she said, can I leave these with you? I'll pick them up again next year when I come back. She never came back.

And so we had these books. We didn't have many books. I started reading them.

And they were books by a spiritual teacher in a German, Swiss German, or German spiritual teacher. And for the first time I read that your thoughts have something to do with what you create in your life. And that was almost, my mouth opened in astonishment.

And at the time I was teaching myself to type on a typewriter. Of course there were no computers. So I had this old typewriter and I used his texts, the most important parts I copied as part of my typing practice, how your thinking, you manifest through your thinking, you manifest outer reality and how you can change outer reality through changing your thinking.

And I practiced it and it worked. My greatest desire was to leave home. And a year later an opportunity opened up for me to go to England.

And it would never have happened if I had not I know it was the result of practicing changing my thoughts. So that was one wonderful opening. And then I was fine for a while and then gradually I forgot about it and for other reasons more and more happiness, unhappiness, accumulated again.

But that was a temporary breakthrough, amazing realization. So be there when the thoughts happen, recognize they're pointless, they're futile, they're painful, I don't want them, I don't need them, they have no purpose whatsoever. So Byron Katie approaches thoughts by asking, is it true?

So whatever people say is that true? And in most cases say, well, do you know it to be true? There's no point.

Is that true? Yeah, it's true. Do you really know it to be true?

No, I don't know if there's no point or not. So it kind of diffuses the power of thought over you by asking the question it kind of it's like taking the valve out of an inflatable toy by asking, do I really know the thought is and you pull out the stopper and it goes Do I really know this to be true? No, not really.

So You and Krishnamurti both talk about the importance of choiceless awareness directly confronting what is without judgment. You also talk about the primacy of presence as the way to transcend thought the improper use of which is the cause of our suffering. Another teaching respected by many celebrates thought and desire as being responsible for our evolution and the expansion of the universe.

While both teachings have much in common this appears to be an important point of departure that I cannot reconcile. Can you help clarify? Is that the same Jeff who asked the previous question?

Anyway doesn't matter. It's only one consciousness so So there seems to be basically two teachings he says and many people have asked similar question. One is accept what is choiceless awareness, presence the other one is using thought to create to manifest to transform Are they separate?

Can they be reconciled? As I mentioned the other day the two represent the two movements of the universe. One is into creation multiplicity increasing complexity of life forms.

It experiences itself as that It loves to create that's for sure because if you look around even on this planet alone how many life forms there are all perceiving the universe in a different way or saying the universe, the one consciousness perceiving itself through all these different forms in different ways. You could call it a dream, you could call it reality it doesn't matter. These are just words and so and then the universe also wants to know its own source and that's the return movement.

First there's the outbound movement and then there's the return movement. This might correspond to the big bang what scientists call which the universe came out of nothing nobody knows what that is it started from nothing and suddenly it expanded and went into creativity and my forms began to multiply over billions of years and then the story goes some scientists say and even in ancient Hindu mythology and others there's a story that eventually it will come together again and return to the one.

In that case it would be like the in-breath and the out-breath of God the entire universe God breathes out and the and then it all returns back to the source for some reason that we could not even fathom and even if we even start thinking about it what might the reason be you would never find it through the conceptual mind but that seems to correspond to what we do because we have a heart that also goes and we also breathe in and breathe out and we also wake up in the morning and do all our activities and at night time we go and then we go now everything is reflected on every level you are a microcosm of the entire universe so if you observe yourself you observe how the heart works, how the breathing operates how the sleep and wakefulness dreamless sleep dream state the so-called wakeful state which is not that wakeful for most people but here we have similar there may be certainly is a similar pattern everywhere so I'm talking about this because this is how the two movements are reconciled the universe needs both it needs the creativity it needs also the stillness and for humans it's not enough to go unconsciously to the source it's our destiny because it's the destiny of the universe to consciously unite with source, source consciousness and that's why we are here so your life needs to be a balance a dance between creating and not getting lost in your creations what is the motivation for creation if you are already accepting of the present moment if you feel completely at one with the is-ness of the present moment there are two two reasons why you take action here one may be as a response to a situation that requires action so certain situations somebody may need help you can be, you can sit at ease contemplating nature and suddenly there is a human being who says oh help me do you sit there and say no I'm too at ease in the present moment laughter so a situation you respond to whatever the situation the present moment requires you to do you respond from within I was in the lucky position when I was a teenager we lived in I lived with my dad in Spain for a few years and he had gone to Spain to drop out and lead an alternative life and then he ran out of money and then when I was there we had so little money we had not even a fridge I mean almost everybody had a fridge but there in the hot summer in Spain no fridge, no radio no television of course you wouldn't even think of it laughter so basically just the minimum and I wasn't dreadfully unhappy because of that to some extent I accepted it because I was still young enough children find it perhaps easier to accept situations that they go into but normally if I lived in a place like that now I have no fridge I have only basic things to live with, things get I can't buy anything in advance I have to go shopping everyday because everything goes off immediately I'd rather move than be here and you can be you can accept that this is where I am right now it can still be fine but you would start looking I'd like to live somewhere else you see this situation has certain it can have a preference and why not have a preference everybody has a preference some buddhists might talk to you about or some masters say I have no preference whatsoever but they live in an ashram so they'd rather be in an ashram than be on wall street and work there so there must be some preference so this is one thing dealing with responding to situation and having preferences and then taking action another one is bringing about something entirely new into this world and that comes when you are able to become still enough so that you know what the universe or the one consciousness wants you to do if it wants you to do something it may take a while before you know that I lived for years doing relatively little except doing occasional counseling sessions sometimes only two a week and the years passed and I was just continuously just in presence on my bicycle chopping wood carrying water and the years passed and I spent hours in thoughtless awareness in London sitting on a hamstead heath three hours later I go home having a little salad and then having a counseling session at five could live on one person a day one counseling session a day and I wondered, my mind wondered sometimes there must be something else that I'm supposed to do and there was even slight moments of what am I doing here but there was nothing else to do than be present and just be go back to hamstead heath sit there again but there were long periods also of incredibly blissful states that people noticed even people who were not tuned into spirituality particularly say I can feel something, what is that there were great states emanation of peace but I wasn't doing anything it was just that emanation sometimes waiters and waitresses occasionally went to little restaurants they felt something but still nothing, the universe still wasn't telling me what I was supposed to do and I believe the decisive change came perhaps I should have thought of that earlier there was a I was in I had moved out of London to Somerset and lived in Glastonbury the spiritual mecca that attracts all kinds of weird people including myself and just outside there was a village just a few miles out of Glastonbury I would sometimes go there like the English villages they have their ancient church sometimes a thousand years old a few houses around it there was an oak tree I would go to an ancient oak tree in the middle of the field magnificent and I had a wonderful relationship with that tree but that church that was always empty I went into that church and one day I went in and suddenly I had this impulse to say I want acceleration now I want I knew there was something for me to do I clearly demanded acceleration of my life purpose and then I went home again and for maybe three months two or three months nothing happened I'd forgotten about it already and then one day it came it came when I woke up and I suddenly I knew as a thought and a deeper knowing I have to move to the west coast of North America why? I don't know it wasn't just one day it stayed the next day it was still there the next week it was still there and then finally I had to leave couldn't not leave if I had not left I would have died so that was the first step in writing The Power of Now because I needed to be in the energy field of the west coast for some reason to write it and that's how the book started a few weeks after arriving on the west coast it started and then the acceleration it came more and more and then it became so much that I almost wanted to put the brake on but it was the power just grew and grew but it came because for years I went so deep within that eventually the outer movement into creation the outward creation reflected the depths of years of going within into just into stillness and deep into stillness so the outward creation reflected the inward movement it was as powerful out there as it was the power that was in the inward movement so you too will find that the more you align yourself with the essence the stillness within the unconditioned consciousness the more the power will there might be a time gap but hopefully not as many years as in my case there may be a time gap but the power that is within you that you sense when you become aware of yourself as the consciousness then flows through you and that is what creates through you not the little ego anymore so you don't create because you think when I achieve this or that I'm going to be happy and fulfilled no the happiness something deeper than happiness the fulfillment is already here now the true creation cannot come out of a neediness that's egoic creation that doesn't make you happy whatever you create eventually either will not satisfy you or make you unhappy that comes out of a neediness the egoic creation believes I need to attract something to me I need to attract that into my life the non-egoic creation that consciousness uses you as an instrument uses this form as an instrument comes out of the inner fullness so the creation comes from within to without it creates the outward from within rather than needing to attract something from the outside although in language you might sometimes express it that way you might say I attracted this or that person into my life but really it's the other way around you can only create out of this fullness that you sense when you are in touch with presence so if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack of insufficiency, of not enough and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack in order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary focus on the realization of being it's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person so if you focus on

the awakening whether you are conscious at any moment, the important thing in any situation that you encounter in your life is the state of consciousness with which you meet that situation what is the state of consciousness in which you face whatever situation arises in the present moment that determines the next thing, how it's going to go on in the next moment, in the next, how do you what is, how do you perceive react to this, whatever is arising in this moment so whatever is arising in this moment the situation that arises they come and go, different situations arise is always maybe important, but it's of secondary importance, more important is your state of consciousness now if you could remember only that and live that that's really all you need so whenever you encounter any situation realize what's my state of consciousness right now, and there's a situation that perhaps you need to deal with, perhaps you need to take action right now, perhaps there's nothing you can do and you have to leave it alone, we don't know, but what is your state of consciousness in the present moment, vital question and in order to answer that question, and it doesn't really have a conceptual answer because you immediately know whether you are present or not that question can help you become present what is my state of consciousness right now maybe are there certain thoughts that are happening, that are telling you that something is very wrong emotions that are telling you that something is wrong there are certain thoughts that tell you you'd rather be somewhere else very common thing it's so common people don't realize it, some people live almost continuously as if they were longing to be somewhere else, but not here and now to get away from here and now this isn't right there's something not right never, and occasionally it seems right, ah I have arrived whatever it is that makes it right for a moment, it's an illusion I'm in love this is the completion of my life I've fallen in love there's a person who's going to complete me when you go to a restaurant and observe other people sitting at various tables you can tell if they're a couple sitting at a table you can tell whether their relationship is relatively recent they haven't known each other for very long they're in that state that they call falling in love the way they interact is very different from those who have been in a relationship for longer or are married the ones that have just met have fallen in love, they are in a kind of state of delusion you can see it in their eyes everybody's playing their part it's a theatrical performance but they don't know it that comes to an end the latest when they start living together then the essence of all this is awakening the awakened state of consciousness and as I mentioned earlier not surprisingly this term awakening has been used over thousands of years since the time of the Buddha and before the essence of the teaching of the Buddha is to awaken the word Buddha itself means to be awake, the one who is awake the Sanskrit root of the word is to be awake Buddha is not a name of a person it describes a state of consciousness and then go to Jesus and there are quite a few parables that talk about not going to sleep about staying awake and these are not these are parables they are not to be taken literally obviously you cannot tell a person stay awake because eventually of course he will go to sleep so we are just using this analogy of awake and asleep in order to point to something that most humans are not yet familiar with to quote Jesus again from one of the gospels he said and this is quite a bit of what we read about Jesus teaching may not be quite what he said or distorted but a few things I can sense are absolutely literally what he said a few things here and there for example he said and what I say to you I say to all stay awake was that the Buddha or Jesus? no it was Jesus oh no he is not talking about the normal state of wakefulness nobody could stay awake for that long because there is something that pulls you into sleep so we are not talking about that we are using that as an analogy everybody knows what it means to awaken in the morning when you have been asleep which is a particular state of consciousness you are asleep and in sleep you have dream state and you have dreamless sleep you have those two and then you wake

to help us become present and stop thinking to listen better just prior to encounter taking deep breath prior to entering patient room perhaps so what suggestions for cerebral helpers I mentioned, I talked about that a little bit couple of days ago people who use a lot of knowledge in their work with others so if you are a certain type of spiritual healer then you would most probably not apply your conceptual mind in the healing situation but if you are physician then you have to apply your knowledge to the healing situation acquired over many years and so just to remind you what I said a couple of days ago or three days ago you need to be able to still use whatever modality you use your knowledge, apply it but see if you can also have your, the application of your knowledge interspersed with little spaces of aware presence sometimes that happens when you listen to whatever the patient is telling you sometimes it may happen when you look at the patient sometimes it may happen when you place attention on a particular symptom and you might notice before you come to a conclusion about whatever the condition of this patient may be there is a moment when you are looking at the patient or at the presenting symptoms and there is a moment perhaps of three seconds when there is no thinking yet anybody to look at something first, in the first moment of looking at something you are not yet thinking most people miss that completely they don't realize that for the first two or three seconds when you are looking at a patient, let's call him a patient, client, whatever you are looking and before the before the mind begins to, the application of its knowledge to the situation there is a space of just aware looking and that many people do that without knowing it at all it's a natural thing to do, there is a moment of space but if you are aware of that moment of space of looking then it becomes a little deeper and longer it goes and that is you become aware of what already you are doing naturally without knowing it when you become aware of it it actually deepens and it might get a little bit longer instead of looking for three seconds you might look for five seconds before the mind comes in and that's ok, this is what this person needs and I need to do this, this, this and this is interesting whenever you encounter a new situation and not just let's take it beyond the therapeutic situation whenever you encounter a new person, comes into your field of vision, you are walking you are going around a corner a new vista opens up anything somebody is knocking at your door you open the door and then you look who is standing there and for the first two seconds there is no thinking, you need to take it in fast you need to take in the sense perception so naturally in daily life people have the tiniest moments when they are not thinking and there is always something something new arises in your field of consciousness and in the first few moments or in the first moment there is not yet an interpretation of it, there is only an absorbing it if you find you are particularly peaceful or at ease then you find there are longer periods when you are out in nature then you spend longer periods perhaps five seconds looking at a tree before your mind says anything and you go oh, this is so nice be aware in your daily life of the first, whenever something new comes into your field of vision there will be a moment when you are just aware of it and usually the mind tries to come in as quickly as possible because it does not like the specific mind does not like to be in a state of not knowing what is going on it needs to adopt some kind of position towards what you are seeing what you are perceiving so as quickly as possible it wants to come in with some kind of judgment or interpretation I need to know if you become aware of these naturally arising moments of presence that are very very brief then you can they will be there consciously and if they are there consciously they naturally become a little bit longer and there is a deeper awareness so catch those things in your daily life they will be there every time something new arises you need to look first and there is that space before the mind steps in and if you are a deep person so to speak then that space that precedes thinking is longer then you become a deeper human being if that space is incredibly short almost non-existent in some people then they are superficial they might have two PhDs but they are superficial there is no depth to them well there is a depth but it is as if it wasn't there because it's totally covered up so a deep human being has longer spaces of no thinking before that person replies or that person this is a natural thing you can't you can make it into a practice, yes, too as long as the ego doesn't get in there and say I want to appear I want to be a deep person so I'm going to take a long time in answering any questions from now on so in the therapeutic situation also be aware of this so bring in the spaces and observe the spaces that occur naturally in that situation they will be brief in addition to the spaces that occur naturally in the situation bring in these spaces for example when listening to the patient just listen when you may also occasionally be aware of your breathing as you do so any way you can bring in little spaces give fullest attention to whatever you're doing you're preparing something, perhaps you're going to administer something to the patient if you're a physician you're preparing something in that moment there's another opportunity for absolute presence so it's an art to have your knowledge not completely obliterating these little moments of spaciousness in you it's an art that needs to be practiced otherwise you the effect that it has on you after many years of being completely absorbed only in your knowledge when you work with people then you live in a world complete conceptualization and you will no longer be able to see the human being you will see a patient you will not relate to a human being anymore you will relate to a patient or you will only relate to a symptom in a patient and some doctors unfortunately have gone that way because nobody has told them that another way is possible so perhaps many of you have experienced being with certain doctors who actually don't see you as a human, they see you as a patient or they're only interested in the symptom some doctors even hardly look at you, of course there's pressure of work, they have a few minutes to see you but all those physicians and other cerebral as the questioner says practitioners of course obviously you are here because you have already gone beyond that to some extent so you're not totally burdened by the acquired knowledge so that it obliterates everything else interspersed, so what applies to the therapeutic situation applies to anybody's daily life too you must have your daily life interspersed with presence otherwise it's just the human mind dragging you along this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation now what you neglect then and what you continuously overlook is all the small things that actually make up the vast percentage of your life is all the little things that before are relegated to the periphery of your life what are those little things? well whatever, for example things that you handle in your life, things that you pick up and put there and objects around you the world around you walking, breathing looking at the sky looking at a tree seeing, breathing in the air, looking at another human being sensing their deeper aliveness all the little things that constitute life even if you are a so called VIP in the eyes of the world which is pretty meaningless, it's just a narrative and you go from one significant thing to another but all the steps that you take even if you get picked up in a limo as I sometimes do when I go for a talk, the organizers send a limo well a big car, a big room in the back, that's a limo and you can stretch your legs so then it's just very little things you walk to the car and you breathe and then you get in and you sit okay well it's just you're sitting somewhere and breathing and looking you're looking out of the window and then you arrive at a venue and you take a few steps into the car and you sit again and then you walk onto the stage it's all little things and even if you're the pope or the president of a huge corporation or the president of a country, it's still the same life consists of small things all the things that look at just your relationship with objects, this is usually overlooked because every object is treated as a means to an end but if you live in a way that is more present then the objects may still be a means to an end but they are also giving just short attention just picking up a glass there is pleasure in enjoyment in even just looking at a glass and the water and drinking and to realize that most people realize that for the first time if ever when they take certain types of drugs like acid because it amplifies your sense perception and it shuts off your thinking mind and then for the first time you pick up a glass of water and you go oh wow so amazing so amazing I can't believe it and it is and then you drink and the taste is so incredible it's water, it's amazing it's liquid, alive it's alive, it's liquid no I haven't taken acid before coming here and it's just giving it your fullest attention without interference of thinking just awareness and all this the background then to that state of inner peace or contentment is all the aliveness of everything around you when you you pick up something put it in your suitcase pick up something else it's unfolded it's a nice thing to do taking a fruit maybe peeling it or biting into it the present moment in its richness that is usually overlooked because you're looking for something more significant but even the most significant thing, let's say you got the Nobel Prize can come to Oslo I think there's one Nobel Prize that goes from people come to Norway for that's peace so and then you stand on the balcony of that hotel that overlooks the square where the parliament is, I think apparently that's where they go and there you are I have made it you're just standing on a balcony looking and breathing and unless you live through and for a narrative in your mind that you completely believe in and that becomes a conceptual sense of identity I am such and such a person who has achieved this and that and this is all the story and that's me and a big narrative that gives you your sense of identity thought movement and then you feel bigger while you stand on this balcony and then you feel deflated when you step off the balcony or let's say you're a pop star what's the word that a rock star that's millions of people say wow, wouldn't be great especially youngsters wouldn't it be great to be a rock star you can do anything and people and of course they experience this in a magnified way, they are on stage and energy moves through them and then they walk off stage and they are regarded as gods by all these by the audience let me only touch you, I hope nobody does that to me but but let me only may I just touch you they say to the rock star and to the rock star then having in most cases not that much awareness they feel they are more and more like a god because they believe in the narrative that all these unconscious people have mentally manufactured for them and then they begin to believe in it and then there comes the huge conflict or discrepancy when they go off the stage and they sit in the green room or somewhere where am I now and then they have to take drugs because what happens, there's a sense of a lack returns much more strongly than ever before, a sense of lack and insufficiency so I need another fix a drug or I mean to smash up my hotel suite that's what they do rock stars apparently and that enhances their sense of self a little bit more so people many people live for something that's going to happen in the future and of course you may succeed in your endeavors, this is a nice thing but it's not going to give you long-lasting and ultimate fulfillment or tell you who you actually are it's fine to achieve things, especially if they are beneficial but for humanity and the totality on the planet it's lovely to have that but even that doesn't make up your identity

their sense of identity their sense of who they are from the movement of thought in their head thought identifies with certain things as you begin to grow up it identifies with the first possessions that you have the toys it identifies with the name that you are given that's me, your parents tell you that's you then the beginning of identification is the name that becomes the receptacle for all other identifications, possessions toys and you can see how painful it is once you have identified with something when it's taken away from you the child will scream if a toy is taken away because the identification has already happened with something and five minutes later the child might lose interest in the toy completely but when somebody takes it away it is extremely painful because already at that stage the child experiences the beginning of ego identity and how painful it is when the ego identity is injured or something is removed from it it hurts on a psychological level as if you had sometimes even more than a physical injury the pain you would experience with a physical injury and then come, the child goes up more and more identifications come people that you know, relationships you identify with your knowledge you identify with your physical strength your ability, look what I can do you can't do that but I can do that look what I know, I know that but you don't know that let me tell you, this is how it is opinions, you accumulate opinions about this and that and nothing wrong, everybody has opinions but the opinions become part of your sense of self, you identify with these thoughts that constitute those opinions so the opinions which are thought forms are imbued with a sense of self, there is a self in them, a me and you can notice that when somebody starts to question your opinion you get defensive or upset or aggressive or fearful you might even well not you but a very unconscious person may even become violent, physical aggression why? because somebody questioned my opinions even the entire religions that would in the past it's been like that in the middle ages Christianity was like, they will kill you if you disagree with the conventional beliefs what, you don't believe what I believe or we believe okay let's kill you ego, egoic identity with a personal or collective ego they are the two aspects of ego but ego is always identification with something and identification means it gives you your sense of self, this is why for people it is so precious and they hang on to it and they defend it with their life it's that's all they know, that's me and it's a totally normal it's been like that for thousands of years ego in the past ego and in certain societies even nowadays the predominant ego is collective still whereas in western societies ego tends to be more individualized it started of course thousands of years ago with tribal egos, every, you had tribes and you identified with this particular tribe and you were nice to the people in your tribe but not very nice to the people outside of your tribe because there were less than you, all these were primitive rudimentary manifestations of ego but whatever it is, ego means you have a bundle of thoughts, predominant thoughts as I said, opinions likes, dislikes the story of who I am, what people did to me what I did, what I've achieved what I know, what I can do, what I possess and these are all really thought forms and they give you your sense of self, it's very normal and you cannot stop a child from developing that kind of identity it's a normal progression you can't tell a child do not, there's no such thing as possession, don't identify with that toy, it's not yours stop, stop, don't but one can as you begin to awaken you begin to see in yourself that you carry an ego you might see for example, that you become defensive or when somebody disagrees with your opinions you can even have an ego around the city you live in, the team sports team that you identify with, these are rudimentary ego forms if you have little else, you can a huge part of the identity can be your football team and then the others are your enemies who identify with another football team and then you fight it out on Sunday afternoons so you have different manifestations of ego but it's ego, it's a sense of self, you can have a spiritual ego some of you might remember that before you went beyond that you had a spiritual ego and spiritual ego means you have a sense of self that begins to form in your head, a self image of yourself as a more spiritual person than most others very subtle ego you can have an ego of yourself as egoless a self image that says I am one of the most egoless humans on the planet and it's hidden it doesn't necessarily explicitly say I am the most egoless person on the planet well it might do but usually it's more hidden, it's implied you look down on others who still have their egos whereas I I'm free of it and these are more subtle forms, it's this ego, it's more a more subtle form of ego than the person who gets into a fight against the opposing fans of the other football team soccer team whatever it is but it's the same the same mechanism is behind it and ego also you always recognize it when that it compares itself with others the moment you meet somebody or even just you see somebody in the street the ego goes into comparison mode and usually the result of comparison mode of the ego is it comes to the conclusion that you are either inferior or superior to the other of course it wants to be superior if it can but some it just doesn't work sometimes so the ego tends to select the thing that is most that is your strong point that's what it will then focus on in my case for example the ego that I could not develop an ego around a strong physical physique a person who is good at sports or whatever because I was a little guy who got bullied at school so the ego said what can I do what can I identify with and wasn't particularly good looking so it couldn't say but I'm better looking than you ok that doesn't work either so eventually it sought refuge in trying to be more knowledgeable and educated than others so I started reading books and then in discussions I could suddenly show off my knowledge and show that you don't know that let me tell you about that ok that worked for a while physical appearance is a very common thing for comparison do I look better than the other woman, man whatever it is and then you look in the mirror and this is greatly enhanced these days by the technology that's available to us through facebook and selfies the original in Greek mythology the original story that shows the development, the beginning of ego was in the midst of Narcissus who was a young man of course at that time there were no mirrors but he happened to look into a pool of water one day this young man and he saw that he was so beautiful and he fell in love with himself that's where the word narcissism comes from so he fell in love with himself, there was an image of himself that he saw there, he fell in love with the image which to me means he identified with the image this is a pictorial representation of an inner process the image formation that gives you your sense of self which is ego so that was the beginning of Narcissus now you don't need a pool of water anymore you have not only mirrors more importantly you have your smartphone and you can go and then you send it out into the world you're not confined anymore to one person looking at you or two people you send it out into the world and hundreds of people suddenly see you and then you're waiting for your egoic feedback which usually comes in the form of little comments like cool I like it and if it's not you, you take a picture of the rest, you're in a restaurant and you're eating this lovely meal I am eating this meal me look how great this meal is that I am eating and of course many people who look at other people's posts feel diminished a little bit because their life is so interesting and then what you do, you have to also pretend that your life is interesting and select all those things that make your life look interesting in other words, and this especially young people, you begin to your life merges with a fiction a fictional image which is available to the public and you don't know it this is an extension of egoic identity that has become possible through technology very seductive but also extremely limiting it's a huge trap the ego of course is never satisfied not for long, it always is in a seeking mode because it doesn't feel fulfilled, it doesn't feel I am enough, it doesn't, it feels I am lacking in something which may be either money or knowledge or looks or relationship significant relationship all kinds of things I'm lacking in, not enough it's in seeking mode but as it's pointed out in this book called The Cause in Miracles it says the dictum of the ego is seek but do not find so it's always seeking because it's always seeking for the next thing which implies the future is extremely important for the ego it looks to the next thing there's a continuous reaching out an inability to be present here and now that's all part of the unconsciousness that I call unconsciousness is in this terminology complete identification with the mind and this is where the ego resides, it resides in your mind it is a mental formation, it is a kind of fiction that every human being creates for themselves and of course you get a lot of feedback the particular fiction that you create for yourself depends to a large extent on the culture that you grew up in the people you grew up with they will tell you who you are as a child and then you become conditioned by your surroundings, the surrounding culture and your family and so on this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation I only have one thing to show you or teach you, it's not teaching teaching would mean giving knowledge to your mind so the only real reason is to find the spaciousness within who you are beyond the person what could be more important than that all the ancient teachings pointed to it using different words and yet humans only a few people here and there never ever got it the history of humanity but now it's happening on a wider scale thank you I'm grateful for that so now let's just experience a little bit spaciousness for example now don't need to think here's the space here's the thinking and here's the space some people find it helpful to be aware of their breathing one conscious breath a breath consists of the in breath and the out breath and a conscious breath means as you breathe in and out your awareness is there on the breath breath is formless, relatively formless so it gets you closer to the formless consciousness to be aware of your breath this is the ancient breath meditation but I often say just one conscious breath brings some space or helps you realize some space inside you your attention follows the breath as it moves into the body and out and while it does that you are not thinking, you can't because then you are not following the breath with your attention and while you are following the breath with your attention in and out you become spacious so one conscious breath is a mini meditation nobody can tell me that they don't have time during the day to take one conscious breath from time to time everybody has time for that the busiest person and two is even better let's make it three and you went to a doctor for physical treatment not a single question about what about, how do you feel what is your mental state your emotional state, how do you feel no question just look at the symptoms and those traditional doctors would say oh no, there is no connection first question here is does the mind create a physical problem to distract us from emotional pain it is often the case that emotional pain that is not recognized when there is not enough awareness the emotional pain exists beneath your level of awareness and it can come out as certain kinds of reactivity in daily life so you are taken over by reactions to certain things that trigger that type of emotional pain that is in you that you are completely unaware of and emotional pain that is in total unawareness can very easily become a physical symptom it is transferred into the physical realm any kind of prolonged negative mental states which produce corresponding negative emotions affect the functioning of the physical organism and even research has been done on this and been confirmed that negative states mental emotional states affect in the long term affect the physical organism you can verify it for yourself if you are in a state of anxiety, thinking thoughts thoughts that create anxiety fearful thoughts usually not about the present moment the present moment is fine but about some imagined future moment then that affects the body, your breathing becomes shallow, your heart beat increases your entire energy field contracts all kinds of physical symptoms appear so there is no doubt that what goes on in the mind affects the body and again for a long time doctors completely ignored that, they actually denied it and you went to a doctor for physical treatment not a single question about what about, how do you feel what is your mental state your emotional state, how do you feel no question just look at the symptoms and those traditional doctors would say oh no, there is no connection of course there is you can teach your child that there is a connection between their mind and the body and immediately think of imagine you are biting into a lemon close your eyes and imagine you are biting into a lemon and taste it and immediately you feel saliva accumulating in your mouth and there is no lemon there was just the thought of a lemon, so the thought creates a physical response in the body it's just a tiny example and then we have another thing that is totally almost completely ignored by conventional mainstream medicine, the so called placebo effect and all the drug companies when they test their drugs a certain number of test subjects when the drugs are given to humans are just sugar pills or whatever, they are placebos, they contain nothing but the test subject is not told the test subject is told that this is a new powerful drug and always there is a significant percentage of people who become cured or if not cured whose symptoms improve significantly after taking these placebo pills, in all clinical trials they have these results, not all of them, and sometimes the placebo is very close to helps as many people as the actual new powerful drug but this is dismissed, oh this is a placebo, so let's not look at that, because we are only interested in what this drug does, so all these placebo results are discarded and nobody seems to really ask, wow there is the most powerful healing agent here people heal themselves if they believe that they are being healed but they have to believe it completely, so you can see how powerful the mind how powerfully the mind can impact the body and if we could explore a little bit more what placebo means and whether this could become in some way replace conventional replace the taking of drugs and how to do that of course that moves into the realm of what spiritual healing but there are vast possibilities there for healing there are other factors that can bring about disease, not all diseases are caused by mental negativity or dysfunctional thinking anger sadness and so on all kinds of negative emotions, envy regret, guilt they all impact the body there are other factors that we live in a world that is full of poisonous substances created by the clever human mind, so we ingest poisonous substances all the time and there are all kinds of we are bombarded by all kinds of man-made radiations there may be certain genetic factors also but the fact remains that there is a very strong correlation between how well the physical vehicle functions and how harmonious or disharmonious the mind operates so it's everybody's responsibility of course to become aware of their the negativity that they harbor inside and of course as part of this teaching is to recognize your identification with thinking which creates those structures and you step out of that and many people will experience an improvement in their health surrender and presence often is also associated with the complete healing of physical symptoms surrender here means a space of acceptance of what is not acceptance of a disease there's a huge difference between accepting a disease which is not a good thing but accepting what is in the present moment what's the difference the disease is a conceptual form, a concept in the mind whatever it may be, let's say it's a serious disease multiple sclerosis do I have to accept that I've been diagnosed with multiple sclerosis and I need to accept that I have this disease called multiple sclerosis no, that's a concept all when we talk of acceptance all that is required is accepting whatever arises at this moment so if the something arises at this moment that you can feel that it's some form of disability or pain or weakness that's what you surrender to not an idea of illness just what arises at this moment and when you bring that surrender to it, then often healing happens because the energy of presence burns up one could say a large amount of karma of old stuff inside you, whether physical physical manifestations of it or mental or emotional manifestations in the presence of presence the past gets burned up so often surrender makes healing much easier, it makes it easier for the body to heal itself because healing no doctor heals you when healing happens it's always the intelligence that inhabits the body produces the healing and that can function more powerfully when you surrender to life and surrender to life is in the now so never to the idea of illness but just what is now

I wrote you a note in which I explained a dark night of the soul experience that I'd had a number of years ago in which really culminated in a catastrophic breakdown of sorts for me maybe sort of similar to what I read in your book The Power of Now and during that there was a cathartic release I was in the fetal position on the floor crying frankly and there was an utter and complete surrender this is sort of a humbling story but after that happened I was sitting in an empty room in a chair and there was this unbelievable post cathartic stillness that took over me and there was complete silence and then the strangest thing started happening I began witnessing my thoughts and as I witnessed my thoughts I had this unbelievably simple awareness that if I'm witnessing my thoughts, what am I?

and that completely changed my life. I can't even begin to tell you what happened after that awareness happened and then one thing led to another and then there was a point where I started realizing that what I am I couldn't find a boundary for and so I was sort of interested because in your book you talked about this in The Power of Now about the dark night of the soul experience but I'm sort of wondering about your journey from there through the process of realizing that this awareness that I am is not personal it's intimate but it's not personal and that seems to be the toughest part of it all to really get a handle on so if you could walk me through that I would appreciate it

It seems that I will comment but the most important thing it seems that what your mind is trying to do is to understand awareness and you can't really the mind can't so you cannot really come to a satisfying conclusion about the nature of awareness it's only awareness itself really in awareness awareness is known but awareness as an object or thought is not it and that's why the Tao Te Ching starts with the line the Tao that can be spoken of is not the true Tao so all that language can do is use pointers to point you in the direction of awareness or language can point out the obstacles, the likely or possible obstacles in yourself to the state of awareness so that these two kinds of pointers, one is points, the pointers to the moon awareness being the moon so the words there's only this moment and so on, it all points to the same whatever I talk about is really they're all pointers they're either pointers towards awareness or they are pointers that look at the obstacles that may arise in yourself in a human being so that you recognize them when they happen so that the obstacles in the form of certain mind patterns don't take you over and obscure the arising awareness, but once awareness has arisen the mind is not useful anymore and you don't need further pointers in order to, the mind will continue wanting to understand a bit more about awareness but really this is where conceptual understanding comes to an end and I can call awareness personal and I can call it impersonal, it's not personal in the usual sense everybody everybody has a certain sense of I'll just say a few words about it but we're not trying to understand awareness we can't everybody has a sense of I-ness of identity everybody has the sense of him or herself as a hard to describe the sense of I now usually the sense of I is mixed up with certain mind movements thought patterns which you could also call stories they're thought patterns that hang together as a story and so your sense of I gets mixed up with a story thoughts in your mind and that is called the personal sense of self but the story really is nothing they're just thought forms, temporary thought forms, the real sense of I is the awareness inside the thought forms without which the thought forms could not even be there so the true sense of I is the awareness that got mixed up with the story or the thoughts so most people have a sense of identity that is of that mixed kind where consciousness or awareness has become entangled in thinking and then people only know themselves through thinking, they believe they are what their mind tells them they are and their memories and so on and that's called the personal sense of self but even there the real, the substance behind it and in it is the consciousness, it's not the story, that's where the sense of the preciousness that everybody feels that I am and where the mind says I don't want to lose that, I don't want to die this is what people are scared of they might lose themselves, they might lose that preciousness, everybody deep down feels that preciousness inside even people who are unhappy they're still here, they haven't jumped off the bridge yet they feel a preciousness still inside, hiding somewhere and that that preciousness is consciousness itself, it's not your story now that consciousness is not personal it really only becomes personal when it gets mixed up with memories and a story or expectations and memories so if you're dis- what happened to you then was the disentanglement happens spontaneously and so there was the realization of that which is there when consciousness is no longer entangled in form because the consciousness is the formless it's the unconditioned consciousness so that is called then self-realization in some traditions or it's called awakening in other traditions whatever you call it that's the realization of the formless essence of who you are and so the mind of course continues but there's no longer investment in it, some consciousness still flows into mind activity but the important thing is there is no longer a self in the mind activity and so because the self is realized as essentially formless and timeless so that's a beautiful thing now, the fact that mind activity still continues means that occasionally the mind is wandering about consciousness and awareness and so the mind needs to then see that it is futile and since there's no self in it anymore it won't be too difficult the mind just needs to be told that it cannot you cannot come to any kind of satisfying or satisfactory conclusion about the nature of awareness or further conceptual understanding of what awareness is all about the mind would like that but there's a vastness in awareness and awareness begins to operate through your mind without needing your mind to understand more about it, because that's what the mind always says, I need to understand more you can understand a lot more about the things of this world, there's many things that you can still study, everybody can, there are many books you can still read things you can still learn there's always the possibility of acquiring more in this world, it's fine nothing wrong with that but as far as self-realization is concerned, there's no more, there may be a deepening or the aware state may express itself more and more fully through your mind your mind may have your mind becoming the servant of awareness can take a bit of adjustment from a self-serving mind to becoming aligned with the aware state may take a while, I'm speaking from my own experience not that I ever could explain awareness, you can't explain emptiness but the ability to say things, to point to give pointers to other people the ability to understand even what had happened to me when the shift happened that took several years to understand for example to understand that my mind had mind activity had become reduced after the shift by perhaps 80% in other words, I was spending long stretches from the external point of view of time I was spending long stretches in the timeless paradox paradox here because you have the outer and the inner and this was the reason why I felt so peaceful but I didn't know that my mind wasn't saying much anymore because it wasn't saying, I'm not saying much and all I knew was there was a deep sense of peace and aliveness and I was looking through, perceiving things through the sense of peace and aliveness so that even the traffic became peaceful and there was nothing wrong with the traffic and there was, or whatever and things that before I had resented having to live in the, I had little money, so living in a little room which in England is called a bedsitter where you have a little stove in a corner and then you have your bed and you have a seating area and then you share the bathroom with I think eight or nine people in different rooms and so before I didn't like where I was and suddenly it was great, it was fine because there was this beautiful light shining through the window the little objects on the table were full of aliveness and even waiting for the bathroom wasn't that problematic anymore except occasionally I had developed constipation because of the waiting but that in itself wasn't a problem either it was the same, or I had complained about going, having to go by tube or underground which is the subway in London can be very unpleasant at times and again there were blissful states traveling in the subway waiting for the train wow but it wasn't in the world of form, the form was perceived through the awareness but understanding, very little all I could have said suddenly I'm so peaceful, I don't know what happened that was all, that was my limit for two years approximately that was the limit of my understanding and so that's how it is, so what does take then perhaps time from our external viewpoint is the alignment of your mind with the aware state and then gradually it can flow into the mind structures and you can speak about opening yourself up to awareness and many other things pointers will arise that may be helpful for others you may write a book but not too soon it's often the case that people write books too soon laughter laughter laughter so just let it mature and the one thing that you won't get much further in this conceptual understanding of awareness itself

and that's the answer

[Speaker 7] (6:27:32 - 6:27:33)
laughter

this ability to

look at things or listen to things or with other senses smell taste, touch as the awareness rather than the interpreting mind practice that in your daily life it's a primordial spiritual practice if that's your only spiritual practice it would be quite enough so innocent perception requires awareness it requires an alertness in the background of your perception without the alertness thinking will always overpower you the alertness keeps thinking at bay you remember the story I wrote about in the New Earth it's an ancient Zen story where the disciple and the Zen master are walking on a long journey through the mountains and then they stop for a little picnic and then the disciple who is still having problems understanding what Zen is all about he's only been there for 10 years laughter he asks the master I don't quite get it yet how do I enter Zen, meaning how do I enter the state of consciousness that is Zen, how do I and the master looks at him and says can you hear the sound of that mountain stream and the disciple no, I can't hear it the master says see if you can listen, see if you can hear it and that this is the point of the master to the disciple to to become more alert the master associates the alertness with the auditory perception there so the alertness flows into the auditory perception and as the master tells him you have to listen more carefully to hear that mountain stream and then the disciple at that moment the alertness, the awareness in the disciple rises and he goes and of course at that very moment while he's in that intense listening he's no longer thinking or trying to figure out what Zen is all about he's just and then he can hear in the far distance there's a tiny mountain stream that makes a sound and suddenly he can hear it and he says yes I can hear it and the master says that's it enter Zen from there

this is a practical to show by means of practical example what that means, that alertness Jesus talks about it too, he says be so awake as if you were he gives the parable of a servant waiting for the master he doesn't know when the master comes he may come in very silently so you have to be alert don't go to sleep, be alert and wait for the master so the servant is sitting in that house the door maybe is in my version of the story the servant is on the upper floor and the master could come in any moment the master is very quiet so you go so the servant basically would be in continuous presence, otherwise he might miss the master again it's an example to show what that state of consciousness is, again using the analogy with associating awareness with the auditory perception you can associate it with other perceptions too, or with all perception or with no perception and there's no stress or strain in that alertness, there isn't a willfulness behind it, that's not it, you can't hold your breath and make yourself be more alert you can't I still can't hear the mountain stream you have to it's a relaxed alertness I'll sometimes use the expression vibrational frequency and there is a truth behind it, whether or not it's scientific I don't care by the way I can sense when, because I also experience fluctuations there's always a certain alertness in the background but sometimes there's an increase in alertness and sometimes it's just, it recedes it's in the background the awareness, and then the awareness the light gets lit, like a dimmer switch it goes and then it goes and it's still there according to the situation now the the so-called enlightened state which is the destiny of each human to reach although many won't reach it in this lifetime but that's okay that would mean there's a continuous background awareness Indian continuous and you many of you already have it sporadically and there may be some of you who already have it continuously in the background the only reason why you're here, because it's enjoyable but there's no point in asking oh, when is it going to be continuous for me? irrelevant question the only true question is is it there now?

that's the only place where it can be now whether it's going to be there ten minutes from now, who knows is it going to be there next week when I get home? who knows but when you get home it's now so the only relevant question is am I aware now? and if you even remember to ask that question which is a powerful pointer to awareness very easily you can step from the question which is still a thought I call it a pointer certain thoughts are pointers that point beyond thought so that says, am I aware now?

it's a powerful pointer and after that you're yes that can immediately bring you to that alert heightened alertness am I aware now? let me just check and that checking creates a rise in the vibrational frequency you can feel that and you can observe you can learn to observe in people it's not judgmental, it's a simple fact you can look at a person and to some extent you can see what degree of awareness is there there are many humans who might never have heard of any spiritual teaching who have some awareness in their life they don't know what it is but it's there I can very often I don't like to be stopped and recognized in the street all the time but it does happen a lot and when it happens it's lovely so it's a paradox I try to wear sometimes sunglasses and a baseball cap a funny incident I was in a supermarket and I was wearing dark sunglasses and a baseball cap and just looking at the shelves and a man came up to me and said Hi Ekan Mir, shake your hands do people recognize you a lot? now I am saying this is quite but not infrequently I know a few seconds I look at a person a few seconds before they recognize me I recognize them I've never seen them before but I recognize them I know there is a fairly strong presence there and then I know this person and this is not a thought it's just a realization this person is going to recognize me and most of the time

as you perceive it goes through the filter of your mental emotional conditioning from the past the non-conceptual dimension of consciousness as we could call it is already emerging in most of you and that is about the most important thing that could happen in a person's life which is the emergence of a deeper dimension of consciousness I would say that this is what Jesus referred to when he was talking to Mary in the parable of Mary and Martha and just to quote one brief sentence of just a few words he said to Martha only one thing is needed only one thing is needed my translation of that is there is only one thing in life that is of absolute importance and everything else may also be important but it is of relative importance so all the things that happen in your life and in the world may all be important some more important than others, your entire life situation everybody has one and everybody's life situation is somewhat if not very problematic you know, you're not the only one so there's that there is all the things that happen your financial situation, your health situation your relationship situation your work situation, your living situation yes these things matter relatively speaking, but there's one thing that is more important that matters absolutely and that is your state of consciousness and whether or not you have awakened to what we could call it sounds a little abstract but it's not, we could call the transcendent dimension of consciousness in you the transcendent dimension of consciousness now, I'm not going to immediately define what that means because actually it cannot be defined it can be pointed to, this is what these words are for but these words are not a substitute for it the words point famous phrase in Buddhism it's the finger pointing to the moon but the finger is not the moon so there's nothing that I say tonight that you need to believe on a conceptual level I'm not asking you to believe anything whatsoever there is what I sometimes call the two levels of consciousness the conceptual I sometimes call that object consciousness these are all the things that happen in your perceptual field and in your mental field thoughts, thinking emotions, sense perceptions things arise things pass away things come and go sense perceptions, ideas, thoughts opinions, feelings, emotions all belong to object consciousness one object after another happens you perceive things and then thought objects arise it's continuously a stream of thoughts

for most people the stream of thoughts is such a gravitational pull that they get completely dragged along by this continuously proliferating stream of mental activity I sometimes call it the voice in the head it never stops speaking it continuously comments on where you are, what you are doing or takes you somewhere completely different in the so-called past or the so-called future one thing after another one damn thing after another, to paraphrase Churchill Churchill was talking about history history is one damn thing after another and that's true but for many people their conditioned mind the experience of their conditioned mind is just one damn thing after another because it never leaves you alone it goes so most humans who are not awakened or even awakening are completely trapped in their object consciousness they are confined by it and not only that they are completely identified with all the arising thoughts and emotions that continuously go through their mind and there's no separation between the thoughts and the emotions that accompany the thoughts and you, you don't you're not even there when you're totally identified with the voice in the head you are spiritually speaking asleep or another word for it is unconscious so an unconscious person in ordinary usage, unconscious means of course, you've completely lost, you don't know what's going on and this is unconscious in conventional usage, unconscious means in spiritual usage unconscious means completely and continuously identified with a stream of thinking and the emotions that go with the stream of thinking what does it mean to be identified?

it means you derive your sense of who you are from the stream of thinking every thought is imbued with a sense of self so you're identified it has you in its grasp and therefore if people conventionally say, I think, I think what do you think? as if thinking for most people were a voluntary activity, whereas for most, not you but those who are not awakening yet which is the majority of the population still on the planet for most that is, they are completely identified with the stream of thinking they are spiritually speaking unconscious and that is a terrible thing because then everything that you perceive reality itself, as you perceive it, goes through the filter of your mental emotional conditioning from the past so you never see anything as it is perceive anything clearly and most importantly there is never a sense of inner true inner peace, spaciousness joy sense of aliveness sense of connectedness with something that is deeper than your historical person you are always at the mercy of what goes on out there and the reactive patterns of your mind so you are completely unaware of the possibility of realizing the other dimension of consciousness, which is not object consciousness but space consciousness I call it sometimes space consciousness now, what is space consciousness?

you cannot define it because it's beyond concepts you can know what space consciousness is in this very moment by becoming aware of the gaps between words when I speak I'm just slowing down a little bit so instead of being totally interested in the words you're also interested, although that's probably not the right word you're also giving attention to the empty spaces between the words because they are needed without the spaces there could be no sounds the sound needs the space to exist now that's interesting to be aware of the gaps between words or in this room, in this hall to be aware not only of the objects in this room the objects that make up this room what's in it the bodies, the objects that which confines and defines the room the ceiling, the walls, the floor this is the room you're not only aware of that that would be in this analogy object consciousness you're also aware of the space in this room now the space isn't something that you say oh it's there, or it's there but it is the most important part of this room is the space and it's a wonderful space but you cannot define it it has no actual you can't even say that space exists because exist means to manifest, to stand out exist, x means out, in Latin exist means to be manifested but space doesn't manifest it enables everything to manifest in the physical realm without space these things could not be here, so space is prior to existence space is prior to manifestation and that's very interesting so there is something in you which I sometimes call space consciousness that is prior to who you are as a person your personality and you can know it, not conceptually but immediately and experientially by becoming aware, either of the spaciousness outside of you or becoming aware of spaces between sounds spaces between words now how do you do that? how do you become aware of a space between two words there is no how because it's too simple for how, quite simply there is an attention in you, a field of alert attention and this field of alert attention is aware of the space between words and you notice that silent space what does it mean?

to notice that silent space it means in this brief moment of noticing or noticing the space in this room in this brief moment you're not thinking you're just aware thinking through thinking you cannot be aware of those spaces between words because thinking is object consciousness the space between words takes you to space consciousness so the entire secret of our gathering here of all spirituality is just one thing now amazingly I'm going to talk about this one thing for hours laughter I'm sometimes asked and I think I even wrote it somewhere what is the most effective spiritual practice in daily life or if I only had one spiritual practice what would it be?

what would be the most highly recommended spiritual practice and I would say observe your breath that would if you spent a lot of time in your spare moments and so on that would bring about an enormous influx of presence into your life and so that's very quite simple another thing that happens as you follow the breath with your attention your attention moves out of the mind into the body and as the breath enters the body you also become aware almost inevitably of the inner energy field of the body I hope that well I don't hope anything but it would be great if as I talk about this you could feel what it is that I'm talking about so if I'm talking about verify in this moment what it is that I'm talking about when I say, when I talk about follow your breath then follow your breath you can still listen and be aware of your breathing at the same time it's quite pleasant and then you can sense as the breath moves in there's also a sense of aliveness in your body hard to describe you feel that the body is alive it may start with the area here because that's where the breath moves and if you follow the breath with your attention your attention may move a little deeper than the actual breath it may move into the abdomen so you become aware of an energy field down here and so the abdomen falls and rises

as you breathe in it rises and then it shrinks and you feel at first a very subtle

feeling of energy that pervades the inner we call it the inner body inner body awareness and there's an energy field that then it's not just here it pervades your arms and legs it's everywhere you can feel that the body is actually alive, you feel the life of the body from the inside so what is that? it is the animating presence in the body it is that the organizing principle that in a miraculous way keeps the body alive every moment, coordinating countless highly complicated functions of the body all the organs the chemical laboratories the unbelievable complexity there's an intelligence behind it that temporarily organizes the molecules and atoms in that way you are not doing it, it's happening so you you connect with that intelligence it becomes conscious and you feel you're not only aware of your breathing you're also aware of the entire inner body and it's not really the body it's something that's beyond the body it's a portal into something deeper but let's call it inner body it's invisible and so breath awareness if it can lead you into and become combined with inner body awareness and that's a beautiful, very powerful meditation that can take you out of any turmoil situation even if you several times you lose yourself in the mind again you bring it back to the breath and body and as you sit here and listen to me you may be able to be aware not only of auditory perception which is the words you're hearing but at the same time you're aware of the inner body so what is that it is the presence that pervades the entire body, presence isn't just a head phenomenon, presence is experienced with the entire body and then after as it becomes more deeper and more intense presence you're almost you begin to feel also that you are surrounded by a presence, that's a strange thing and that the space that is around you, we mentioned space briefly yesterday the space that is around you is something very, very mysterious very mysterious and you can sense that there is this is a mystical thing I'm saying, no you don't need to believe it, you can sense that that space that's all around you is there, there's something to it that you cannot define it's not just nothing well it is nothing in the sense that it is no thing it is not a thing it is not an object but it's not just nothing there is a presence all around you and so don't want to talk about it too much it becomes too mystical for many people, but I'm suggesting this as to experience first of all the inner the aliveness of the inner, the presence that pervades the inner body, that is the inner body and then you can sense that the world around you also is becoming more alive especially the space around you, actually there is an alive presence in which you live that surrounds you and that presence is both within and without and when you sit in your room or here now you sense this invisible presence all around you what did Ralph Waldo Emerson the American, I would say spiritual teacher, 19th century he said we live in the lap of immense intelligence great great teacher by the way I highly recommend Emerson we live in the lap of immense intelligence we are surrounded by this intense this vast intelligence and if you know that there is a difference between just not knowing it and living completely unconsciously as a little misperceiving yourself as an entity a separate entity there is me and there is the rest of the universe no you don't end here you are you are extended into the vastness of the universe in this dimension of space so because there is outer space and there is inner space and first you become aware of that inner space when thinking subsides you become aware of that spaciousness within consciousness without the content of consciousness just the space you could describe it as like a room and you remove all the objects in the room and all that remains is the space that is the equivalent of when you come to a cessation of thinking but you are not falling asleep at all to stop thinking here means to rise above thinking we are not talking about falling below thinking falling below thinking you do that every night when you go to sleep or when you here when you are suffering from serious dead lag you begin to fall below thinking or when you drink alcohol the tendency is for you to take you below thinking or any most other substances I haven't tried all that I have tried very few substances you cannot pronounce doesn't on all substances but some substances take you below thinking it can be very comfortable for a while at least you're not being tortured by your mind for a while and so you puff away so good feel so good what are your problems I don't remember what my problems are it's and it's also funny sometimes falling below could be mistaken for a state of enlightenment but then this is not the way we are going we're not regressing although

there is a desire for in every human being to become free of the self an unconscious desire in every human being to become free of the self what the Buddha calls the self the egoic entity the problem making heavy person personality that heaviness I want to be free of that there's so much suffering that goes with it want to be free and so the drug taking these days is enormous in youngsters a terrible epidemic of drug taking this and because the truth is not being taught vital knowledge is we live in a society in a civilization the entire global civilization almost totally ignorant of what really matters we have knowledge a lot of knowledge but absolutely no knowing totally ignorant of what matters and has lost touch with the with the source God if you like don't

[Speaker 1] (7:06:34 - 7:06:38)
always people misunderstand what that is

[Speaker 4] (7:06:38 - 7:07:09)
so presence within and without when I grew up

was a Methodist teaching and was sort of dry yet there was this prayer Lord forgive us our trespasses and forgive us those who trespass against us and when you open the door last time to the course of miracles and I came across that principle of the forgiveness and I had a question on that what is forgiveness is it different from compassion is it different from the Buddhist concept of bodhicitta and I don't know thank you thank you and again it comes back to the state of connectedness with being it's only from that state of connectedness with a deeper dimension of who you are from there it becomes easier to forgive because forgive means there was something that was done on the level of form by one life form to you perhaps another life form pain was inflicted or whatever it may be treat whatever the transgression is and it's only from there that you can see the relative nature of what was done because you are in touch with a space within you that was never hurt by that that dimension in you is beyond what can be injured it's only the form can be injured the psychological form somebody might have insulted you deeply the psychological form of who you are can be can feel pain or the physical form of who you are can feel pain and somebody inflicted that out of unconsciousness then recognizing the first step in forgiving is to recognize that this was an act of unconsciousness and you do not equate what this person did with who that person is and it's only from the place of connectedness with being that you can say no longer hold a grievance about that because you are in touch with that inside you that is beyond what can be injured if you are not in touch with that space then you're still it's hard to forgive forgiving means not to harbor grievance or resentment or any negative feeling about it and really that's only possible when you are connected with the formless in yourself as Cause and Miracle says nothing real can be threatened nothing unreal exists herein lies the peace of God nothing real can be threatened means what is ultimately real cannot be threatened but what is ultimately real is not the form it's that which is deeper than the form that cannot be threatened nothing real can be threatened nothing unreal ultimately exists it just seems to herein lies the peace of God means in the knowing of that lies the peace of God but it needs to be not conceptual knowing but a knowing on the level of the depth of your being and then from there you can look at anything anybody did to you and say it's almost as if it didn't happen for a while, for example I harbored grievances against my father for many years because he was he suffered from enormous amount of bottled up anger and living with him as a child was like living with a powder keg or an unexploded bomb somewhere in the house and everybody knew that at any moment this slightest thing somebody said and usually it was my mother the slightest thing somebody said and this bomb would explode and the entire house would be filled with destructive energy and for a sensitive child, and any child is sensitive a young child, it's a terrible thing to live in constant anguish and an explosion could be happening at any moment whenever he's in the house so I had the ambivalent feelings of fearing his return home after work and wanting him to come home divided and that was expressed once in a dream that I had as a child and in the dream I had cut my father up into little pieces and put in a plastic or some kind of sack and hidden under the bed and after I had done that in the dream, my father arrived home and I greeted him and loved him and of course all this resulted even after, when I was an adult already, resulted in quite a bit of grievance towards him because my childhood was fearful and unpleasant as a result and it was only when a transformation happened inside me and there was suddenly that deep inner peace that I realized he did what he did according to the way in which life had conditioned him he had, when he was a child, he had an enormous amount of resentment against his family because of, and of course the story can go on many generations he was the seventh child his father died when he was fifteen and they took him out of the school they had to pay for school, boarding school they took him out of boarding school because they said we can't afford it anymore, but his sisters were still kept in boarding school and then he had to do menial jobs and every day his anger was growing and growing and growing he carried it the rest of his life there was not enough consciousness in him to disidentify from the anger he was the anger was using him it lived in him as an energy field and he could come up any time he was as much a victim as I was and I saw that after I had gone through the transformation and found inner peace I could see that he did he was a victim of his own circumstances, there was not enough consciousness in him to see what he was doing and immediately forgiveness happened, I didn't even have to say I have to try to forgive he never did, it was as if he had never done anything to me because basically he hadn't he wasn't even there, there was only the unconsciousness in him acting up and then as he grew older some of that anger dissipated remnants of it remained he also came into touch with some spiritual teachings especially the power of now that helped to some extent and so his ego grew less not didn't quite disappear but it grew less when I was a child his ego was gigantic and it was continuously fueled by anger and an angry ego is something it's the the incredible hulk that and that so forgiveness happened naturally and very often you see that when an injury happens very often there's a mental judgment of a situation and actually beyond that mental judgment not that much happened, let's take a simple example um you arrange to meet somebody or somebody he says I'm going to help you with your moving, I'm going to help you move house, I'll be there at five o'clock to help you move with my car and he doesn't turn up and that just is as it is, now your mind then comes in and says he let me down he or he betrayed me or he was whatever the judgment of the mind is uh and it is very often it is the judgment of the situation that creates the emotion that feels injured if you can just be with oh he you said he would come but he didn't turn up, that's a fact whatever your mind wants to add to it gives you the sense of injury and strengthens the ego so if you can just be with the pure facts this is why all that stuff when people are talking about other people what they failed to do or what they did what he did to me he betrayed me well what did he do well he went off with another woman or man he betrayed me, betrayed me is an interpretation and the more you have that thought that he betrayed me the more you feel the emotion that goes with that thought and you feel who is it that feels that emotion the ego itself feels betrayed because who you deeply are, who you are in your essence doesn't feel betrayed the fact is he went off with another woman that's what he did is that all yeah that's what he did if you refrain from adding a story to it then you don't experience the this may not be this comes easy when you are connected with who you truly are then it is easy to let go of the unnecessary imposition of stories upon events the event is neutral the story interpretation of it is what creates the anguish

music music music music music

[Speaker 4] (7:19:08 - 7:19:25)
music reactive is karmic action karma actually means

action so when you react to a situation to a person whatever in whatever way you react then you produce in eastern terms you produce more karma so it's in any situation then what really matters is not the situation but your state of consciousness that you bring to it and that's important to remember because the world otherwise will seduce you into believing that what matters is the situation itself and then you react to that so that requires then a vigilance on your part which of course implies that there is already a certain degree of awareness in you otherwise there cannot be a vigilance so we are already taking for granted we assume all those of you who are here and listening to this in you there is already a degree of awareness and that enables you to be vigilant as to your inner state in any given situation so that your primary vigilance is towards ok from second nature you become aware of primarily of your response to the situation and you pay more attention to that than whatever it is that you do with regard to the situation and so you realize attention so you bring yourself to attention and there it is and then everything changes as you bring that precious gift into this world it's amazing the world is and you become one with the entire evolutionary impulse of the universe which is towards consciousness and then you actually when you become one with that evolutionary impulse then you actually find things unfold in your life with greater ease because you become one with that vast movement something that wants to come into this world and you transcend the personal the merely personal so you can say that anything that arises in your life any so called problem or challenge whether to do with finances, relationships health living situation, job I think that's about it that's where the problems arise other people, a lot to do with the problems in your life probably large percentage of problems come through other people dreadful other people hell is other people example that's from the egoic point of view that can easily happen so all those things whatever is the main problem, so called problem area in your life the main limitation in your life health finance relationships job and so on meet it with that state of in that state of attention instead of the reactive mind that identified state and then look at the problem from there and then you may find that sometimes almost miraculously it shifts it may dissolve something negative may, you may see suddenly a positive side of it you may find helpful factors suddenly coming in and you didn't know how it happened or you may find that internally you transcend it completely so your inner state is no longer dependent on the external condition that is perhaps what is sometimes called detachment through you are free internally from the situation it may not have changed but your state of consciousness has changed although it does as I just said very often as attention arises that presence arises shifts happen much more easily or there may be a time gap at first nothing happens and that could be for a while and then suddenly the shift happens so external shifts happen more easily that way but also if they don't happen you transcend internally or action, the impulse to take action arises suddenly and because you know exactly what it is that is needed suddenly in this situation and then you change it through your action but the action was not a reaction the action didn't come from the reactive mind, it came from a deeper place, it is not reactive reactive is karmic action, karma actually means action so when you react to a situation, to a person whatever in whatever way you react then you produce in eastern terms you produce more karma when you are free of reaction you do not produce more karma which is unconsciousness you do not produce more unconsciousness in this world which in other words you do not contribute to the problem making that all other humans who are not giving the consciousness to this world they contribute to the problem making even those who have good intentions because there are many humans who have good intentions but whatever they, whatever endeavor they undertake you will find things happen that they hadn't foreseen and the good intentions turn into something else you can see it collectively, good intentions without a shift in consciousness just because the mind says wouldn't it be nice to have a more peaceful world yes, of course but a fair world where everybody is nobody people are actually equal and wouldn't it be nice to bring that about says the mind don't people don't accumulate possessions anymore wouldn't that be nice and then exploitation comes to the end of wealthy people exploiting all the poor wouldn't that be nice let's create a society that does that ok, how can we do that ok let's work out some philosophical system how it all fits in and then we have a book called Das Kapital and then let's create a society on the basis of those philosophical assumptions it looks all great at the beginning and then as you get into it before you know it you've created another hell on earth and it all started with good intentions two wonderful books that of course I'm talking about the arising of Soviet communism and so on two wonderful books that show you how things go wrong in that way George Orwell Animal Farm and another less known novel, Arthur Koestler, Darkness at Noon tells the story of how wrong things can go and of course we have the famous expression the road to hell is paved with good intentions ha ha ha so there needs to be all these things are true the world where exploitation no longer happens but for this world to come into being there needs to be a shift in consciousness and this is why we are here

manifesting doesn't always mean

that you have a clear vision of what it is that you want to achieve sometimes that is fine and works but to be in a state of appreciation of life in deep alignment with the present moment in so that you do not you're not in an antagonistic relationship with the present moment anymore, you're just deeply aligned with the flow of life in the now and you appreciate all, everything that is and the things you do, the things you do you do them fully you give your fullest attention to what you do, that's another obstacle for many people, they somehow are not able to give themselves fully, they're not, there's something holding back, there's something that's holding them back you can sometimes see it with people on stage or sometimes singers or musicians, you can sometimes see they're not the full, there's not the full energy is not there for some reason perhaps they're afraid for some reason of they may be afraid of giving themselves fully, to be fully in what you're doing to give your fullest attention to what you're doing in the present moment is a very powerful way of manifesting but whether or not you have a vision that you project and you feel it's already happening the vision can only work if you continue giving your fullest attention to the present moment and to enjoy the energy of what it is that you are producing in the present moment that empowers the vision the vision is always, the point of power is always in the present moment a great obstacle for achieving a vision or any success is to be, and this almost sounds paradoxical at first until you begin to understand it is to have an excessive attachment to the outcome that's a huge hindrance, now you might think well if I have a vision of what it is I want to achieve, would it not be natural for me to be attached to the outcome that I want to get there I want to reach millions of people with my music and I want millions of people to feel better by listening to my music, perhaps to get a glimpse of presence by listening to my music so you that's a great vision but the the the mastery of this lies in not attaching yourself to the vision so that you lose you lose consciousness in what you are doing and it gets dissipated into the vision which ultimately is a mental thing the point of power is always in the present moment, excessive attachment to the outcome, one could almost say any real attachment to the outcome weakens your ability to manifest so you can hold an outcome in your mind and then return to I give the example of a pilgrimage, let's say you're on a pilgrimage, life could be regarded as a pilgrimage or journey and you know where you're going, you want to go to whatever it is, your pilgrimage to a holy site, in medieval times there were pilgrimages to Rome and other sacred places, your pilgrimage to Mecca, pilgrimage in Spain, you can go on this pilgrim trail in northern Spain to Santiago de Compostela and you walk for many many days now the very purpose of pilgrimage is to bring about a transformation of who you are, transformation of consciousness the arriving is relatively unimportant, arriving at your destination is just a short moment and there you are but the journey is how conscious are you of the step you're taking at this moment if you're excessively attached to the outcome which in this case would be your destination then you're mentally you already want to be there, that takes away from the quality of your step at this moment now the step it's an analogy for whatever it is you're doing at this moment

and quality means how much consciousness flows into what you're doing in this moment

welcome to our gathering meditation talk as you may know I spent a little bit of time with the Dalai Lama recently and one of the most impressive things he said and he said it several times during those days when people ask him all kinds of questions complicated questions the impact of technology on the economy and the economic and this and that and several times I heard him say I don't know now you can look upon this as something a superficial thing, I don't know or something that's actually very significant because it points to a certain state of consciousness in which the realm of conceptual thinking isn't that important anymore and I could actually feel that many people felt love towards him deepening when he said I don't know people laughed and he laughed and there was an opening which would not have been there if he had given a very clever answer and sometimes after he said I don't know actually he said something that was meaningful and deep at other times he didn't but it started whether or not something came out of that not knowing the point of departure the foundation is that state in which you don't need to know conceptually and once you realize that it's a kind of denial of the self the mind made self because the mind made self lives on taking up positions of knowing opinions, viewpoints judgments and the more one is identified with opinions, viewpoints judgments, reactions the stronger the self which already the Buddha discovered a long time ago that sense of me-ness, the me that's ultimately illusory and creates all kinds of trouble and problems for yourself and for others if that's all you know if that's the only dimension that you move in the mind created self then you will create suffering for yourself and others so to come to a position of, not a position a place of not knowing it is an act that from the point of view of the self looks almost I could say negative, it looks like a kind of suicide self annihilation who am I if I don't know if I don't have a position some mental position that I identify with, what's left of me so we come to the denial of the absolute reality of the form of me we don't need to go as far as some teachings do, some spiritual traditions they proclaim that to be, the whole thing is totally illusion they say and from a certain perspective you could say that, the whole thing of egos walking around this world going through their drama and then dissolving and then other egos coming back up and going through the same kind of drama and dissolving and the same kind of drama and dissolving so you are born and then you go through a little bit of turmoil here and there into one or two little happinesses and then that's the end but mostly of course while you are in between the birth and the death you are waiting for the end of problems and while you wait for the end of problems you are creating problems for yourself and others that's ordinary existence normal existence and so this act of self annihilation this is one way of putting it it sounds a little bit frightening self annihilation but all that's annihilated wasn't real anyway not in absolute terms it was relatively real one could say the fact that we are here is relatively real but it won't last for very long so was it ever really real?

if it dissolves like a dream if the whole story of me dissolves like a dream very soon in that sense it's very fleeting like a cloud so the vital question then is do you assert the self or do you deny the self can you live in a balance where the self is still there but you don't realize it not as ultimately who you are so when the Dalai Lama says I don't know and of course everybody projects something onto him he is the Dalai Lama so they give him a strong identity now his challenge is not to fall into that same illusion in other words people believe that he is a mountain and he knows his deeper reality is that he is a valley and that's your job to know that for yourself not the illusory self, the essence of who you are this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation

when you read what Jesus said when you have faith faith is faith in the terms that Jesus used is to be connected with the the power within you that is inseparable from the source consciousness when you have faith you can tell a mountain move from here to there and it will happen now there could be a kind of parable or analogy or some people might want to take it literally he also said as you know I've said before the one statement that encapsulates the entire secret about manifestation Jesus said when you ask for something believe that you have received it and it will be yours believe that you have received it, I've spoken about that at length in other sessions to believe that you have received it is to feel connected with the the essence of being where you anything else is that's the cream, everything else is the skimmed milk, so if you have the cream you can manifest anything in the realm of the skimmed milk now that would mean that you can entirely change if the statement about the mountain is to be taken literally then it would be saying that it is possible to completely change external reality, so called physical reality simply by the power of your mind and I believe that is the destiny of humans eventually humans will be able to simply manifest through the mind if that were at the moment to some you can manifest quite a bit not immediately you always need a little bit of time mostly, there is a lot you can do and even sometimes things that you think might be almost impossible, that is too far, that is possible to manifest, but there are limitations, you are absolutely right to what you need to recognize those limitations so that you are not engaged in completely useless manifestation practice aiming at something that is not within the realm of possibility for example, let's say I suddenly got it into my mind that I am going to participate in whatever capacity in the Olympic Games the next Olympic Games whenever they are going to be and I am going to win a gold medal in boxing or whatever or jumping or whatever it is and no matter how powerful my manifestation is that is not going to happen so I know that is an impossibility, or let's say I got it into my mind, I want to become the world's greatest ballet dancer ok now if I had been 10 years old it might have worked but it's not going to happen, that's for sure no matter how powerful my manifestation practice is so there are now these things are kind of obvious, that there are physical limitations to what you can do or what your body can do there may also be mental manifestations sometimes people have an image in their mind of what they want to be but I remember watching years ago when we still had cable television American Idol American Idol is all these people who perform, they want to be chosen as the next American Idol in all kinds of singing and dancing and so on and one is sometimes amazed at the discrepancy between what people thought of themselves how good they were at singing or dancing and how bad they actually were when they performed it's just, the discrepancy was just incredible they thought they were they were the potential greatest singer but they were just awful just, everybody could see they can, now that's now that could be that they haven't practiced enough, it could be that they haven't, that they forgot that in order to achieve mastery in anything you have to focus your mind and you have to enjoy what you're doing for quite some time before power flows into what you do so they have just a mental projection I'm going to be a rock star but then all this, the practice you have to live it, you have to live the music you have to live or you compose the music and you live it every day and you live your instrument becomes part of your your very being and you live it and you enjoy it and then you go into the subway and you play there for a year or two and then you go somewhere else to a little bar and you play there, so many great stars have started and then you leave, and there was this book I can't remember the title he found it and he looked at various great musicians and dancers who had achieved great things he calculated that they had 10,000 hours of practice before mastery was achieved and something was able to flow through them that made them great, with the Beatles for example he examined how many years the Beatles performed in just little bars in Liverpool and in Hamburg they were performing in little beer cellars and tiny bars and he calculated and he came to the average figure of 10,000 hours 10,000 hours of practice and that's so very often the people don't achieve the heaven, the goal may not be totally unrealistic, it may be within the realm of possibility but what they miss is the intervening the journey towards the goal and they don't enjoy the journey and they don't want to the energy is not there to practice every day to do every day so that the power increases and flows through them now quite a few of those people they never they never consciously manifested something, the Beatles I'm sure it just was a gradual evolutionary process for them before they, what they created was very deeply inspiring I mean the songs are relatively simple but they have an essence, there's something there that makes them, they'll still be around in 200 or 300 years time there's something there that suddenly came and it wasn't there initially so are you able to enjoy the doing, the present moment really comes back to the present moment do you enjoy the journey towards it or let's say you want to become a a people have an image of what they want to become but are not able to give it attention in the continuous, in the present moment so that the journey must be joyful to be empowered so many things are possible now even people who seem to have a very bad voice, let's say this person could never sing, that's not necessarily true, if this person continues, it could happen that something will become through, look at somebody like who was this jazz singer, very famous african-american very famous jazz singer, who had this deep croaky voice the name escaped me right now, one of the most famous Louis Armstrong I think, was he a jazz singer? Was he? I think he was

and you would say

how could this person ever have a singing career, it's totally impossible but the strange thing is everybody would have said there's no chance for you, just do something else when he did, eventually something happened it didn't matter anymore that this wasn't normally regarded as a good singing voice there was an essence that came through him that used the voice and touched everybody so that was incredible if this person had asked anybody I want to be a singer, and they said of course what you can do please think of something else so often it is the case and I don't know, I haven't read his biography I don't know what his past was, what his journey was but it's amazing that somebody who has such a bad singing voice can create such wonderful songs quite amazing so there are incredible possibilities that the mind would exclude by saying prematurely so many things are possible but some things are not possible often involving as the examples I gave for myself I think to get a medal in the Olympic Games there may be one or two disciplines that I could still be good at, who knows one could be the favourite Canadian discipline called curling where you push that thing on the ice it doesn't require too much physical strength so there might be a chance for me participating in the Canadian team of curling but I doubt it that's a little aside yes, knowing what is possible but without limiting yourself as in the example of Louis Armstrong he would have done if he had listened to others and said probably told him your voice is no good, if he had listened to others and he didn't fortunately and when I was writing The Power of Now people sometimes asked me what do you do and I said I'm writing a book spiritual book and they said what about I said it's about present moment, living in the present moment and several times people said oh forget about it, it's been done so many times this is something that's already been overdone, you should think of something else possibly present moment is old hat, just don't do it there's no point, you're wasting your time somebody actually told me literally he had read many spiritual books and said if you are writing another book about the present moment, you're wasting your time and I was writing The Power of Now I didn't listen to him I knew I wasn't wasting, I loved the process, it was an empowerment that happened, it didn't matter to me very much whether the book would be successful or not which was very much secondary I knew the book had to be, if I had not written it I would have become ill and I would have died that's how strong the energy flow was, if I had not responded to it I would have died or become seriously ill so don't necessarily listen to others, but yes it is true on the one hand there are things that are not possible for example physical flying right now is not yet possible, at least not in this dimension, you can probably fly in the astral dimension when you dream you might travel to the astral dimension and experience as I sometimes do that you actually lift off and you can, there you go but in this dimension I would not step off my balcony and jump off or start practicing flying I don't recommend it certain things are impossible and you need to just use your discrimination and look at it without limiting yourself unduly because many things that other people might tell you are impossible are actually within the realm of possibility and even certain things that your mind will tell you are impossible may be within the realm of possibility and again there's a fine line there important thing is make sure that you enjoy the doing of it and then you can, you focus on your destination but enjoy the doing in the present moment and then whether or not you even arrive at your destination becomes secondary

because there's such deep enjoyment in the present moment

I'm going to make a cup of tea and again this is just a little example or illustration of performing an action consciously rather than reducing it to a means to an end so the water has already boiled a little bit let's see if I can bring it back to boil you may have heard of the Japanese tea ceremony that's been practiced in Japan for centuries under the influence of Zen and the Japanese tea ceremony is to be conscious acutely conscious at every step of the action of making the tea so it's been perfected it's a little work of art the making of the tea is not a means to an end it's become a work of art now it doesn't have to be every time you make a cup of tea you don't have to perform necessarily the tea ceremony but to bring some consciousness into the doing into something that is actually a very simple but enjoyable action that is extremely helpful I'm bringing the kettle here I've got this interesting tea here, it's green tea and apparently it opens up in the form of a flower when you pour hot water over it and now we wait a little now in ordinary life you may perhaps while you wait perhaps be engaged in other things but if you can this little waiting period itself can be a meditation another thing they practice in Japan again under the influence of Zen is flower arrangements that you might have heard of this is to place flowers artfully into the vase it's very slow conscious movements it's done intuitively if it's performed by a master it's done intuitively so it's one could call that consecrated action consecrated action that's actually a term used in the Bhagavad Gita there's also a kind of almost say respect that you have for the objects that you handle you treat them with respect it's a strange thing perhaps for some people because for many people most of the objects that they handle are just a means to an end they wouldn't really give attention to the object itself but you treat the object with respect even the way you put it down there's even a way of placing something on the table consciously and their way of placing it unconsciously I have observed I'm talking a little while we wait for the tea oh yes I have observed in some in restaurants some waiters they just they put their plates on the plate on the table occasionally you find a waiter who actually does it consciously who places the waiter there's care in which the waiter places the plate on the table and it's always very enjoyable when that happens it goes like carefully like this consciously it's a high quality I call it high quality action now if you want to create something that is not an egoic thing but is something something you realize from the depth of your being that something wants to be created through you whatever it may be maybe you want to you're writing a write a book open a hairdressing salon create a retreat center or a conscious business or whatever you want to create and the vision comes to you or you may want to create it's not necessarily selfish a better place to live a place that is externally more peaceful than where you are now or warmer you may have a vision of what it is that you want to achieve and then you focus on that vision and the most powerful way to manifest as you probably know I don't usually talk about that too much because other things are more important I talk about the foundation for your life but manifesting is a secondary thing that can be significant in your life and to manifest the most important secret to use that word I'm not specifically referring to a book called the secret but that's the but there's helpful things in there too as long as you don't believe that certain things that you want to manifest are going to make you happy the the power to manifest is in experiencing the the fullness of the present moment the undifferentiated fullness what Jesus called life in its fullness in one of the translations I want you to have life in its fullness he said and that is not stuff he's not referring to things life in its fullness is an inner state of being it is to experience, to know, to realize the beingness within you, the I am which is consciousness itself that is life that is the fullness of life in the words of Jesus the fullness of life is to realize that so that once you realize that, and it is consciousness you know yourself as consciousness once you know that then no future moment can possibly be better anything that can happen in the future isn't adding on to so if you bring together if you have a vision in your mind of what it is you want to achieve or create or manifest and you bring this vision into this sense of still fullness that you sense now and you bring that together that is the most powerful creative tool, the way that it's usually expressed, Jesus expressed it too, he said when you pray for something believe that you already have it but I think he probably used actually slightly different words but that's how it was written down he said he probably said feel that you already have it whatever it is that you want to have, that you think is going to be you need to feel already the feeling now how do you do that? by feeling that which is beyond the world of phenomena out of which everything arises which is consciousness so when you know yourself as consciousness that's already the fulfillment, let's say even an insignificant thing let's say you want to have a nice house let's just say if I had a nice house out in nature then I would be really happy I want to have a nice house in nature next to a little forest and then there's a lake there and I can walk to the lake and then how would you feel? okay I would feel exactly the way I'm feeling now so I want to live in Hawaii and have a deck behind my house with a very comfortable chair and then I would sit in there every day and contemplate the ocean well good luck how would you feel? what would you feel?

I would feel the fullness of life okay and you can't feel it now no, why can't you feel it now? because I'm not sitting in this deck chair and I'm not looking at the ocean and it's not sunny that's why I can't feel the fullness I don't have a house behind me that I say is mine so I can't feel the fullness of life now okay then do you think you're going to feel it when you finally sit in the deck chair? no, if you can't feel it now you can't feel it then because you will be again dissatisfied in your deck chair behind the house because you will get very bored and stung by mosquitoes and it's too hot anyway, I should have gotten a house higher up because down here by the beach it's just too hot why didn't I get a house higher up because there's a mountain just behind me, it would be cooler when you sell your house get one higher up, but then the nights are too cold, you can't sit outside anymore if you're not if you cannot feel the fullness of life on your bicycle and enjoy that moment tremendously of being on your bicycle you will not feel the fullness of life when you're sitting in your Rolls Royce or Bentley or Ferrari Testarossa there's an over overvaluing of things around you that I need things to be in a certain way around me to be happy and content that doesn't mean that you cannot change the environment around you you can take steps towards changing it because you may have certain preferences that's fine, everybody has preferences, preference there's some spiritual teachers who say I don't know who I can't remember, but there are some who say I have no preference well they live somewhere, but not somewhere else so you must have a preference for being there unless somebody picks them up and puts them somewhere so you can have a preference for living here rather than there, yes this country rather than that country but while you're not there you can be be in touch with the fullness of life within yourself now and then it's much more likely that your external surroundings will reflect your state of consciousness as you might have noticed it always takes a while before I start to speak I often say it's good to start with a moment of stillness and it is but the main reason is that I don't know what to say and that could be a very uncomfortable place or situation to be in some people have nightmares like that you're on stage curtain opens and suddenly you're facing the audience and you've forgotten your lines but I don't have any lines so here's the secret it's becoming comfortable with the state of not knowing otherwise it would be awful what can I say now would be terrible and of course that is a kind of trust which I suggested the other day as a better word for faith trust and that's incredibly important to become comfortable with not knowing but what you do when you become comfortable with not knowing you enter the state of non-conceptual knowing but you have to be comfortable with not knowing anything on a conceptual level thinking in other words so another way of putting it is to say that when I come on here and then I sit I don't think because that's the state

and in the gaps between sentences or words I also don't think rather than there's no next sentence or word being prepared it just comes and that's for you I'm saying that because that also is a state of consciousness that you can enter and you're doing it to some extent when you don't label things when you step back from thought become comfortable with just being present and all these questions of things like self-esteem which apparently is a problem for many people either they have low self-esteem or they have exaggerated self-esteem or it fluctuates and books written about how you can improve your self-esteem and probably workshops I don't know what they teach you, maybe it's good maybe not but the simple thing is that in that state of no thought but alert presence all these questions about self-esteem resolve themselves into nothingness because you're no longer looking for some perceived value in a conceptual sense of self the personality and you can sense the power that is within you that is nothing to do with the person and that's where your self-esteem comes from and it's not comparative in the normal state of consciousness self-esteem is always comparative how do I rate myself relative to this person and that person and that and what on what level external appearance strength, knowledge beauty, possessions status and of course there's always you're always inferior to some in one or two or three areas and you may be superior to some in another one or two areas but that's the power of stillness that's another way of putting it the power of inner stillness that is the true seed of self-esteem and you can't really call it self-esteem anymore but you realize the infinite value that you not possess but are because that is the essence that underlies the entire universe it is the light of the world and you don't compare yourself to others anymore you feel neither inferior nor superior the ego is always either inferior or superior so you might be surprised if I tell you I'm a small guy even if I'm standing next to a big muscular guy towering above me with a big ego I'm not thinking of anybody in particular at the moment but it has happened in the past I don't feel inferior just nor do I feel superior you might have a big body and muscles but I'm the spiritual guy laughter laughter laughter laughter of course it's the ego talking laughter this is a very interesting strategy of the ego the spiritual ego can come in and without you knowing it you still have a conceptual sense of self but it's turned spiritual it's a trap some spiritual teachers fall into too and you know it when they make certain pronouncements we touched on this before and that is they explain that they are superior to any other teacher for example either any other teacher alive now or I've seen one or two spiritual teachers or read about them who actually claimed that they are superior to any spiritual teacher that ever lived or ever will live laughter well that should cover it laughter laughter here or any other galaxy laughter laughter so the most important practice on your journey spiritual journey into the present moment the journey without distance is to become comfortable with not knowing which means to become comfortable with not thinking you don't need to demand that there should be long periods when you're not thinking just moments when you're simply looking, listening, perceiving or being and you don't know anything in that moment not conceptually but you access the source of all knowledge of all knowing and that is a way for the ego to gradually become weaker just gradually subside no longer runs your life which is what is the ego the unobserved mind it may still come in here and there it probably will

that's fine

so part of this is of course to be give more attention to the present moment because the more you think the more future you generate and the more attention you give to the present moment the less thinking because to be really present you don't think about it you just are with it give it attention I recommend the little things of life to be more attentive to all the little things that make up every hour of every day every minute, every hour and give them more attention so let's start with some very basic things to enter that meditative state of consciousness because that's what it is all about meditation is about a shift in consciousness away from concern with doing and thinking and becoming aware really directly aware of the present moment and that's perhaps the easiest and most accessible starting point for most people to enter the state of presence which is the aim of meditation is to get you into that state of absolute presence in this moment and that's being becoming aware of being most people are always engaged in doing that includes thinking continuously and a lot of the thinking that people do is not very uplifting a lot of the thinking that happens compulsively creates negative feelings and a lot of the thinking is actually harmful and dysfunctional it doesn't serve any useful purpose but you just can't stop it or you think you can't but you can and that's of course what meditation is about to realize there is in you a deeper dimension of consciousness deeper or higher you could call it depending from where you look at it deeper or higher than thinking and that is the state of presence in the now so it's an amazing realization for most people that they can actually easily access that state of presence by bringing their attention into the present moment like now so I'm kind of although I'm talking my aim is to talk you so to speak into that state of meditation and it helps if while I talk you can become conscious or aware of the small gaps between words as I talk so you're just aware not only of the words of course you hear the words you take them in but you're also aware that there are little spaces between the words you just acknowledge that these are little meditative gaps so to speak and in order to be really aware of the meditative gaps you can't be thinking you're just aware of that space there is what does it mean aware there is a presence in that awareness you know in that awareness like now you know that you are here as a conscious presence without any thought telling you that in other words you become aware of yourself not as a person because to be a person you need to be thinking about you and your life and your problems and so on but there's a deeper dimension in you deeper than the person and this is what we are here to access so you become aware that really on the surface of your life there is the person with a past and a future and all the thinking and the emotions that keep the person going of course and so you're happy one day unhappy the next happy one day unhappy the fluctuations of the person it's quite normal and the person is always concerned with doing and thinking and the next thing or the past the future the past is never really present when you become present like now you realize that there is a deeper part in you there is a deeper dimension to who you are where you are more than a person where you are a presence, a conscious presence the question is can you sense feel or be aware of yourself at this moment as a conscious presence without which there couldn't even be a person so it's almost like saying the person is the surface of the ocean or the ripples or the waves on the surface of the ocean but you are not just the ripples or waves on the surface of the ocean you are the ocean so there is a deeper presence in you and to access that and to sense that in yourself to sense yourself as the presence a presence that is what liberates you from being completely trapped and limited in an exclusively personal identity in other words there is more to you than meets the eye you are deeper than you ever knew by thinking about yourself and it's not difficult to access that dimension in yourself can one describe it?

one can give a few pointers let's see if that makes sense the pointers I'm giving you now let's see if they make sense in your own experience at this moment sensing yourself as a presence there is a peacefulness there that is really the essence of what is sometimes called inner peace the person the surface of the ocean the waves and the ripples of the ocean cannot be at peace for long it fluctuates, occasionally things happen to go well or yeah, I'm happy but it never lasts for very long and then the storm comes and big waves come or little irritated waves, whatever then you are unhappy but there is a deeper if let's say you are a ripple on the surface of the ocean with a name and a date of birth and a past and a future and problems and suddenly the ripple realizes there is more to me and realizes oh, I'm actually much deeper and vaster, I'm the ocean manifesting as the ripple and so you are the universe or the consciousness that underlies the sense perceived universe manifesting temporarily as a person you are the universe becoming conscious of itself at this moment in your life as a person you are not separate from the totality of the universe you are the universe the universe has or the consciousness that underlies the universe has given form to who you are temporarily in order to experience itself as a person it's an amazing thing and the universe here is in the process of becoming more conscious that's what the entire evolution of the universe is about it's consciousness so your life is part of the evolutionary impulse towards greater consciousness and if your life is not primarily about greater consciousness which actually you can build into whatever you do it doesn't mean you stop doing all I'm interested in is consciousness no, it needs to flow into what you do if that if your life purpose is not aligned with the evolving consciousness of the universe then what is the point of it all and then sooner or later you get very frustrated and things become pointless so you are here to become more conscious because that's what the universe has put you here for instead of universe you can use other terms you are more comfortable with them the universal intelligence God so right now in addition to being a person which right now is not important it becomes important again when we finish our meditation I'm sure but right now something else is more important that's realizing yourself as the presence coming into the present moment and feeling just being aware right now that you are conscious if you were not conscious you wouldn't be able to hear hear, see, perceive anything the fact that you can perceive things the fact that you can think the fact that you can have emotions all implies that you are conscious the meditative state is becoming aware directly of that consciousness sometimes the word that is used also is stillness right now you become still you become aware of just being of being that presence and that feels energizing you don't go to sleep you are actually alert and still at the same time and now you access an intelligence that is deeper than the thinking mind by entering that state of alert presence and then when you think again you are connected with a source of all intelligence with creativity you become empowered your thinking and your doing and your actions are then aligned with a deeper purpose of the universe not just little egoic desires so all this is so terribly important and aligning your life with that presence so you need to during your normal day I'll give you a few hints how to invite that presence into your life which by invite I mean direct your attention to it because it's always there that really is what supports you in life and if you can be aware of that fear anxiety happen less and less in your life because you can feel supported by that vast presence which is not just your own presence it is the universal presence of consciousness you connect with that you are that that so on a day normal day you go to work or whatever you do as much as you can become aware of just brief moments of yourself as the presence in addition to being a person so one of the things I recommend is it sounds almost too simple but from time to time look at the sky for a few seconds you look up it doesn't matter whether it's blue or cloudy today today here is the early afternoon happens to be a sunny day look at the sky for a moment you are looking but not thinking you could do that with anything but sky is easier because there is this vast expanse that has some correlation with the presence of stillness within you so you look and for a moment there is just there is the sky and you can sense yourself as the presence that is perceiving and you are not thinking so there is a brief moment of not thinking but not going to sleep alertness without thinking that's the key to bring that into your life more often and don't believe when your mind tells you that you need to think and think and think all the time bring in gaps of just alert presence that's the being the rest is the doing the two need to be there needs to be a balance in your life between being and doing otherwise you go mad and a civilization that completely loses touch with the being dimension is going to self destruct and a person who completely loses touch with the being dimension is going to be very unhappy unfulfilled always anxious depressed or always stressed what does many people live in continuous stress what does that mean they are always focused on the next thing and the next thing pulls them away from where they are here and now and always there is the promise when I reach that point I will be okay but of course the reaching that point is always very brief and then they realize oh I'm not okay I need to reach another point it's a great thing of course to have goals in life but if the goal takes up so much of your attention continuously where you need to get to that you continuously miss the present moment which after all is all there ever is then your life is completely out of balance the balance is yes having goals you know where you're going that's good and but you are aware of the step you're taking at this moment and you're aware of the flowers the sky the trees life that continuously unfolds around you you acknowledge you honor the present moment and on a deeper level you are aware of yourself as

this question requires only a brief answer but it's maybe helpful I would like to know if the thought watching meditation vipassana would be useful in increasing my presence and diminishing my identification with the ego if so could you or Kim provide an example of meditation I won't provide an example of meditation but Kim wants to do it at some point of vipassana it would take quite a while vipassana is a buddhist originally associated with buddhism but there's nothing particularly buddhist about it it's directing your attention into the body basically in a very structured way and it's a good meditation it's basically inner body awareness and it's for some people it's an excellent meditation it's inner body awareness in a much more structured way than I do it when I point out the possibility of having your attention inside the body it definitely takes your attention away from thinking and so you connect with being vipassana retreats tend to be boot camps for meditation where you spend many many hours each day sitting in meditation and it can be quite an ordeal but that could be helpful too because either you can't stand it anymore and run away or you surrender completely it's not as pleasant initially as our retreat but it can take you deep it's not for everybody it's fine not one way is for everybody and it may well be as the vipassana teachers claim that that was one of the original meditations taught by the Buddha I wouldn't be surprised if that was including also breast meditation I would say that that was also related that is also original meditation breast meditation may even precede the Buddha nobody really knows I believe unless there's some extremely knowledgeable expert here and says I know so that meditation is called vipassana vipassana ultimately their opinion they are beginning to defend their identity sense of identity is derived from the movement of thought and so whenever somebody questions something that's connected with your thinking it is regarded as an attack on your identity why not start with a good spiritual practice especially for people in the back rows and it may sound a little bit funny but it's actually a very powerful spiritual practice and that is to become aligned with the present moment obviously this is I'm Mr. Now so I'm talking about the present moment become aligned with the present moment and refrain from complaining for example that you are too far away mentally a very powerful spiritual practice so then you become okay with the is-ness of things and the is-ness of things happens always in the present moment you might have noticed nothing ever happens that's not now one could almost say the word happen must imply present moment and most people completely underestimate the incredible importance of the present moment and of living in a harmonious relationship with the present moment and you would be surprised how many people in this world live almost constantly in an antagonistic relationship with the present moment and that of course causes a lot of unnecessary suffering and unhappiness so one of the most important things in life to be aware of is your relationship so to speak with the present moment and this is now of course is the present moment welcomed or appreciated or at least accepted for the way it is because it already is the way it is that's the weird thing about the present moment it's already the way it is no matter how you argue in their mind with it the is-ness of things is already the case and that's all there ever is in your entire life your entire life this is not something to just understand intellectually but to grasp at a deeper level your entire life unfolds in the present moment that's all there ever is that's all there ever is is this moment and most people live as if some future moment whether it's a minute from now or tomorrow or next year they live as if some future moment were always more important than this moment that is implied they don't tell themselves the next moment is more important than this one no, it's an assumption, an underlying assumption it's a mindset and that mindset is a form of conditioning cultural conditioning that mindset by implication, if not literally always says there's something more important coming and I'm on my way to it and that is a dysfunctional way to live because you're never fully alive you never feel at home you're always looking for your home in some future moment or when you get old enough and you realize there's little future left then you think about the past more than the next moment which is why many old people talk continuously about the past so coming into alignment with the present moment brings about a shift in consciousness and this is so simple and yet so profound now this shift in consciousness is what our evening here together is all about it is about a transformation of consciousness in you and the reason why you're here most of you is that this transformation of consciousness is already happening it's a process for most people it's already happening in you and you're here because you know that this or you hope that this is an opportunity for deepening this shift in consciousness or accelerating the shift in consciousness there are other terms we could use we could say it is about an awakening of consciousness it is about a spiritual awakening and this is a term that in several spiritual traditions is used and has been used for a long time the term of awaken which implies that the ordinary the normal state of consciousness of most human beings is a kind of dream like state it is a kind of sleep but people if you tell that to somebody says what are you talking about dream I'm completely awake this is just nonsense and then I might say have you noticed that there is a voice in your head that almost never stops talking and commenting and analyzing and interpreting and judging and liking and disliking and all the time it talks and talks it is in your head and if it talks out loud and there is nobody there then you are crazy but it is in your head it talks about you about other people it has comments about things a lot about the future sometimes totally imaginary things that are going to go wrong especially at 3 o'clock in the morning when you are in a warm bed you can start thinking about all the things that are going to go wrong in your life and that is the voice in the head and most people are so identified with the voice that they become the voice they become the compulsive almost obsessive thoughts that continuously roll through their heads and if I say to somebody you are not awake they say what the hell are you talking about and I say that is it, that is the voice that keeps you asleep identification with that voice is a kind of hypnotic trance that you live in on a daily basis what the voice says varies from person to person from culture to culture it is the conditioned mind and the way the mind has been conditioned depends on the surrounding culture that you grow up in if you had grown up in a totally different part of the world somewhere in Africa or in Asia or Saudi Arabia or South America you would have different types of thought not all of them would be different but there is a different type of conditioning that goes with that particular culture but what everybody has in common no matter what the voice says is that they are identified with the voice which means apart from the voice they are not there apart they are the voice they are their mental positions you notice it for example when you start discussing something with someone and you have a disagreement which happens very quickly of course when you start talking to somebody and then quickly you find something to disagree with and you then might notice in the other person it's always easier to notice the unconscious in the other person you might notice in the other person defensiveness and aggression arising and emotion arises they're getting upset because you are questioning their opinion, their viewpoint which they don't even know it's a viewpoint to them it's the truth that's how it is and you question it they are beginning to defend not ultimately their opinion they are beginning to defend their identity because identity is bound up with thought identity sense of identity is derived from the movement of thought that's and so whenever somebody questions something that's connected with your thinking very quickly it is regarded unconsciously of course this is why we call that the unconscious state it is regarded as an attack on your identity it's almost as if somebody was physically attacking you and of course in some cases in very unconscious people even a disagreement can lead to physical violence incredible so the voice in the head is what most people derive their sense of self from all the people who are not yet at least beginning to awaken out of that voice and so that is in the larger context for this is that the evolution of human beings and the evolution of the consciousness of human beings has not come to an end humans are not yet a finished product they are a work in progress if they were a finished product that would be very sad and a terrible tragedy if you look at human history up to now is that the best you can do it would be a tragic thing then you say well god must have made a huge mistake to create beings that create so much unnecessary suffering for themselves and for other human beings that they kill each other by the millions millions and millions just read the first history of the first half of the 20th century it's insane and that is the manifestation of the unconscious state on a collective level and then you have the manifestation of the unconscious state of consciousness on a personal level so on a collective it might manifest as violence between nations and so on but the same mechanism is at work when two people are having an argument and they are beginning to hate each other because they have different opinions you'd be surprised how many people when somebody expresses an opinion that conflicts with theirs whether it's political or religious whatever kind political is a good example somebody questions their viewpoint and immediately they have an emotional meltdown and the other is no longer a human being the other becomes the enemy and this has been going on for thousands of years but of course now with the miraculous arrival of advanced technology called the internet this dysfunction that is in every human being that makes other human beings into enemies because they hold different mental positions now you can get on your keyboard and send out your hatred towards all these dreadful people who have different opinions from yours and then you feel satisfied and you don't know that you are completely unconscious spiritually speaking unconscious is that complete identification with a conditioned mind and the emotions that accompany the conditioned mind and it's the now complete identification with the conditioned mind is what in spiritual terms we call the ego the ego is a very simple definition the unobserved mind complete identification with the mind is your egoic identity and for millions of people on the planet that is who they, not who they are but who they think they are now that's an amazing thing so that has been an evolutionary development in human consciousness the ability to think was an amazing development in human consciousness it's of course bound up with the arising of language the ability to think it was not a mistake it was an incredible step forward in the evolution of human consciousness and has created civilizations and so on but there is a heavy price to pay as there always is in this world of polarities there's a heavy, very heavy price to pay for the power to think, the ability to think and that is that gradually your entire sense of self your sense of who you are becomes bound up with thinking and this happened over a long period of time at first humans started to think from time to time they were surprised, some anthropologists believe that when humans first started to think and use language, they do happen at the same time they were surprised that suddenly there was a voice in their heads talking and they thought a god, some god was talking to them and so they heard this voice go and kill these dreadful people in the other tribe okay and so but you may have, you may know that in many ancient cultures there's a mythological tale of called the Golden Age, you have it in India, you have it in the beginning of the Old Testament, the Garden of Eden and other cultures, as if there were some distant memory in human consciousness, in the collective consciousness of something a state a long, long time ago that was lost and that is the myth of the Golden Age and this of course some people say that's a complete fantasy, that's something humans are longing or some people might say, oh it's a longing to return to the womb before you were born and so on or it could be as I believe the actual distant memory of a state that humans lost and that was the state of connectedness with the totality connectedness with being to have the ability to be rooted in the being of yourself and that is of course how everything in nature still has that when you look at a tree if you can really look at a tree, really sense the presence of the tree the beingness of the tree then you can sense that the tree is not only rooted in the soil but the tree also rests in itself it is very still when you really give yourself a moment and contemplate a tree without formulating words about it, concepts about it, just be with it then you can sense that the tree exists in this field of deep stillness, it just is if the tree could speak it would probably just utter the ancient sound of ancient India which is

that's the Oh, by the way, just a little aside. As you know, the languages that we speak in Europe are called Indo-European languages.

And there's a link with Sanskrit, the ancient language of India. And it is my personal theory that the English word home is related to the om sound. And because home, the deepest meaning of home is not your external home.

The deepest meaning of home is to be rooted in the being of yourself.

My question's probably been answered three times. So, and frankly, I can't remember exactly what I wrote. So I'll sort of speak from the cuff.

Talk about the honest no, talk about giving and receiving the honest no in terms of exchanges. I just finished business school and thank God this is a totally different learning experience than what I learned in the classroom. So perhaps talk about exchange and how to give and receive an honest no in business dealings and maybe romantic relationships also.

So the actual question is, what, is there anything in this world that I ought to associate with an exchange the way that economics and business and profit making sort of teaching tells us that that like business, any sort of exchange in business, profiting. Yes.

Whether there's anything wrong with it.

[Speaker 6] (9:27:45 - 9:27:54)
Right. How to deal with an exchange perhaps without being in a business dealing without being taken advantage of or exploited.

[Speaker 1] (9:27:54 - 9:29:35)

Yes. Whether it's business or something else, the question is always whether, what I sometimes call the transcendent dimension is still operating in your life while in the background of your life, while in the foreground, you talk about business dealings with another person or whatever it may be. If the transcendent dimension is not there, then it becomes very problematic and all kinds of psychological self-seeking and so on comes in and interferes with what could be a much more efficient way of even doing business.

It's through self-seeking and seeking something, seeking some advantage through the other that a lot of dysfunction comes into business. So there are always two levels. It's probably easier to give an actual example.

Let's say you want to sell something to somebody, whatever it may be, whether big or small. Maybe you're selling a...

[Speaker 6] (9:29:35 - 9:29:39)
I work in the hospital business. Hospital services, for example.

[Speaker 1] (9:29:39 - 9:48:33)
Yes, yes. So you're always relating, there will be another human being there. You were talking about whatever it is on a practical level that needs to be discussed.

You explain what you have to offer and the other person listens or asks questions. You explain more. Can you, the question is then, can you sense, where's the word, empathy?

Meaning feeling your way into the other human being to feel or to sense the consciousness that is that which animates the other human being. The consciousness behind the words, not what the person says, but the consciousness that enables those words to be articulated. In other words, the essence of that other person.

Can you feel the essence of that person? But you can only feel that if you can feel it in yourself. So while you explain the practical side of it, you're also, there is an awareness behind, at the back of you, of this other human being and you sense the shared consciousness of you and the other.

That sounds perhaps a little bit abstract, but it's actually quite easy. For example, it just means you become very still when you listen to that person because that person will occasionally speak and then you're alert and still. And you begin to sense and acknowledge the aliveness of that human being beyond the function of that human being.

Because on the function level, you have this particular function, a role that you play, and this person has a particular function, a role that he or she plays. Two roles. And people kind of slip into their roles and they act out their roles and that's fine.

There's nothing wrong with that, except that is that all there is? If you are, if the other person is a client, here already we have a role, because the moment you say, my client, you've already, of course, put that person into that role and that person sees him or herself as a client. So he or she accepts the role and you have another word for yourself as this or that, another role.

If there's only that, then you really, the other person becomes to you a means to an end. And if it doesn't work out on the level of your respective roles, not infrequently, there is negative feelings. You see that with many people when the deal is not going to be reached, they get angry and negative.

And suddenly, before they gave you all kinds of things and now suddenly they become angry towards you just because the deal is not being reached, that they wanted, they wanted something from you. They were never interested in you as a being, they were only interested in you as the role because through that they were seeking something to enhance their role. But those that are very good at, that are very successful even in business, tend to be those who are not primarily interested in the outcome of their particular role playing, but are truly interested in the human being.

They enjoy being with the other. That's perhaps how they perceive it, but what that really means, you can only enjoy being with the other when you transcend the limitations of your person, personal selfhood. In other words, the transcendent dimension.

Now that's in any relationship, whether it's an intimate relationship, business relationship, any relationship, is the transcendent dimension there? That is the question. I have occasionally met people who are so in business who want to sell you something and you say, no, not really, after listening to them, no, I'm not really, and they truly don't mind because they love interacting with other humans.

And it's often they that finally, people actually come back to them. They say, no, I'm not interested, I'm going to look at some other of your competitors. Fine, yeah, that's fine.

Why do you have a look around? And they enjoy the interaction in the present moment without making you into a means to an end. So that's the question, bring the transcendent dimension into the relationship and also then the fear that they might cheat you isn't there anymore because that's only, again, as we talked about earlier, the mind projecting itself and being suspicious is an important part of the egoic sense of self.

Suspect what are his motivations? What does he really want? Whereas if you live in presence, you don't even question people's motivations.

You just look and you speak. You don't care what their motivations are. I'm always surprised when people talk about people's motivation, I've never seen that.

Maybe they're right, but I don't see it. Don't want to see it. So in any human interaction, the two dimensions need to be present.

You as the person playing a role, yes, but you are not confined, your consciousness is not confined to that role alone. There is some free consciousness left, so to speak, the unconditioned in the background and you sense that and then that is you beyond the role, you as presence rather than you as a person and also the other. There's the other as a person with his role and then there's the other as consciousness.

So whenever you look at a human being, first you look at the physical and usually when you're in your mind, already the mind will judge the physical and then the next is what you see is the psychological self of that person, what the kind of how they speak, what they say. You look into that and so this is the physical form of the person and then you see the psychological form of the person and usually that's where you get, most humans get stuck there. They see this physical and the psychological and in themselves also they're identified with their physical body and their psychological form identity, I call it.

So they relate only to form, roles, bodies, egos, form identity. Essence identity is the transcendent. So in any situation, can you sense your own essence beyond the person, it's presence.

That's the question and while you are interacting and conducting your business, if you can continue to sense your essence while you talk about the products or whatever it is, your attention is not totally absorbed by that and then the strange thing happens, people love you because they feel so good in your presence. Maybe not everybody, some may not get it at all. They're so identified with their mind that they don't get it at all but most people have some, a little bit of an opening where they can sense that you are present.

They don't have a word for it. What they register is that they like to be in your company and so I experience that occasionally, I visit an accountant and always, we love, I don't like, I have no idea what the accountant is talking about ever. So the moment she opens her mouth, and talks for 10 minutes, I haven't understood a single word but the interaction is lovely because I go there and look at her and we talk about the weather, how was the weekend but there's more than the words.

There's a meeting on a deeper level and while she talks and I don't understand, I'm just present. I don't even try because I know I won't understand it. Just presence and we have wonderful interaction.

She loves hearing from me and there's just one example of bringing transcendence into ordinary situation. So I believe if I became a second car, second hand car salesperson, I would do very well because I don't care whether they buy the car or not. I'm just.

Thank you. Something much more pleasant is our interaction at this moment. don't, whatever you want to buy, buy it or don't buy it, but I enjoy the interaction of this moment.

It's much more enjoyable than any future moment where you might buy it or not. It's just wonderful if you don't care about that. And of course that's already expressed in the, what I call don't care is expressed in the Bhagavad Gita, the ancient Indian sacred scripture, where it is called karma yoga, which means not to be attached to the fruit of your action.

That means not to be attached to the outcome, the mentally projected outcome, but simply to be present with the action. The fruit will look after itself. That's what it says.

And Jesus puts it in slightly different words. He says, don't be concerned about tomorrow, but tomorrow will look after itself. That's also because the fruit is the future outcome.

So the beautiful teaching of karma yoga is to bring presence into whatever you do, so that the doing is not a means to an end, at least not primarily. There may also, a little bit of that may be there, a means to an end, because the reason why this person has come to you when you're a car salesman is because he wanted to buy a car. So there's a little bit present of that reason, but the true reason is the human interaction.

If that comes the primary thing, then all these relationships are enjoyable in themselves. And the amazing thing is the fruit of the action is actually much more bountiful when you are not looking to it. The bounty comes of itself because you give your fullest attention to the present moment.

You don't have a large percentage of your attention where you want to get to, the fruit of the action. So you lose power then. You lose not egoic power, but true spiritual power.

When you take your attention into this is what I want, then a lot of your attention is there, and then you are interacting there as a means towards getting there. It just doesn't work. So really anything you do can become karma yoga, it can become a spiritual practice.

That's the beauty of it, by letting go of attachment to the outcome. A huge amount of conflict disappears from your life, totally unnecessary but very normal conflict, when you let go of attachment to the fruit of your action, of the outcome, then you can just be with the present moment. Because an enormous amount of conflict is generated by people who are attached to the outcome.

Even just humans letting go of that, the amount of conflict on the planet would be reduced enormously. But we don't have to wait for others to do it, we have to do it for ourselves. So experience the freedom that comes when you let go of attachment to the outcome of what you're doing.

Then you can truly give your fullest attention to the doing, and there's joy in that, there's a liveness in that. So your whole life becomes a spiritual practice. Your entire life then becomes the spiritual practice, and it becomes increasingly present moment centred.

That's where the power is. And it's in you, but it's not of you, not the form of you. Just wonderful.

So happy practice, and when things arise, negativity and upset or whatever arises, often you may ask yourself, am I attached to the outcome here, what I want to come of this situation? Or am I giving my fullest attention to that? The moment you're attached to the outcome, ultimately you suffer.

You suffer. And some people still need that, they're not ready to hear, let go of the attachment to the outcome, they're not ready to hear it and need a bit more suffering. As long as you need suffering, you'll get it.

For many people suffering is their spiritual teacher, and eventually it awakens you. When you've suffered enough, and then at that moment when you're ready to not suffer anymore, you've had enough of it, something comes into your life that shows you another way. It could be a book, it could be something you overhear on the radio or television, a comment, or you meet somebody who says something, or you walk in a bookstore and the Power of Now falls off the shelf as you walk.

Which actually happened to one person who told me that story. She walked in and the Power of Now fell off the shelf and she picked it up, and it changed her life. This is why there's a saying, when the student is ready, the teacher appears.

And that's always the case. So don't get too concerned if you know people who you're hoping and wanting that they are ready to hear what you're saying or to get it, and they don't, it's fine, they will in time. If they don't, just a little bit more, they need a little bit more of that teacher that's called suffering.

The most popular spiritual teacher on the planet. The greatest guru. No doubt about that.

A moment of stillness, although the stillness has been there in the background all the time.[Speaker 1] (1:28 - 6:28)
In this lecture, we are going to look at the relationship between quantum mechanics and In quantum mechanics, quantum mechanics is defined as the relationship between quantum Quantum mechanics is defined as the relationship between quantum mechanics and quantum Your state of consciousness is the most important factor in your life. Not what happens to you externally, but your state of consciousness determines how you perceive the world, what actions you take, how you react, and how you behave.

to circumstances and events, your relationships with people and other life forms.

It is, in other words, primary. The primary factor in your life is not the events or whatever circumstances of your life may be, successes, failures, and so on, but your state of consciousness. So you should give your state of consciousness in the present moment, that's when it arises, your consciousness inseparable from the present moment, give it your fullest attention.

It is more important than anything you do externally. And in fact, what you do arises out of your consciousness. So wise or skillful action, action that is helpful and does not create further suffering, further problems, arises out of state that is non-egoic, the state that we may call presence or awareness.

For thousands of years, humans have been trapped in egoic consciousness, and all the ancient spiritual teachings and religions have stressed the fact that there's something dysfunctional within human consciousness, which in many ways is a wonderful thing and quite miraculous, but there's an element of, a strong element of dysfunction in human consciousness that was already there thousands of years ago.

It now is becoming intensified and is amplified by our scientific and technological knowledge. The Buddha stressed the fact that you are condemned to a life of ultimately suffering in one way or another, unless you awaken. So the Buddha pointed to the possibility of awakening, which is a shift into the state of presence out of the egoic state.

And that will change the way in which you experience your life and how you affect others. And in the Christian teachings, the term salvation is often used. So Jesus points to the possibility of salvation because there's something not right.

Jesus said, for example, you are the slaves of sin. Sin, literal translation of the word as used in the Greek Old Testament, New Testament, is missing the mark of human existence. So you fail, there's a failure, missing the mark like an archer who misses the mark.

That's sin, the slaves of sin. And sin is therefore unconsciousness. The destiny of humans is to evolve into the awakened consciousness.

And this is why I am offering you here some doorways into the awakened state.

[Speaker 5] (6:44 - 7:14)
Manifestation, creating things consciously is important, but it's not of primary importance.

[Speaker 1] (7:14 - 9:41)
It is of secondary importance. Important enough, but there's something that's of primary importance, and that is to become conscious of your connectedness with, now, whatever term you want to use to point to it, your connectedness with, your oneness with, that which transcends all manifestation, that which transcends the world of physical forms, also transcends the world of mental forms, emotional forms. It transcends your identity as a person.

To connect with that, connect implies a duality, so it's not really connect. It's to become aware of your oneness with a deeper realm of being. And here, this is a good word.

Being, to become aware of your essential beingness, your essential identity as the I am, which is nothing to do with any mental concept. Mental concepts are also in the realm of forms, of the manifested realm, or sometimes in philosophy, it's called the phenomenal realm. The realm of phenomena, things happen, they arise, they pass away, and then interesting things continuously arise in your personal life and collectively.

There's infinite creativity at work. Just listen to the news tonight, and you see how infinitely creative the universe is in creating extremely challenging problems and situations. The challenges ultimately seem to be a great obstacle in one's life, whether they are of a personal kind or collective kind, and sometimes the two cannot be separated.

[Speaker 2] (9:43 - 10:06)
These often seem to be the greatest obstacle, but as you come to deeper realizations, you begin to see that the challenges are actually a necessary part of finding the path to transcendence.

[Speaker 1] (10:07 - 10:13)
The challenges push you into awakening.

[Speaker 5] (10:14 - 10:20)
They force you, eventually, they force you to awaken. So it's all fine.

[Speaker 1] (10:28 - 20:12)
The most important thing is the realization of the importance of being, which is also the foundation for any kind of manifestation you want to do. I sometimes use this weird analogy. It came to me years ago when I was in meditation.

I was just in a space of thoughtless awareness for quite a while, just sense the beingness of myself. Which is one with the being of the universe. And then I opened my eyes and I started becoming aware of sense perceptions again.

And it very clearly saw, I was actually sitting in a park in London many years ago. And then I looked around, I saw the trees and people in there and the grass and the sky. And then this weird analogy came to me.

It felt like whatever I was perceiving through the senses was a skimmed milk. And what I had just come out of and realized was the cream that is being. Everything arises out of the being.

The being gives rise to forms. The being itself is formless. And so become aware of the cream and then you realize whatever you perceive with your senses, the phenomenal realm is the skimmed milk.

It's one with, of course, skimmed milk is not separate from the cream. It's just thin. It's differentiated kind of.

There's other things in it, more water, but let's not take this too far. This analogy, there's the, so when you realize the I am, and I'm not just, hopefully not just talking about it because as I'm pointing to it, it may be possible for you to verify in your own experience, if only a little bit, verify what it is that I'm pointing to so that it doesn't remain a mere concept. Your own spiritual awakening came about spontaneously while you were in the midst of a depression.

Now you teach people various approaches to awakening, such as paying attention to the inner body. But since your own awakening happened on its own accord, not because of techniques or approaches, what makes you think that what you are teaching will actually work for people since you did not use any of these approaches to awaken? If awakening happens spontaneously, why meditate?

Why pay attention to the inner body? Why invite awakening in any way? Why indeed?

Now you may have noticed I have never said to anybody, you should listen to me or you should pay attention to the inner body or you should be conscious or whatever. But I have never said to anybody, for some people, the awakening happens spontaneously, very quickly. For other people, the awakening is a more gradual process.

And all the things I mentioned in the question, in paying attention to the inner body, meditate, any kind of spiritual work is not separate from the awakening, but it's part of the awakening. It is the awakening consciousness that makes you do these things. It is not something separate from the awakening process, but part of the awakening process.

If you come here more than once, you're awakening. Once could be a mistake. Or if you read an entire book, an entire spiritual book that's truly empowered by spirit and you're enjoying it, you're awakening.

Now you could read a few pages and hate it or you could read an entire book because you had to write a review about it and hate it. That's possible. So there are some exceptions to this, but then you're not enjoying it.

So we can't separate the awakening from what is happening to you right now. You would not be drawn to this if the awakening were not happening. So in other words, you are awakening.

And if you are awakening, then you may feel that a pull towards that, but the pull is not so much, the mind may misinterpret it. It may say, I need to become fully awake. But you're awakening already, right?

It's already happening. That's why you're here and why you're listening. So we can't really separate that.

And another similar question, it's almost the same question as this, is do we do something? These are very two extreme schools of teachings, spiritual teachings. You have to work hard at it.

Otherwise you won't get it, says one. The other one says there's nothing you can do. But you're not going to work hard at it just because somebody tells you you need to work hard at it.

You work hard at it, if you even can call it that. Something wants to come through here, through this form. Something wants to come through you.

And so then you take up some spiritual practice. There's an inner urge to take up spiritual practice. That's the awakening.

It's happening. It wants to make room. And sometimes the awakening makes room drastically, just pushes everything out of the way, like a volcano.

And at other times and more frequently, the awakening is a more gradually eroding of the egoic layers that cover the splendor that's underneath, that which wants to come forth. It's a gradual erosion from within and from without. Suffering helps too, a little bit.

So it's undergoing the process of awakening. So you're awakening already. It's not something that's going to happen.

Doesn't mean that occasionally you can't be asleep. I mean, spiritually speaking, you can still go back to sleep periodically. Most people do.

That's why it's called awakening process. Means there's a falling back, all patterns. You don't go like that.

You go like... And sometimes... No.

No. No. The mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

[Speaker 6] (20:45 - 24:59)
A few months ago, after knowing Eckhart Tolle for a while and studying the books, I woke up and I suddenly got it. I understood suddenly how thought was just an illusory thing and how thought is responsible for, if not all, most of the suffering we experience. And then I suddenly felt like I was looking at these thoughts from another perspective.

And I wondered, who is it that's aware that I'm thinking? And suddenly I was thrown into this expansive, amazing feeling of freedom from myself from my problems. I saw that I was bigger than what I do.

I was bigger than my body. I was everything and everyone. I was no longer a fragment of the universe.

I was the universe. And ever since that day, I've been trying to get back there. It comes and it goes, it's like riding a wave.

Sometimes I'm on, sometimes I'm off, but at least I know where I want to go and that I want to take as many people with me as I possibly can because the feeling is amazing. You know, it's our intention. Our intention is everything.

Nothing happens on this planet without it. Not one single thing has ever been accomplished without intention. So I started thinking about my life and I started thinking about this conference and what we're about and I looked back and I thought, well, I was two people my whole life.

I was in the living room entertaining people, being a monkey, doing my thing for the company and trying to relieve my mother who was suffering. She had rheumatoid arthritis and phlebitis and everything under the sun that was nagging at her and she was depressed and I wanted her to be free and I wanted her to realize that her life was worth something because she gave birth to someone who's worth something. And then I would go into my room and I would sit with a legal pad.

I was a little kid. I would sit there and I would try to figure out what it meant, what it was all about. Why are we here?

What is this? And one day I read something from Buddha that said that all spirituality is about relieving suffering and I suddenly realized that's what I'm doing in the other room and I'm aligned. My purpose is aligned with this.

So I felt incredibly lucky. I lose sight of that all the time. I get caught up in different concerns and ego concerns but I'm so lucky to be a part of this community and to do something that is of value.

[Speaker 1] (25:30 - 1:18:01)
Welcome to our live Easter meditation. You're here not because you want to awaken but because you are awakening. Unless somebody dragged you here or wherever you are, wherever you're here is, if our meditations are deeply enjoyable then you are awakening.

So this is all part of the awakening, the collective awakening process goes far beyond the personal. In fact, that which is transcended in the awakening process is the personal dimension. Transcended does not mean it gets totally eliminated but you go beyond it.

It no longer dominates your consciousness. And in a manner of speaking, you die to the personal dimension. And for some of you or many of you, most of you, it's a gradual dying process.

And for a few, it's a drastic and sudden death. For most, as I said, it's a gradual dying of the being centered in a personalized sense of identity. And that dying of the personal self of which our being together here is a part, that's the Good Friday message.

The truth contained within that. And the death, as I see it, the death of Jesus happens on Friday and the birth of Christ, the resurrection, the rebirth into a different dimension happens at Easter. And until the death of the personal sense of self is voluntarily embraced, it's painful.

But what's even more painful is to be trapped in that narrow sense of self. What is that narrow sense of self? Consciousness is identified with form.

Another way of putting it, consciousness is trapped in form, doesn't know it, dreamlike state. Whenever you get upset about trivial things, what he did or he said or she did or she said or your parents or your spouse or your ex-spouse or money matters and you get upset, and reactive, that's a good indication that consciousness is trapped in form. And then form becomes all important, which is a delusion.

So you are trapped. Another way of putting it, you don't know who you are. Another way of putting it, you are nailed to the cross of matter.

You are nailed, you, consciousness, are nailed to the cross of form. And you suffer. Eventually, you surrender.

In other words, the reactive entity does not operate anymore and then you're free. The awakening to who you are beyond form. The words I'm speaking here are, of course, thought forms, but there is the unseen dimension to our being together here that has nothing to do with thought or sense perceptions, but it's the awareness that is arising of consciousness itself, the formless dimension in you, one could say.

The words which are form, thought forms, continuously point to that. That to which they point is, of course, beyond words, beyond form, is who you are essentially, and you recognize it as we sit together here, that there is something here that is not the words, not what you see, not the image of this person, the form, but something arises from within you that you cannot name, although I occasionally try to find a little word for it, inner space, stillness, awareness itself arises. That's where the person is transcended.

Of course, this is helpful to be here together and enter that dimension or allow that dimension to rise in which the person is transcended. The real challenge is in everyday life, which for many people seems to consist of nothing but the personal and all the personal concerns. And some of you who are able to be here or sometimes when you're not disturbed or you go out into nature or sit quietly in a room, you can become still, alert, present, transcend the personal.

And some of you, yes, you're able to, it's beautiful. The awakening is happening. And some of you are not able yet to sustain it the moment a challenge comes from the world of the personal.

Now, the phone rings. Are you able, when you answer the phone and talk to whoever, your accountant, be there as the person who deals with whatever needs to be dealt with, but also not lose awareness of spaciousness? Let's see the real, your purpose for being here, not just here now on this planet here, is to master that art of being rooted in the impersonal and still dealing with the world of form, the world of matter, the world of thoughts.

Ultimately, more effectively than before, because one of the great benefits of mastering this art of this dancing, the dance between form and formlessness, one of the most wonderful benefits is you lose your fear of form, the world, other people. In other words, you lose fear. And fear is that which blocks love, which would naturally be there in the absence of fear.

Fear ultimately saying form is all there is. Now, a belief that there is something beyond form doesn't help you. Belief, I believe in God, I believe in the spiritual dimension, that doesn't help you because a belief is still a thought form, so you still have fear.

It needs to be an actual realization, not an understanding thing as, oh, now I understand. No, it's not that kind of realization. A knowing, non-conceptual knowing, a living knowing of that in you that is formless, that is still, present, alert, spacious.

You have to bring that into this world, into the world of madness. Madness meaning the complete, absence of transcendence. Otherwise, the world makes you mad.

And whenever you go back into the world, you become mad again, like everybody else. So you can bring sanity to the world, or you can allow the world to make you mad, draw you into its madness. Whenever you're fighting something or someone, the world is drawing you into its madness.

Of course, somebody 2,000 years ago, already said that, forgive your enemies, is basically the same thing, saying the same thing. Don't fight anything or anybody. Fighting is a form of self-destruction.

It's an inner state of consciousness, a reactive state of consciousness. Any reactivity is a form of fighting. So you have all the fights in the world that are not working because they are fights, the fight against terrorism, the fight against drugs, the fight against crime, the fight against poverty, the fight against illness.

So these are not solutions, they add to the problems. The solutions, that's not really solutions, there is one solution to all the problems, which is find the transcendent dimension in you. And it's not a question of saying, okay, I found it now, what's next?

By finding means to continuously live that knowing. It's not a once, okay, I found it now, I'm awakened. It's a continuous knowing in the background of your life, non-conceptual.

Awareness stays with you. That's what it is. Shines through the personal.

And then through that, the light that shines through the person that was before was so heavy and dense, that is what transcendence means. Now, I had quite a few questions about, well, two things, one, quite a few questions about the refugees or migrants that are pouring into Europe, how some here that I picked at random and then there are others, how best to be in a state of compassion and so on. It's already wonderful to see that there is a lot of compassion and especially in some countries, like Scandinavian countries, Germany, and so on.

There is a lot of openness and compassion towards the suffering of others. And it's heartening to see that. There's also a lot of fear in other countries and also in Germany and Scandinavia of what might happen to their society, their cultural values, if there's a continuing inflow of people.

So it's a question of balancing the heart and the head. A time will come when there will be no more borders, but at the moment, just as a time will come when we don't need laws anymore, but for the time being, they still have a function. If we open borders totally, then of course, the entire social system would break down.

There are not enough jobs for everybody. There's nowhere to live. After a while, if millions and millions come in, that would be the end.

So compassion is wonderful and needs to be balanced with wisdom, compassion and wisdom as a balance. The middle way, the Buddha's recommendation is the middle way. The challenge is initially on a physical level, finding accommodation and work.

A greater challenge is the integration, which hasn't really been done very well in most countries. So they need to focus on that, because if they don't focus on the integration, it could lead to huge challenges for the society. Which would be fine too, because humans evolve through challenges.

But if you can have wisdom, then you'd no longer need a huge challenge to develop because by applying wisdom to a situation, which means a balanced view, by applying wisdom to a situation, you prevent it from becoming a huge challenge. And if you cannot apply wisdom to a situation, then it will become a huge challenge. And that will be fine too, because humans evolve through challenges.

Wisdom usually means that, yes, there'll still be challenges, but you don't create gigantic challenges for yourself. In the absence of wisdom, you do. That's...

So it's an interesting fact that not only for individuals, but also for the collectives, there's a continuous, one thing after another arises. Oh no, now this. First it was Greece was the big challenge.

And now you have an even bigger challenge. It's as if some script writer for the drama, the collective drama, infinitely creative script writing. Okay, what can we do now for the next episode of humanity?

Now let's give them that. It's a challenge for, of course, for the refugees themselves. It's a huge challenge.

And for the others where they go to, it's also becoming a challenge and could become a huge challenge. Mindset, people, these people come from different places that represent different forms of conditioning of their mind, just as in the West, the mind is conditioned in certain ways. So in the West is only just arrived at certain insights through painful, very painful, insane behavior that they manifest in until recently.

They've only just arrived at a fragile realization of the importance of seeing another person's point of view or another coming to a compromise rather than wanting my way or our way through incredible suffering that they inflicted on themselves. They've now arrived at this fragile point where they value tolerance and compassion. And that's been a long road and it could be lost again easily.

It's only just, it's part of the growth of, it implies some diminishment of ego in order to practice tolerance and compassion means on a collective level, there has been some diminishment of ego and it has happened through suffering that was self-inflicted through endless wars culminating in the insanity of the first and second world war and genocide and so on. So all that self-inflicted suffering has finally brought them to this point and it has been going on for centuries. The gradual equality for women to value equally man and woman is also relatively recent.

We've arrived at now, the separation of church and state also was a relative recent achievement and that took centuries again of struggle. And not all parts of the world have arrived yet at that stage. They're still stuck in other more intolerant mindsets.

And this is why the integration is very important because integration means, are they able to adapt to our mindset? Now, there are some people who say, all cultures are totally equal, it's just different. I would suggest that there is such a thing as a development in cultural values and the development of collective consciousness.

And if a society displays compassion and tolerance towards others, that is a sign that there has been a development in consciousness in that society. If another society displays intolerance, then that hasn't happened yet. Even in European societies, not that long ago, there was huge intolerance.

So what is the mindset that people come with? Are they able to undergo the shift? That is the question.

Is there going to develop an alternative society that has a totally different mindset within the same country that remains to be seen? It is a challenge. There are many good signs.

It's wonderful to see the compassion that is in many humans now in Europe. And it is also understandable that in others, there's also fear. There are some small minorities in Europe that are very unconscious, that violently attack or try to attack immigrants, but that group is relatively small.

So let's see where this challenge takes us. Humanity ultimately is going to evolve as a whole, as a single organism, more and more. So, and it seems natural that there's more coming together now of cultures that before were totally separate.

Now it's growing into something that we cannot foresee what form exactly it will take. Societies that are still in a different mindset, there are still places on the planet where the collective mindset corresponds to the Middle Ages in Europe. Not saying that those places cannot have humans who are highly evolved, just as in the medieval times in Europe, there were human beings.

Some human beings were deeply spiritual, egoless and highly evolved. Even within those societies which collectively were quite ignorant and deeply, deeply in the grip of the collective ego, which in Middle Ages in Europe took the form of religious dogma and so on. So there are still some societies which are at about that time period.

So that the shift can be speeded up. If they come to the West, to what extent can they go beyond their mindset and not all the refugees are from those parts of the world because the Middle East, there are many different energy fields. Syria is not the same as Afghanistan.

It's not the same as Iraq and so on. There were ancient cultures in many of those places that predate European culture. And Islam, for example, in itself, Islam in the Middle Ages was more advanced and more tolerant than Christianity, more culturally advanced.

And so it's not the religion. A religion does not exist outside the consciousness of the people who practice the religion. So really it's what is the state of consciousness of the people who practice the religion.

It doesn't exist outside of that. It's something in human consciousness. This is a huge thing that perhaps some other time we can talk about it in more detail.

So let's welcome the challenge and see if you, on a personal level, if you live in Europe and you can help, you feel called upon to help, that's a wonderful thing to do. Thank you. The question is whether at this moment you can know or sense within yourself that underlying presence that is deeper than the person.

And it's very hard. It's very intangible. It's very elusive.

You can't say it's here or it's there. It's all pervasive. It's your own presence.

And if you're thinking very much, you can't sense it, not while you're engaged in thinking about it. Okay, where is the presence? I'm trying to find it, but I can't.

I wonder if I'm doing something wrong. Well, the only thing you're doing wrong is you're trying to find it through thinking. So if thinking subsides for a moment, what remains seems like nothing at first, a spacious, just a space.

But in that space, which at first seems like nothing and certainly doesn't seem interesting, that space, if you don't immediately run away from it, and then gradually you begin to sense that there is a depth there and a peace, and there is more to it than one could ever put into words to that emptiness. And that connects you with something that transcends the thinking mind, but without which there would be no thinking. That is the ripple becoming aware of its own depths where it is more than the ripple.

And then the ripple continues to be a ripple for a little while, but the way in which it experiences the world, the surface world, actually is different because it senses a deep connectedness with something that it cannot be named really, something deep and vast. And it can sense that as the foundation for its life at the very essence of its life. Could you speak about the role of conscience in the awakening experience?

How is the sense of moral right and wrong manifest in the egoic state versus a more awakened state? Conscience. The strange thing is that in some languages such as French or Spanish, consciousness and conscience are the same word.

They don't have separate words for consciousness and conscience. English has separate words, German has separate words, French and Spanish don't. I don't know about other languages.

So conscience, of course, is an intuitive knowing of right and wrong. And deep down, everybody has that in the same way that deep down, everybody has consciousness that may be obscured by the egoic mind. And it's only when presence begins to run your life, you live predominantly through presence that there's absolutely no longer any doubt about right and wrong.

Right action happens spontaneously. You don't inflict suffering on others in order to enhance or protect yourself. The ego may talk about conscience or what's right or wrong, but when it comes to actual situations, the ego will always serve itself first.

So it will inflict suffering on others without knowing it. In the egoic state, you have no empathy. The more you're in the grip of the ego, the less empathy you have with other humans or other life forms.

So there's a complete absence of the conscience. The ability to have empathy is covered up. It's there somewhere deep down, but it's covered up.

And you cannot sense your way into another human being, which is what empathy is. So it's almost like suffering from a disability, certainly a dysfunction. And that is where this huge amount of suffering is created by humans for other humans, including killings, because you don't know what you are doing anymore.

Not anymore, you don't know what you're doing. In the words of Jesus on the cross, forgive them for they know not what they do. And not knowing what you do, some you may ask, what do you mean they don't know what they do?

If you have a terrorist like the man in Norway who goes around shooting people, he has a certain rational, seemingly rational explanations for what he's doing. He explains it all, he can write it down, saying this is all, it all makes sense to me, he says. In what sense can we possibly say he doesn't know, he knows full well what he's doing?

Well, yes, he knows on the level of conceptual knowing, he knows what he's doing. But there are two ways of knowing in a human being. One is the conceptual knowing.

When I walk in the forest, I know the forest to some extent conceptually. The trees, I know the names of some of the trees or plants. I know the name of the forest.

I can, I have other conceptual knowledge, I even know myself as the form that I am. Eckhart is walking in the forest. Conceptually, I know what's happening, I can explain it.

I'm walking in the forest, I'm seeing this tree, I'm seeing that, I'm smelling the air now. And this and that, I can explain it. I can name it and know it conceptually.

But whether I'm truly experiencing the forest depends on whether another level of knowledge is active or activated in me. And that's non-conceptual knowing. And in non-conceptual knowing, when I look at a tree, and I can feel and I can sense the tree's being or aliveness.

And I can perceive the totality of the forest with all the look around and feel the, I can feel the energy field of the forest. Without any labeling, I feel the aliveness of it. I know it, but not through concepts.

I also know myself walking in the forest, but not as a concept. Me, Eckhart, the writer, is walking in the forest as a concept. But I can, I can sense the consciousness that I am and that is the deeper knowing.

And it's only through the consciousness that I am that I can be aware beyond concepts of the aliveness all around me. And only then am I in wonder and awe of the forest. Before, if I only have conceptual knowledge of the forest, I may have some ideas in my head that say, oh, it's a nice forest, but I don't really know that.

I certainly wouldn't be able to feel the sacredness of the forest. I wouldn't know the forest on that level. I would only know it on a superficial level.

And so, because so many humans are identified with concepts, the entire consciousness consists of an accumulation of concepts, including concepts they have about themselves, which is the ego. Concepts they have about others, they relate to others through their mental concepts. Naming, judging, opinions.

And concepts easily get agitated. The bundle of concepts in people's heads in the absence of a deeper level of knowing, very often these bundles of concepts that people consist of become agitated about other concepts. That's the ego.

Just look on the internet, how about people, what they write. Some people get angry and upset. It's full of that.

Aggression. Concepts fighting other concepts. They're not relating to other human beings.

It's a conceptualised reality, trying to survive. It's all part of the madness of the ego. So the question is whether conscience implies an ability to empathise.

And you can only have empathy... if the second, the deeper level of knowing has become activated in you, so that you're no longer trapped in concepts. Can use them, but you're not trapped, imprisoned by concepts.

Then you suddenly realise when you relate to another human, you empathise, which means... The word, by the way, is only about, I think 200 years old or something like that. It came into English via German, translating a German term, which wasn't also created about that time.

The German word is Einfühlung, which means to feel yourself into someone. And then you don't... You know, now you know what you do.

You cannot, in fact, you cannot inflict... ..suffering when you have empathy. Then something stops you.

It's like you're doing it to yourself. There seems to be a gradual growth of the ability to empathise. If you look at the past, when humans, for example, they loved watching executions in the village square or the city square, and laughing at disability was also common.

Disabled people were treated very badly. It seems that not being able to laugh it was harder for them to empathise. Who knows?

There's even a book I came across recently, quite interesting, that somebody wrote an account of... I don't remember, unfortunately, the name of the author. He wrote an account of world history from the point of view of the growth of empathy.

And the title of the book is Empathic Civilisation. So, it all is to do with the two levels of knowing. Knowing through concepts, it has its place, but does not make you into a...

..full human being. It's only when the deeper level is activated... ..we could call that unitive knowing, then you become truly human. What is the role of sex in consciousness? How should it be approached as a way to be more awake? Are lust and casual sex a detriment to consciousness?

Are they always detrimental? LAUGHTER Well, let's see if I can remember. LAUGHTER No, sex, of course, is a wonderful thing.

We could call it an addiction that nature has built into the human so that they continue to survive as a species, because if that addiction were not built in, that causes pleasure, if that were not built into the human body, who would engage in that absurd act? Because it's such a pull, it does have a tendency of making humans unconscious. You may have observed it in yourself when it takes over.

It's a very strong pull that you go... LAUGHTER ..or you may go into your mind.

[Speaker 10] (1:18:02 - 1:18:05)
LAUGHTER So it's either out there...

[Speaker 2] (1:18:07 - 1:18:10)
..or you go...

[Speaker 1] (1:18:10 - 1:29:39)
LAUGHTER And, of course, it pulls you towards where it wants to go, which is the final orgasm. That's where it wants you to go. So, tantra is an ancient Indian way of engaging in sexuality without losing consciousness, but growing in consciousness through it, bringing consciousness into something that usually would make you unconscious.

And the simple thing is to become the observer at any stage, so that you... Let's say the sexual impulse arises, for whatever reason, you see something or think of something, or someone, rather, to bring awareness to it without needing to take it anywhere, to bring awareness to it and just feel it and sense it and be the awareness for it. And if you're with another person, not necessarily engage in the full act of sexuality, but even if it's just a touching, to be aware with that, bring awareness to that, to the sense perceptions, so that awareness arises even as the impulse is there.

You meet it with awareness. And that's a beautiful spiritual practice, and then you don't always need to take it to the end. You can actually enjoy it more than when it takes you over and makes you unconscious.

I call it an addiction. It really becomes a true addiction when it takes over your mind, and then you compulsively seek sexual partners, in which case it really pulls you towards more and more unconsciousness and becomes one of the ways in which the mind seeks fulfillment and never finds it. And that's where the song implies, I can't get no satisfaction.

And then you need the next fix. It can become a true addiction in the conventional sense, like a drug. It can become that.

If there's a sexual impulse, let's say you look at a man or a woman and there's a slight sexual impulse, you can just be with that. And that's the beginning of tantra. You don't need to go anywhere.

You don't need to go up to that person and say whatever your pickup line is. But just be allowed to watch the beauty of it, the male form, the female form, and be aware, and at any stage bring awareness to it. This applies to anything that tends to make you unconscious, any strong urge, like let's say overeating, if that is your urge, if you can bring awareness to the impulse of wanting to eat before acting on it, that is tantra too.

Anything that usually pulls you to unconsciousness, when you bring awareness into it, you actually use it in your growth of awareness. The very thing that before made you unconscious can then be used and make you more conscious. So if your impulse is to overeat and in the middle of the night you find yourself, without you knowing it, you got up and your hand is on the refrigerator door, and in that moment you wake up, I mean truly wake up, and feel the urge to open the door and take out the chocolate cake, then you can observe the impulse inside you and you can sit down for a couple of minutes and feel this urge to indulge in the need to take something in and feel it fully. You may find sometimes it subsides as you bring awareness to it. It begins to subside.

If it doesn't subside, maybe you still have to eat the chocolate cake, but at least there was some awareness and if you bring awareness into the eating, ah, because it's only you really overeat when you lose awareness. If you eat consciously, we have Janine here who wrote a book about it. She could talk to you much better, explain it much better than I can.

So bring awareness to the act of eating, then I believe, I've never actually had the problem of overeating. I've had other addictions, but that wasn't one. If you bring awareness to it, the desire to overeat, I would say, would quickly subside if you eat consciously.

So anything that pulls you usually towards unconsciousness, use it as awareness practice. There could be any other addiction too. Drug, whatever drug, whatever substance you use, feel the need inside you.

Feel it arise. Watch it, observe it. Allow it to be there so that it doesn't take you over.

It's only when you're unaware that these things can completely take you over. So you're not fighting it as such. Awareness never fights it.

Awareness is really the space in which it arises because you're not fighting against it. You're not pushing it down. Don't do that with sex because they've tried that for hundreds of years.

Aesthetics, religious practices, pushing it down, it makes it far worse because then it seeks channels that are actually quite destructive. Because sexuality is such an enormous urge, you can't push it down. Rather than pushing it down, it would be preferable to have a different sexual partner every night.

It's probably preferable to pushing it down. So that's not the answer. But to meet it in awareness, that's where whatever would usually be an addictive urge that makes you unconscious, meet it in the space of awareness where then it comes in there and it goes, shh, and maybe another wave comes, shh, and in that spaciousness that you are, it comes in and talks.

It's like a dark cloud. It comes into the space of the blue expanse and then it goes, shh, and then another one comes, shh. So whatever the impulse is, awareness is the answer, not fighting against it.

And, of course, cutting the link also in sexuality, especially the link between thinking and the sexual urge. Otherwise it can keep you awake at night. You see the source of power in that teacher, which it isn't.

It's in you. Very good teachers. It's time for you to leave now.

I'm thinking about the evolution of spirituality and how over time more people have had access and it's moved from a situation where... Yeah, this is nerve-wracking. Anyways, it's moved from a situation where often esoteric mysticism was not accessible and now it's much more accessible.

And I'm curious if you see a point in the future where the student-teacher, the guru-student relationship will begin to pass in favor of a direct feed where we're able to draw in the wisdom directly ourselves or maybe through something like Bohem Krishna Murli Dialoguing where it's an instinctual process. And my concern is, I think as long as there's a student-teacher relationship, we're always looking up to the person who can rather than looking into ourselves. Yes.

Thank you. Thank you. And this is very true.

This is why it's often a wonderful thing for people who have been following a particular teaching or teacher. It's a wonderful thing for the followers when the teacher finally passes away. I have no immediate plans, and often they're distraught when it happens.

They feel abandoned because there was such an attachment. There was ego in that too, but they didn't know it. They feel like a child.

Suddenly the main parent figure is gone. So they're thrown back upon themselves. And some of them remain in that state of disorientation, but others are able to suddenly realize what they didn't realize before.

But I hope this is not the case here. It's more likely to happen if they kind of almost worship a guru-like figure, which there's still quite a few of those around in the world. Then it's much more likely that you see the source of power in that teacher, which it isn't.

It's in you. So it's if the teacher... Some teachers actually send their disciples away.

They're very good teachers. They say, it's time for you to leave now. What?

[Speaker 10] (1:29:39 - 1:29:40)
Oh my God.

[Speaker 1] (1:29:41 - 1:34:41)
Yes. So you're ready. It's like a little bird.

The time comes when the bird has to leave the nest. Don't be like this 30-year-old man who refuses to move out of his parents' home. So it's to be able...

It's not only the teacher. It's also the teaching to be able to use the help that the universe gives you. You know the famous phrase, when the student is ready, the teacher appears.

So when you are ready, whatever corresponds to your state of consciousness, helpful thing comes to you. It could be a book. It could be something, a person you meet or something like this.

So I believe that the guru-disciple relationship perhaps eventually will disappear in its traditional form and will be replaced by something more informal. This already is a little bit more informal. There's not that attachment, I hope, to the figure of the...

There's not all the confusion between the vehicle through which the teaching comes and the teaching. And I sometimes say I feel like a window frame. And of course, the light comes through the window.

And so don't confuse the frame, the window frame with that which transcends all form. When you can sense the presence sitting here and your mind might interpret it as perhaps coming from me, but when you can sense the presence, where do you sense it? It's in you.

You sense it in you. A good teacher always encourages you not to become attached, to go your own way. If you don't need to come back to another retreat, that's great.

And if you... Increasing number of people will begin... I know that many people who are here will become, and some already are, teachers in their own right.

So that's... Whether it's formal or informal, whether it's part of a certain practice, they might be therapists already or they might be working as counselors with people or they might be engaged in education or in healthcare, many different capacities. And gradually, they already, by being present, they disseminate the teaching and the words may accompany that.

So many of you are growing into the role of teacher, which has its own danger because, again, we've talked about it a few times, the danger is that a conceptual identity arises in your mind of you as a great teacher. And that will be a block. But you can sense the power that is in you that is different, but that is not superior to anybody.

It's very hard to explain, but you need to be careful of any conceptual identity and then there will be more and more teachers arising, not just a few. And so I believe that's the way we are going because that means some humans awaken before others awaken. And those that awaken before others awaken, they become teachers, either formal teachers or informal teachers.

In the Course in Miracles, it says anybody who practices in their daily life the Course in Miracles is called teacher of God. You become a teacher of God the moment you start practicing presence. Even if you don't speak the words that are out of presence, simply by being, for example, in a non-reactive mode in relationship with people, by sensing an outflow of goodwill towards other humans with decreasing judgment in your mind about others, all this, you become a teacher.

You become a teacher of God. So the answer is there will not just be a few isolated famous figures, but more and more teachers will arise, which are those who awaken before others begin to awaken. And then inevitably they become teachers.

Welcome, friends. Welcome to our special School of Awakening webinar with Eckhart Tolle. My name is Tammy Simon.

I'm the founder of Sounds True, and it is absolute joy to be your host for this session. We're going to begin our live session with Eckhart guiding us through a meditation on pure awareness. This is a meditation that he originally introduced at our very first School of Awakening that took place two years ago, and I'm so glad that this larger public audience will have the chance to experience the meditation as part of this webinar.

For those of you who are just learning about the School of Awakening for the very first time, let me tell you just a little bit more about this program. The Eckhart Tolle School of Awakening is the most advanced and in-depth learning program that Eckhart Tolle and Kim Ang teach. It's a five-month immersion program that this year includes two virtual retreats along with monthly teachings and meditations with Eckhart and Kim, all in the context of a vibrant online learning community.

The goal of the School of Awakening is to intensify presence and align with the awakening process that many people are already undergoing. If you want to learn more about the School of Awakening, you can just click the button on this page. Also, please note that we're in the final enrollment period for the School of Awakening, and that's because the program starts at the end of this month.

The first day of school is soon. It starts on March 27th. Again, we'll be starting our webinar with a guided pure awareness practice, and then following that, I'll ask Eckhart some questions that we've received from the Eckhart Tolle community about the awakening process.

And now, as I said, a great joy to welcome Eckhart Tolle. Eckhart?

Hi, Tammy. Hi, everybody. Nice to see you.

Well, I don't see everybody, but you see me. So apparently, we are starting with a pure awareness meditation, if we want to call it that. Pure awareness is an interesting idea.

Well, it's not an idea. It only becomes an idea when we talk about it. Pure awareness is beyond any idea or concept.

It's the essence of who you are, and most people go through life without ever encountering that dimension of their being, and that's a great pity. I often use the term form identity and essence identity. Your form identity is whatever you add after you say, I am, whatever you add to that statement, I am, is part of your form identity.

Usually, people would start with, and identity is very important for everybody. Everybody is looking for a stronger sense of identity. It starts in childhood already.

So it's after meeting the basic needs of food and shelter, one could almost say, the next thing that arises is not a physical need, but a deep-seated psychological need, and that is a need for an identity. So everybody is searching. It starts in early childhood already.

They're searching for a more stable, more secure, more expanded sense of who they are, sense of identity, sense of self. So everybody is searching. So wherever you go, lots of the things you see on the internet, it's a search for an identity.

So let's just explore what you would add to, if you said, I am, the normal things that you would probably add is perhaps your gender, a very popular subject these days, used to be a very simple subject. Now it's much more complex, but for our purposes here, it's not complex. Whatever it is that you want to add as your gender is fine.

I am. And then other things come, of course, perhaps racial things are also very much in the forefront these days. So perhaps that would come to you also next.

White, black, whatever, shade of color, doesn't matter. You add that because it has become part of your sense of self, your sense of identity. And then, of course, there's the body, whether it's old or young, your age.

You add, I have such and such an old, an old white, black man, woman, whatever, and so on. And then it goes on after that to do with your, say, station in life, perhaps work, profession, or your relationship to other human beings, mother, father, daughter, and so on. Anything else that you have incorporated into your sense of self and manufactured a sense of self out of that.

Possessions, perhaps you are a big person who has lots of possessions. I am the owner of a company. I am the owner of a private jet.

That would be a big sense of identity. Or perhaps you have the opposite. You might have developed a sense of identity of somebody who has less than others and been disadvantaged all their lives.

And then you have an equally big sense of identity. I'm somebody who has been treated unfairly by life. It's terrible.

Another big, also part of your identity, negative or positive, doesn't matter. You add more, things accumulate in your inner space and you hold them together with your name. That's your, my name is such and such.

The name becomes the receptacle for all the other things that you put in there that you derive your sense of self from. And then you say, oh, well, that's me. And it's never quite very satisfying for long.

And it's very rarely enough. That's the strange thing about that sense of self. And this is what I call the form identity.

And it's fine. Everybody has one, nothing wrong with that. So you acknowledge your form identity.

You don't need to say, I don't want to have a form identity. You have a form identity. As long as you're here as this particular form, you have a form identity, whatever it may be.

And it's fine. The problem is that there's always a sense of, there's still something missing of the things that I have in here that I've put into this receptacle. This is my name.

And I've put in all those things that I identify with as me. And then this thing's not quite right. I need something else.

More needs to be put in. So there's always a sense of dissatisfaction that arises very quickly. I'm not enough, ultimately.

There's something missing in life, in my life. I don't know what. And you come up with all kinds of things.

And the awakening, spiritual awakening, begins with the realization that there is more to you than that. And this more to you is your essence identity. And you find your essence identity if as an experiment now, let's say we have a board, a blackboard or a whiteboard.

And on this board we have written, I am. And then imagine whatever you would have added to that, a list of things that you feel is you, gender, age, profession, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera. You add that.

I am. Let's say you add it vertically to me. And that for our meditation, or it's not really meditation, it's a little experiment.

You take a, whatever it is you do, you used to erase whatever is written on the board. I used to have chalk and a sponge. You would erase what's written with chalk on the blackboard.

So you get that. And you start just for the best. What is left of me if I temporarily, just for this moment, I erase what I have added to I am.

So you, whatever it is, mother, father, profession, gender, race, et cetera, age, opinions about yourself. I'm the best that's ever been, or the worst that's ever lived. That too is a concept that you have identified with.

There are concepts that you accumulate there. And you erase just temporarily. So you don't give it any more attention.

It's gone. And then even the last thing, the receptacle itself, the name, you can temporarily erase that. I don't remember my name.

I don't remember my email address. I don't remember my gender. So what's, in order that you have to let go of all the accumulated concepts, because there are ultimately all mental concepts that gave you your sense of self.

You let go of the mental concepts. What is left of me? If there's no more anger, no mental concept left of who I am.

There's only I am. Is the essence of me gone? Or is the essence of who I am still there?

If I don't even remember my past or any conceptual thing about me. I'm so present at this moment. That all I know, and I'm talking for you, I'm so present at this moment that all I know is that I am.

Now, if you can just add a glimpse of that. What is left? What is that?

I am. And there's no concept there anymore. But what is that feeling?

Is it a feeling? That sense of being. That sense of I am.

Being and I am is the same thing. To be is the infinitive, and I am is the first person singular. They just sound very different.

Really, you should be saying I be, but English language has developed in a different way. I am, it comes from being. All you are left with is a sense of beingness or presence.

And then you ask yourself, is anything vital, anything of absolute value, lost now? Am I essentially still here? Without referring to any concepts about myself or any thoughts.

And you'll become aware at this moment that you are aware because that awareness is what's left. When you take everything away, that beingness, that sense of presence or beingness that you cannot define is what's left. We can use certain words to talk about it or to point to it, yes.

But in itself, it is beyond words, beyond concepts, beyond thoughts. So there is a space in you that is beyond words, concepts, and thoughts, that is beyond thinking, but you're not asleep. There is that space in you that is always there underneath the fluctuation of words, concepts, and thoughts.

They're all thoughts, ultimately. Thoughts are inner words. Underneath this fluctuation of concepts and words, there is a sense of presence or beingness of I am.

And this sense of, this is pure awareness or consciousness that gets absorbed by thoughts. It flows into the sense of I, flows into, it animates the concepts in the mind. And then you derive your sense of self from the concepts without realizing that that which animates the concepts is the awareness, the pure awareness.

And so it's not realizing the essence of your being and moving only on the surface of life, the surface of the ocean of being. That's your form identity is what happens on the surface of the ocean of being. Waves and ripples and waves clashing and all kinds of things.

And every wave thinks it's me, I am, a wave. It doesn't realize it's the ocean. So what animates, what gives life to all the things that you identify with, which are ultimately concepts, because you don't identify with objects, you seem to, let's say you have possessions, you identify with the possessions, but you experience the possessions.

How do you experience them? You experience them as mental concepts. My house, my car, my private jet.

You experience them as concepts in your mind and you attach the my to it, the sense of, you associate a thing with a sense of self, but the thing is experienced as a concept. Maybe there is no car, maybe the whole thing is, maybe the whole thing is, you live in that matrix and everything is made up. Nobody knows whether the actual, the external world is actually there or it's being created as a dream of consciousness.

But all you know is you can't know whether the, what is it? The Aston Martin or the Ferrari that you derive some of your sense of identity from is actually there or you have made it up in your mind. But all you know is that you have this thing in your mind and that's your car.

You have form identity, nothing wrong with that. You need to operate, be able to operate on this level of form. Yes, use your mind, but the essence identity is there that is underneath all that.

And if you don't find that, I call it the deep eye sometimes as opposed to the surface eye. So the surface eye is whatever you add to I am. The deep eye is the realization of beingness of I am.

And the two can live together. They are compatible. It doesn't mean you can have either one or the other.

You can have one leg. So to speak a metaphorical leg, you can have one leg in the being and one leg in the form identity. It's a deep eye and the surface eye.

And that is the purpose as I see it of human life is to be able to live in that way where you are rooted in the I am and you're able to deal with the things of this world and continue to have a form identity, but you no longer exclusively derive your sense of self from that. It's a relatively superficial sense of self for a little while, but your deep sense of being becomes from another place. And that is a place really that is at that level, you are one with every other human being and every other being.

It's the level of oneness. On the level of form identity, you need the other because without the other, you cannot define yourself. You always need something that's not you.

Imagine, let's say, your racial identity is strong. A very important part of who you are is your race. And it's fine.

You can honor that. As a little thought experiment from science fiction, let's say you suddenly want, suddenly the ETs come and they transport you to another planet where everybody is exactly the same race and exactly the same skin color as you. There's no other anymore.

At that moment, your entire sense of who you are as this race would collapse because without the other, that race doesn't even exist. They wouldn't have a name for it. If you went to a planet where everything is green, every object and everything is green, they would not have a word for green, obviously.

You need the other. So for your form identity, you always need the other. And the ego very strongly emphasizes the other.

It needs the other to be as other as possible so that I can sense this, my sense of self ultimately. If it's only your form identity, it's fictitious. To sense myself, to sense more strongly, I need to have the other, more other.

We can see it everywhere in this world. You need to emphasize the otherness of others. It's an egoic need to strengthen your identity.

It's an illusion, and it leads to a lot of turmoil and suffering and chaos. But it's the ego at work. You have to recognize that and go to that deeper place where there is no other.

And that is the awareness. And then you can do some good in this world. You can bring about a different world because you're no longer trapped in the world of needing to make the others other as other as possible.

It's an egoic delusion. Terrible, terrible. So here we have the deep eye.

For here, for all purposes, just experiencing the deep eye, even if it's just a glimpse. Letting go of concepts. What remains when you wipe clean what you've written on the board after the I am, and all that's left is I am.

Pre-ness, presence. And then as you become familiar with that place, so to speak, it deepens, and you can sense the power that resides in you, which is the power of consciousness itself, which is the essence of everything. You can sense that power, but it's not power over others because in that power there is no other.

You have power without having power over others. It's the inherent power of the universe. And you can sense it now, perhaps only as a glimpse right now.

As I stop speaking for five seconds, you can sense it now as a glimpse, and that's a good start. Oh, and you don't know much about it on that level. What can you say about it?

Not much. That's fine. And then you become more, then you sense it more strongly, and then it begins to even change the way in which you operate on your form identity.

It actually, it makes a difference to that also. Pure awareness is simply then being aware right now, being aware that you are aware. Sounds strange.

Being aware that you are conscious. Being aware that you are consciousness. Better way of putting it.

So that's the essence of all spiritual practice. Just that. It's not complicated.

So it's taken us 25 minutes to explain the essence of all spiritual practice. No, don't need to read all the books anymore. Just practice.

[Speaker 3] (2:01:03 - 2:01:44)
Wonderful, thank you, Eckhart. As I mentioned at the beginning, we've received questions from the Eckhart Tolle community and have chosen a few to ask you here. And here's the first one.

This person wrote in, you're offering a new school of awakening, but can spiritual awakening actually be taught like other subjects that are taught? Your own awakening was spontaneous. If spiritual awakening can be taught, tell me more about that.

And why do you feel now is the time for us to come together and explore these deeper teachings? Oh, right.

Would everybody benefit from spiritual teaching? No. Not everybody would benefit from spiritual teaching.

There needs to be a readiness in you, which is very hard to define what that is. There needs to be a readiness for you to receive the teaching so that it can accelerate your awakening. Now, when I say accelerate your awakening, that implies that something has already started.

Something has already opened up in you. And there's still many humans who not only would they not be interested in hearing any spiritual teaching, many would even feel hostile towards it if they had to listen to it. They'd feel almost as a personal attack.

There are many humans who are still extremely self-possessed, which means possessed by the egoic sense of self. And there's no opening for anything else. They still believe that they can make it.

They are basically in total control of their lives and they're going to make it or whatever the ideas is that they have in their minds. And even the suggestion that there is a power that is beyond who they are as a person, even to hear that suggestion would be regarded as a personal insult. So not everybody can be reached.

Not everybody is ready. Many young people are still not, although many are ready, but as if you're very young, the ego is still forming and you think you're not open yet to receiving what the spiritual teaching has to offer. And often I've met many, many accounts of people who have come to me and said, somebody gave me your book 15 years ago and I opened it.

And I thought it was just complete mumbo jumbo complete mumbo jumbo. There was even a reviewer quite a few years ago in Time Magazine who actually wrote that. He or she, I can't remember, wrote a review of the power of now and described it as mumbo jumbo.

And of course, from the reviewer's point of state of consciousness, that was an absolutely correct statement because that is how they perceived it. And so people have come to me, said somebody gave me that book and I opened it was just, what is this? I read a page, they said, and I didn't understand a word.

What's he talking about? They put it on a shelf. Five, six years later, they picked it up and opened it.

Many people have told me similar accounts. They opened it, wow. Suddenly it all made sense.

What does it mean? They recognized the truth in it. But what happened in the meantime from the time when they were given the book and it was meaningless to when they opened it up again, they suffered.

They suffered, something happened. They lost something vital. They experienced some kind of perhaps a serious illness or had an accident or somebody close to them died or their business collapsed.

They became ill, whatever, something happened and created suffering and the suffering created a crack in the egoic, dense egoic cell. And then there was an opening suddenly. And then there was a recognition.

The spiritual teaching, a school of spirituality, of awakening, it doesn't really teach you anything new. It's always perceived as a recognition. It's a recognition.

Ah, and there's an immediate realization. Oh yes, I knew that. I could not have said it, but I recognize the truth of that.

So it addresses the deeper level of who you are. So in other words, it requires a minimum degree of awareness for there to be a receptivity to spiritual teaching so that spiritual teaching can be helpful. Without that, it's not helpful at all.

So at this minimum degree of awareness is, yes, it's awareness or presence, which is the same thing, the same no thing. Awareness or presence is the dimension of consciousness that is beyond thinking. And that is realized the moment you stop thinking without falling asleep, for example, now.

And you realize you are still very much there when you're not thinking. But a deeper dimension of you is there when you're not thinking. And of course, that is in a spiritual school or school of awakening, that deeper dimension is pulled out of you more.

That is helpful. It would come anyway. Life ultimately is the greatest spiritual teacher.

So, but a spiritual teaching can accelerate it. But what otherwise would take much more longer time, that realization. So it can be taught.

What can be taught is partly, let's say one could divide it, three parts to it can be taught. One is, what can be taught is making people aware of what it is in them, that what are the greatest obstacles or hindrances to the full unfolding of their consciousness. What are the hindrances in you?

What are the obstacles in you? If your spiritual teaching can help you, you can point out what the obstacles are. They are all part of the ego.

The obstacles are like reactivity, becoming aware of the various ways in which you react to things, becoming aware of identification with your thoughts when anxiety, worry arise, becoming aware that you are not your thoughts, explaining how the pain body works, how it can take you over, how it can pain body can use your mind. All kinds of things can be pointed out that otherwise you may overlook and they may obscure again the arising awareness. So spiritual teaching can help you to point out what the obstacles are.

Because once you recognize the inner obstacles to awakening, which are the ego, that you can transcend them more easily. If you do not recognize the obstacles, they have you in their grip and they can easily obscure the arising awareness. And another way in which spiritual teaching can be helpful, it uses pointers, concepts, words, but they point to something.

When I say the deep eye, that's a pointer. The deep eye is still a concept, but it points you beyond concepts. When I say, can you sense the deep eye in you?

You can't think about that. When you think about it, you can't. So you have to stop thinking.

So the concept points beyond itself. That's how a spiritual teaching can work. It can use helpful concepts, but point beyond the concepts.

And another way in which it can work is as a direct transmission of presence. When words arise out of presence, they come out of this energy field of presence and that can awaken the presence in you, but only if there's already some presence there. A minimum of presence needs to be there.

And how do you know whether it's there? It's very simple. If these words that I'm saying now make sense to you and say, yeah, I can sense the truth of it, then you have that minimum, or you may have more than a minimum.

You have that awareness. If what I'm saying to you now makes absolutely no sense to you, I suggest that you wait a little, three, five, 10, 15, 20 years, and life will give you more suffering. It's inevitable.

And at some point, the suffering may have cracked the egoic cell sufficiently for the light of awareness to shine through. And that receives the teaching and that can then grow. So there needs to be something in you that's able to receive the teaching, which ultimately it's not the teaching.

It's the consciousness of the so-called teacher. There's no teacher. There's only consciousness, but consciousness uses different channels.

And Jesus said... Nowadays, it would be a deeply offensive statement, but he lived in a different time when you could say deeply offensive things. He said, do not cast pearls before swine.

All that it means is that they are not ready for the teaching. They are interested in eating, drinking, and fornicating, so to speak. Let's be blunt.

There are still many humans whose main interest is different. They're not interested in any spiritual awakening. So Jesus used that expression, but I would not use that because they are not swine.

They are just humans waiting to be awakened or to come to an awakening. The essence of who they are is one with the essence of who you are. So you are not superior to them in essence.

You're not superior to any human because every human has come out of... is a manifestation of the one consciousness. So one more point.

Yes, to summarize, the spiritual teaching with limitations, I'd say it can be taught if there's a readiness in the sense, not adding information to your mind so much, but as an acceleration of what's happening in you already. A subsidiary question would be, what about religion? Is it being religious helpful for spiritual awakening?

Oh, hmm. If you're very religious people, are they closer to spiritual awakening? Are they more open to spiritual awakening?

And there's no... Some may be more open because their religion, because every religion has a transcendent dimension hidden somewhere, even though it might be obscured by ideology and dogma and very often heavily obscured by ideology and dogma. But every religion, there is a transcendent dimension there in the background somewhere.

And some people may have access through their religion, may have access to it, and then they would be open to it. I have had letters and communications from monks, Buddhist monks, Christian monks, nuns, in monasteries saying, your book has deepened my faith and what wonderful. However, there are others for whom religion is an ideology, it strengthens their egoic sense of self, and they would be totally closed to any spiritual teaching.

So there's no receptivity there. So religion can be, yes, it has given you access to the transcendent dimension, or it has closed access to the transcendent dimension completely. But perhaps if you suffer a bit more, then it might still...

So suffering is so valuable. What would we do without suffering?

[Speaker 3] (2:16:45 - 2:17:04)
All right, Eckhart, we have another question here for you. This person wrote in, I've heard that having a strong inner intention to awaken can be helpful when a person wants to accelerate spiritual awakening in their life. Do you think that is true?

And if so, can you say more about this?

[Speaker 1] (2:17:05 - 2:25:33)
Right. Do you have a strong inner intention? I'm asking not Tammy, I'm asking everybody.

A strong inner intention to awaken. Yes and no. Intention usually implies you want to get somewhere.

If I have an intention to learn a new skill, I project myself, I want to get there. Intention implies I'm here, but I want to get there. I have an intention to achieve this, to obtain that, to build that, to manifest that, which is my intention.

Now, if you use the same for awakening, spiritual awakening, it would not be helpful, it would be a hindrance because the strong intention to become awakened would place the awakening in some future moment and you would create a conceptual sense of self that you, the so-called awakened being, want to achieve again in the future. And therefore, the strong intention to awaken in this case would be the greatest hindrance to awakening. However, if we, instead of intention, we could say motivation, do you have a strong motivation to awaken?

Or if we use the word intention in a different way, instead of intention, you would direct it towards the future, is it possible to use the word intention directed only into the present moment? And then your intention is, in this moment, I intend to be awake. So there's no time.

In this moment, your intention is to be awake now. So there can't be any future. Your intention is to be present now.

And if that intention is very strong, that's great, then you are present now. And to be present means to be no longer seduced by thought, useless thinking especially. And this is why, if I may quote a famous, wonderful spiritual teacher from India who passed away many years ago, Nisargadatta Maharaj, who said, when they asked him what is spiritual awakening, he said, he had a lot of yang in him, so whatever he said was very forcefully expressed.

He said, what's spiritual awakening? It's a radical refusal to harbor thoughts. That's how he spoke.

It's a radical refusal to harbor thoughts. Now that's a strong intention. But it's not an intention for the future.

It's an intention that merges with the present moment because that's where awakening is inseparable from present moment awareness. Awakening is present moment awareness. And you can only achieve, so to speak, you can't achieve it, discover it perhaps, you can only have it now.

So there's no future in awakening. That's, again, we have some schools of thought, of spirituality teach or claim that there's nothing you can do to spiritually awaken. They say, let go of all effort, just do nothing, then it'll come.

Just don't let go of all, no effort, every effort is an obstacle. Okay, that's one extreme school. Okay, then you go, okay, that's great, I have nothing, that's nothing to do.

Okay, and 10 years later, you still find yourself sitting on your couch watching TV and drinking beer and waiting for your awakening. It's not come yet, but that's okay, it told me it's going to come. Then you have another school that says the opposite, that says, if you do not want spiritual awakening as much as a drowning man wants air, you're not going to get it.

Now, of course, that would be a very strong desire if you're drowning and you really want air. So which one is right? The secret is you bring the two together, have no intent, direct, no intention directed towards the future, but only present moment.

There's an intensity suddenly in the present moment. That intensity is presence and you no longer, you no longer, that intensity, in that intensity of presence, you no longer want anything because it's already there. So you, it's so easy to be awake in the present moment.

You can be awake in the present moment. You might lose it the next moment. You're not talking about the next moment, but right now, and that's the only thing you can do is be present now.

And let go of thinking unless it's helpful as much as possible. The radical refusal to harbor thoughts, and again, that's only one approach. It's the active approach.

You can also have the passive approach. You're so surrendered to this present moment that very few thoughts, if any, arise because what is there to think about? I completely accept this moment, or as an ancient teacher recommended as a best spiritual practice to say the mantra whenever any situation arose that was a little bit difficult or challenging, use the following mantra.

He said, thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever. That's the mantra, but you have to mean it.

If you just say it, it doesn't work, but if you mean it, thanks for this. I have no complaint whatsoever. Thank you for this.

I have no complaint whatsoever. That's also, that brings you to the same point as the radical refusal to harbor thoughts, which is a Yang approach. Thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. It's a Yin approach. Yin, Yang.

Yin, Yang. So I love that. Thanks for everything, which every moment is good as it is, even the seemingly bad ones, especially the seemingly bad ones.

If somebody puts a great meal in front of you, it's great to say, oh, thanks for everything. Thank you. Thank you.

I have no complaint whatsoever. It's a great meal, but then something else happens. Something is given to you that you don't want.

Of course. Thank you. Because it's the present moment.

You might as well be friendly with it because it's all there ever is. You appreciate what is. There you are.

That's the opening into the transcendent dimension.

[Speaker 3] (2:25:38 - 2:25:55)
We have one final question for you, Eckhart. There's two parts to this. The person wrote in, can you tell us more about what it feels like to be fully awakened and what are signs of awakening along the journey?

[Speaker 1] (2:25:59 - 2:38:40)
What it feels like. Well, let's put that aside for a moment. But the signs of awakening are perhaps more important for people because people ask, well, is it happening?

Am I awakening? Or a question I often get, when am I going to awaken? It's the wrong question.

When am I going to awaken is the wrong question. But a slightly better question would be how do I know if the awakening process is happening in me or to me? How can I know that?

Because for most people, it is a gradual process of disidentification, ultimately disidentification from thinking, so that you realize that thinking and awareness are no longer completely intertwined. Awareness or pure consciousness, pure awareness, separates itself from thought. And then thoughts very easily collapse because they're no longer feeding on consciousness.

So there's a separation of thinking and awareness. That's the disidentification from thought. And that is the process.

And that has its ups and downs. But there are certain signs that you have. And one of the clearest signs is you live more in the present moment.

That's a very simple thing. One of the clearest signs is you have the ability to live more aligned with the present moment. In other words, there is an appreciation of whatever it is around you at this moment.

There's an appreciation of the little things, the little things because you're no longer waiting for the big thing. But in the unenlightened, egoic consciousness, you're waiting for some big thing when you're going to start living. However you interpret the big thing, the big thing would be you meet the ideal partner or you meet the big thing, you finally make it in whatever you want to achieve.

Or the big thing is the world finally recognizes you as one of the greatest or whatever the big thing is. And so you're no longer looking for that. I mean, some people look for the big thing.

They want to get married or they want to have the wedding. The wedding lasts one day and they spend several years thinking about it. And then let's not talk about what happens after that.

So the little things, all the appreciation, the gratitude is one word that you can use for present moment living because you appreciate the little things that including objects as an appreciation of the... I have a... You can't see it.

I have a wooden desk here. It is lovely. I love touching the wood often.

Looking at the sky, many times during the day, I look at the sky and it changes all the time and it's so wonderful. The weather is for me a wonderful source of joy because these are... You're always surrounded by some kind of weather and I love weathers, always changing weather, rain, clouds, sky.

And I give it attention. It's a natural thing because it's part of being in the present moment. So all the little things in the looking out of the window, giving attention, appreciation of what is, even anything, even man-made things.

So you live more like that as you live more in the present moment, you also notice that life becomes... You experience fewer problems in your life because most problems are manufactured in your mind, the unobserved mind. And many humans inhabit a world of problems.

The entire identity is derived from their problems and it's all make-believe in the mind. What's the problem at this moment? Well, nothing.

That's a miraculous question because at any given moment, there is no problem. Even if you don't know what you're going to eat for dinner and you don't have no money left, it's not a problem right now. There was a time in my life when I was more or less at that stage and it was very interesting.

It was an important part of deepening what had already happened to me, not knowing what to live on the next moment. But if you're present in the moment, what you need does come to you. It's almost miraculous.

So as you live more in the present moment, there's more inner peace. And so you notice that less obsession with past, less obsession with future, more appreciation of this moment, which means there's more inner peace that you feel. So that is a clear sign as you're able to live more in the present, is a clear sign that the awakening has happened.

Another good sign is you notice that you're not complaining the way you used to in your mind or out aloud. Because many people spend a lot of their time complaining mentally, out aloud, and on social media and the internet. It's true.

They've always tried something to complain about. And that's part of the egoic sense of self, the need to emphasize the otherness of others, even to emphasize the otherness of situations. I'm critical about this situation.

This shouldn't be happening. This shouldn't be. This shouldn't be happening.

And then you can be critical of others, complaining about others, what they did, failed to do, did wrong, said great. Of course, now the ego has created, the egoic mind has created social media. It's a wonderful thing now for complaining.

You can spend your life on Twitter and Facebook complaining about others, and millions of people are doing it. So you find the end of complaining, that's another sign that the awakening is happening to you, because you recognize it's not only, it's futile, it's destructive, it's unpleasant. Before you didn't know that, because the ego can't tell the difference between pleasant and unpleasant.

For the ego, often what is unpleasant is regarded as pleasant and the other way around. So no complaining anymore, and that's also connected with being able to live in the present. And so that's a huge burden that's lifted.

If you don't, this obsessive complaining is gone. You notice also you're less reactive in situations where before you used to be reactive. You might notice it when you're driving, you're not reactive to other drivers.

You don't misinterpret other drivers, whatever they do, as a personal insult to you. So there's less reactivity in people that you normally trigger you, to use that word, people who trigger negative reactions in you, and suddenly it doesn't happen anymore. You're able to just accept them for who they are.

You can visit your parents without going through the same thing that goes through every time you get together with your parents. They criticize you. Just not everybody, but they criticize you.

You defend yourself, and then you criticize them. The same, like old, I used to say old records, but records don't exist anymore. So old, you have to, different metaphors and computer programs are still, the same programs are running.

And so people have computed the same programs are running in their minds for years and years and years. And they don't even know it because they're completely identified with it. And when you, as you begin to awaken, you recognize these old programs and gradually you detach from the old programs in your mind.

It's another clear sign that you're awakening. So there are many signs, but they all means your life actually feels less heavy. The burden of being, the burden of yourself becomes less because people don't realize it, but they carry a huge burden of themselves with all their preoccupations and worries and reactions.

And there's an absence of the transcendent dimension, complete ignorance of the transcendent dimension, which is the deep eye. So all that is, these are signs that the awakening is happening. And another sign, as I pointed out before, is when you listen to a talk, a spiritual talk, or you read a book that was written from a spiritual state of consciousness, there is immediately a recognition.

And you feel more enlivened in some way. You feel better. You feel definitely it's an act of recognition.

Oh, yeah, sure. Yes, yes. There's always, when you hear Tish, we're teaching, it's not really ultimately anything new.

And you say, oh, yes. I knew that. I couldn't have said it, but I knew it.

I knew that. But that knowing is not conceptual knowing. It's non-conceptual knowing.

And that's something that our civilization doesn't know anything about. Schools cannot teach you that this, apart from conceptual knowing, there's a deeper sense of knowing that is non-conceptual. Well, we may be talking about that in the school of awakening, but don't wait for it.

So I trust that it will be helpful to those of you who were open, who are open to the message. And if you're not open to the message, you've left us long ago anyway, I assume, unless you're in the process of writing critical comments about it on Facebook or Twitter. That's fine.

That's fine, too. So let's leave it at that for today. I wish you well.

And let's spend just a moment in presence of becoming aware of, to go back to the very beginning where we started, become aware of the deep eye, erase all the other stuff that gave you your sense of self and realize the deeper sense of self that arises from the deep eye, which is beingness of presence. I am that I am. I am.

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (2:39:11 - 2:41:59)
Thank you so very, very much, Eckhart, for this special School of Awakening webinar. Thank you. Again, I want to remind everyone who's joining us that you can find a button on this page that allows you to learn more about the Eckhart Tolle School of Awakening.

Registration is open through March 23rd, and then the School of Awakening begins on March 27th. You can just click the button on this page to learn more. I also want to share just a little bit that will give you a little bit more insight into the program.

The Eckhart Tolle School of Awakening is a five-month immersion program that includes two virtual retreats. You'll also receive monthly teachings from Eckhart and Kim, practical exercises, and meditations to help accelerate the awakening process and enable you to integrate presence into every aspect of your life. Additionally, one of the most powerful parts of the program is the opportunity to join online with a vibrant community of like-minded people dedicated to intensifying presence in their life.

This is certainly the deepest and most advanced online program that Eckhart and Kim teach. Some of the additional topics that Eckhart will cover include the specific obstacles to spiritual awakening, how to work with feelings of disconnection, irritation, and difficult emotional states, what it means to view suffering as a great teacher, and how when viewed in this way, suffering can quicken spiritual realization, how to live from the deep eye, as Eckhart mentioned, instead of the surface eye, and contribute to the collective evolution of our species. When you join the program, you'll have access to attend the two virtual retreats, and then also these five months of live teachings with question and answer sessions and live group meditations. Again, you can click the button on this page to learn more, and whether you join us or not in the School of Awakening, I want to thank you so much for being with us here for this special webinar and for your own interest, commitment, resonance, and motivation to intensify presence in your life.

Thank you so, so much. And thank you, Eckhart, for this special School of Awakening webinar and everyone for being with us. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:42:02 - 2:57:01)
The usual mistake or dysfunctional way of living, unconscious way, is, as I've mentioned before, is devaluing the present moment and overvaluing the next moment. The ego lives always with reference to past and future. The mentally are always somewhere else.

Instead of giving fullest attention to this, because this is the most valuable moment. Why? Because it's the only one in the present moment.

Give your fullest attention to this moment, because it's not true that the next moment is more significant, because it never comes. So there is a way of being totally present in the planning for the future. It's all little things.

And even if you're the Pope or the president of a huge corporation or the president of a country, it's still the same. The present moment in its richness is usually overlooked, because you're looking for something more significant. It's fine to achieve things, especially if they are beneficial, but for humanity and the totality of the planet, it's lovely to have that.

But even that doesn't make up your identity. The more you honor the small things, the more likely it is that you'll experience more good things in the so-called future, because you have such a good relationship with the present. Gratitude is an underlying state of consciousness, which is giving your fullest attention, honoring what is.

The power to manifest is in experiencing the fullness of the present moment, the undifferentiated fullness. So when you don't complain about not only other people, but also about your life, then you can't be a victim anymore. I is the light of consciousness in which these feelings are being experienced right now.

The victim is a huge, a huge present. It is not who you are. And remember, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. So there's this wonderful stillness here, and let's acknowledge it. The power is not just in you.

It's all around you. Free of compulsive thinking. And then you are free to use thinking as a beautiful tool for creating.

But you're no longer creating from an egoic neediness. You're creating as an expression of consciousness that creates through you. Whatever it is that you create depends on who you are on the form level as a person.

You may have certain abilities or certain things you have learned, and how or what you create depends on that. But that which inspires the creation is the consciousness that then moves through you into a particular channel. And then creativity comes in, whether you're an artist or even a scientist needs that, or the science is based on rational thinking and analysis.

The greatest breakthrough in science came to people. There are many stories about that. They came to people who suddenly went blank, not really blank, but spacious.

Einstein had many moments of spaciousness. And then things suddenly come that could not be arrived at through thinking. Thinking was necessary too, but it didn't.

The real breakthrough comes as a revelation, even in science. So, and it transforms your relationships to other humans. And that's a beautiful thing.

Even if that's all, if you're not creative in any other area except in all your relationships to relate with that feeling of benevolence towards others, no matter whether it's your intimate relationships or relationships that happen for a few minutes that during the day, all these are important. And so when you're no longer judging a human being, then you can sense and flow of goodwill towards a human. But it presupposes that you are not judging yourself either.

So first you have come into your own spaciousness, and then you discover the spaciousness in the other, even if they don't know it yet. When your gaze, in a wider sense, gaze, not just the visual gaze, but directing your attention, directing your attention to somebody and going deeper than the surface appearance of that person, which is first of all, the physical form of that person. Now for many people, that's the first thing they notice and the last thing they notice.

They only relate to another as a physical form, which they either don't, are not interested in or they want it. I want you. And then beyond the physical form, there's the psychological form of that person, the kind of personality that this person has.

So that's the next thing. So level one is a physical thing. When you meet somebody, level two is a personality of that person, which is also, it's a psychological, this is the physical form.

The next level down is a psychological form. And if you are stuck on those two levels, you can never truly come to a relationship of true lovingness towards the other, of true goodwill towards the other, of truly sensing something that unites you to the other. There's always that sense of separation because you haven't gone deep enough into the other.

Why haven't you gone deep enough into the other? Because you haven't gone deep enough into yourself. It's only if you've gone deep enough into yourself and by deep enough means, into the inner spaciousness in which you're not thinking, no compulsive thinking, an alertness remains, that is, you become suddenly very deep.

And then you can look at another human being, no matter what they say or do or how they look. You can then sense their beingness also, but only through yours. And there you meet, when you can sense a human's beingness, even if they can't sense it for themselves, you can, there's a feeling of love, not in a conventional sense, a lovingness towards the other.

And that is, you recognize the most essential thing of who you are is also in the other. You recognize that oneness. And what is that?

It's consciousness. What you love in true love, what you love in the other, is their consciousness. What you love in the dog, although it's lovely to touch a dog, it's lovely to look at the dog or the cat, but what you really love, when you look into the eyes of the dog, is the consciousness of the dog.

The beingness looks back at you and you look into the eyes, unobstructed by thinking in the dog. And for a moment, the dog frees you from your own thinking. People don't know that that's what happens.

And that's why they love dogs, because for a moment, you look at a dog and there's always a few moments when you're not, unless you're so bad that you can't even be present with your dog. For a moment, the dog frees you off and you go, you feed yourself more fully, because there's a being who is one with itself and is not imposing anything. So there's the shared beingness or consciousness you suddenly sense.

And this shared consciousness, to realize the shared consciousness is love in the true sense. And the same could happen even with a tree, when you truly acknowledge the beingness of the tree from your inner, so that you look at it without imposing judgment or interpretation on it. It does not mean that you can never say anything about the tree.

It means, for example, it means there are two ways of knowing the tree or anything, or knowing a human being, of knowing anything. There are two ways of knowing, even yourself. One is through thinking and concepts.

So I can know you by knowing many things about you and your past and what happened to you and your background. And so all these things I know about you, but there is a more fundamental and more essential way of knowing. I can know you as consciousness rather than as the form that you are.

I can know the tree by looking at it, giving it my fullest attention and just the awareness for the sense perception. And I'm looking at that tree and I can suddenly sense its aliveness, its stillness, its beingness. I can sense that.

Sensing that means I'm connecting with it and connecting means the connection has always been there, but now you notice it, you connect it, connect with the tree and you love it. It does not mean that in some other moment when a child wants to know what the name of this tree is, because there is a time when a child asks about names and concepts, you're not going to refuse and say I'm not going to tell you about the name because I don't want you to get trapped in concepts. You have to encourage the child not to lose the deeper knowing when you give the name.

So you tell this is an oak tree or better you tell the child we call it an oak tree because it isn't an oak tree, we call it an oak tree. And then encourage the child to look, to continuously continue to perceive it, touch it. If there's something to smell, smell it, listen to the leaves, listen, look, touch, interact, give it your attention so that the child is not trapped in a world of concepts as is the destiny of many children these days at an early age get completely absorbed by concepts and before you know it at a fairly early age they are lost in their minds.

Unhappy a lot of the time. What's the next thing that I can think of that I need? We'll talk about that.

So if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack, of insufficiency, of not enough and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack. In order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough, spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary. Focus on the realization of being.

It's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego. Go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person.

Welcome everyone to today's live online event The Shift That Changes Everything. In just a few moments we're going to be joined by Eckhart who I know many of you know is widely recognized as one of the most visionary teachers of our time. Eckhart's also the author of the international bestsellers The Power of Now and A New Earth and he has literally introduced millions of people across the world to the joy, peace and freedom of living life in the present moment.

My name is Sybil and on behalf of Eckhart Teachings and Sounds True I want to thank each and every one of you for coming tonight and attending this session. We're just so honored to have so many people from all over the world joining us. And before we get started I just wanted to mention that part of the inspiration for tonight's talk comes from an online program that we're doing with Eckhart called Doorways into Presence How to Quiet Your Mind and Live in the Now.

Have you ever wondered what it's like to live a day in presence like Eckhart? This is a question all of us were asking ourselves the team here at Eckhart Teachings and Sounds True and we're like I think there's so many other folks who are asking that too. How does Eckhart actually live in the now every single day?

Many of us want to be present as we move through the day and feel all the freedom and peace that stems from the present moment but how do you actually do that? Right? Like especially when life throws you challenges or problems or it's just the general busyness of the day that can be so distracting.

Well, this new online program with Eckhart shows us how. Eckhart's going to be guiding a community of students through 14 experiences so we can learn how to use our everyday moments differently and build what Eckhart calls presence power. And when you make this shift and live in the now each day it changes everything.

We're able to quiet our minds and continually experience the dimension of stillness that's always available. We're very much looking forward to this and the upcoming program with Eckhart and we hope you'll all join us too with a lot of students from all over the world. And also today we're offering a special teaching bonus when you sign up.

So after you enroll you'll receive a collection called Living Free from Stress and Anxiety. It includes three of Eckhart's most popular audio programs The Secret of Happiness The Joy of Being and Freedom from the World. We wanted to give everyone the opportunity to listen to these special teachings and prepare for the program that Eckhart's going to be guiding us through called Doors to Presence.

So in addition to receiving a special discount when you sign up today you'll also get these teachings when you enroll. And if you're interested you can find out more about the program and register at EckhartTolle.com And I'll also be able to give you some additional information about the program at the end of the event this evening. And now without further ado please allow me to introduce and welcome our friend and guide for tonight's talk Eckhart Tolle.

Eckhart, welcome.

Thank you, Sigru and hello everybody. Welcome to the present moment. I'd like this session to be to become for you an actual experiential realization what presence is.

So we're not just talking about presence but being present. Sensing the presence. So that presence that you can sense is in between the words behind the words it's behind all sense perceptions it makes all sense perceptions possible it's behind all thinking it makes thinking possible it's behind all emotion it's what makes emotion possible but in itself it transcends all these things it is inseparable from sensory perception thinking and emotions but also transcends those it is likely that you have encounter presence and you do from time to time or perhaps quite often encounter presence without recognizing it for what it is it could just be a moment when you feel at ease you feel a sense of well-being a sense of peaceful aliveness not because you have desensitized yourself not because you've taken some substances not because you're about to fall asleep not because there's a lowering of your consciousness no it's a heightened consciousness thinking of course is a manifestation of consciousness emotions are a manifestation of consciousness sense perceptions could not exist without consciousness so what we're talking about when we use presence we're talking about the essence of what you are which is consciousness the light of consciousness one could say this vast consciousness that is universal consciousness it's not only within you

it is also without it is the one could say the intelligence that underlies all phenomenal manifestations of the universe there's a hidden concealed hidden vast intelligence that gives rise to the evolution of all life forms impossible for us to understand it but we can sense it within ourselves as the essence of our being so the easiest way to point to presence to say that you encounter it when you stop thinking for a moment without losing consciousness stop thinking means the continuous voice in the head that usually comments on what's going on around you or comments on all kinds of things imaginary scenarios and so on the conditioned voice in the head that you live with

everybody lives with that voice in their head that talks all the time inside or if it talks aloud then you're considered crazy people say there's people walking in the streets talking out aloud and you say oh they're mentally insane but the only difference between a normal human being

[Speaker 2] (3:06:28 - 3:06:58)
and those people that you call mentally insane is that those who you do not call mentally insane when they're still doing the same thing they're just not talking out aloud it's happening in their head it's a continuous stream of thinking and that creates the ego the egoic sense of self an ultimately fictitious identity that you are infinitely more than the entity created by the movement of thought and the emotions that reflect the movement of thought

there's infinitely more to you than what you conventionally call the person

[Speaker 2] (3:07:05 - 3:07:24)
a person is a conditioned entity a form that consciousness has taken and most humans unless they are awakening already spiritually which is what we are talking about the arising of presence is spiritual awakening unless you are awakening

[Speaker 1] (3:07:24 - 3:07:27)
and many of you are awakening

even if you don't have words for it many of you are here because you are awakening otherwise this session would be totally meaningless to you and there may be a few to whom it is totally meaningless what is this guy talking about? so you must have had a glimpse of what it is that I'm talking about and if you haven't perhaps you can have it now and that glimpse is the possibility of arriving at the briefly at first the cessation of thinking the voice in the head stops and yet consciousness remains and you can look around or look at this image on the screen or look around the room take everything in but you are not thinking about it it's just sensory perception and what is behind the sensory perception?

presence another word for it is awareness so there is an awareness that is perceiving at this moment and that awareness is silent but it's awake and that awareness is the deeper dimension to who or what you are that's no longer the person that you usually think of when you say I there is a deeper I a deeper sense of being that transcends the personal sense of identity so you can sense there is an awareness in you a consciousness and that consciousness is perceiving it doesn't need to interpret it it knows at a very deep level but not conceptually you can look around your room or wherever you are you know that there is furniture or whatever there is but you don't call it anything you just allow it to be so there is instead of a person perceiving things which is what you are always interpreting, commenting and labeling mentally instead of a person you are now perceiving not as a person you are perceiving as awareness so there is a shift from personal sense of self a shift to a deeper level you could call it deeper or higher it doesn't matter to a deeper level of consciousness where you are not a person you are that which is prior to the person and that's awareness presence and that's amazing you can then be aware of that awareness you can sense this presence that you are in addition to whatever you are perceiving it's in the background of your sense perceptions the background of your life it's a spacious vast presence that connects you to something that we cannot really define or talk about it's deep and it's infinite it's a soul it's not just the depth of your being it connects you to the very soul of the universe the ancients ancient Romans and Greeks had this wonderful term anima mundi which is latin for the soul of the world there is such a thing as a world soul and that is your your soul presence the consciousness that you are is a ray or a spark of that inseparable from the soul of the totality so it's a liberation from the ego itself liberation of the self and then life becomes more harmonious when you begin to invite that consciousness into your life that presence your life begins to flow with greater ease more harmoniously

not that you are not challenged anymore challenges continue but all the challenges do once you begin to awaken to presence

[Speaker 2] (3:12:44 - 3:12:53)
challenges then deepen your presence in fact you need the difficulties in your life to deepen your presence

[Speaker 1] (3:12:54 - 3:13:00)
as you begin to awaken any challenge will deepen your presence

[Speaker 2] (3:13:00 - 3:15:24)
in the early stages it could also happen that challenges take you completely out of presence when you encounter difficult situations or people can take you totally out of presence but gradually as you become a bit more established, rooted in that presence the opposite happens challenges don't make you unconscious they make you more conscious so in a nutshell presence is awareness without thought and then thinking becomes a more helpful tool rather than something that torments you many people their thinking mind torments them continuously they have an unhappy sense of self they talk to themselves using unhappy words they talk about other people using unhappy words and concepts and they confuse what the voice in the head with actual reality out there they can't tell the difference between what is and the way in which they interpret what is which is the conditioning of the mind when you come to an alignment with what is which is always now life becomes easier not free of challenges but much easier and challenges don't produce unhappiness anymore that's a big thing and the difficulties of your life don't make you unhappy anymore amazing I believe there are a few questions that people have submitted or want to ask I don't know if there are any questions left Sybil you have some?

[Speaker 4] (3:15:24 - 3:15:46)
I do, I have questions that people submitted prior to the session and the first one we wanted to ask you was from Randy in New York and Randy's question Eckhart is if you could choose only one practice to bring about the greatest impact of presence in your life what would it be?

[Speaker 2] (3:15:48 - 3:21:00)
Great, wonderful question thanks one practice that's not complicated at all you don't need time to master it this practice it does not take time obviously if a practice of presence takes time it's not really working very well is it? so the the most simple direct practice is to be aware of your breath to be aware of your breathing for example now to be aware of it, your breathing now before I just said that it's very likely that you were not aware of your breathing unless you knew already what this great practice is but the moment I said it your awareness went to your breath and you can feel the air moving into the body and out of the body and so to speak you follow it with your attention you follow the air with your attention as it goes in and out that is the most direct and simplest practice of being present I'm not the first person to come up with that somebody called the Buddha already talked about it 2,500 years ago it was called Anapanasati Yoga it's the practice of the ingoing and outgoing breath ingoing and outgoing breath awareness now the breathing is always there most of the time you're not conscious of it, when you direct consciousness to your breathing something very interesting happens it slows down or completely eliminates your thinking and there's only an awareness of your breath so if you want to, if you're being tortured by your thoughts as many people are many people don't even know that they're tortured by your thoughts, they think they're being tortured by life whatever their life situation it's so dreadful my life is so difficult and complicated I can't stand it anymore and then the narrative continues and continues and you think that's your life not knowing that it's a narrative in your mind, it's not your life to confuse a narrative in your mind with your life is a fundamental, very dreadful error but very, very common has anybody taught you that at school or university? probably not the most fundamental knowledge not to confuse a narrative in your mind with your life because your life isn't a narrative in your mind it's always now, it is never not now, this is most fundamentally your life is now not the narrative of past and future, that is helpful for practical purposes but no more than that not to give you an identity that's a fictitious identity your true identity is rooted in the power of the present moment the power of now be aware of your breathing you don't even have to control it, there are certain meditation practices that have a very structured way of approaching your breath and you can change the length of your breath you can count your breath you can do all kinds of things, that's fine for meditation practices but the simplest thing is no matter where you are, and you don't even have to say, ok, I'm going to meditate

now it's fine, I love meditation but I sometimes make fun of it a little bit then you enter a totally different ok, now it's time to meditate for 10 minutes and throughout your life

[Speaker 2] (3:21:14 - 3:21:28)
wherever you are be aware of your breathing whenever you can it creates an inner spaciousness because when you're aware of your breathing, you can't do much thinking and most of the thinking

[Speaker 1] (3:21:28 - 3:21:40)
as you may know or maybe it's news to you most of your thinking is not only unnecessary but actually very harmful it creates all kinds of

pseudo problems well the mind is telling you it's working on solving your problems it's actually regurgitating old narratives not real problems there is such a thing as focused application of the mind thinking ability becomes enhanced when there is a presence behind it so when you have an actual real problem to solve in your life approach it not only with your thinking mind but also with the cessation of thinking you can continue step back from thinking into stillness and if you want to use your breath to access the stillness, it's a good portal, be aware of your breathing so first, these are the problems when I have something to think about I usually, because I'm old fashioned I have a notepad and a pen and if I have to think about what can I do in this situation, what are the solutions, I start writing down possibilities these people, modern humans like you you probably use some device, I don't know what you do on

a keyboard or whatever so you write what is it that I can do in this

what can I do to solve this if it's an actual problem, because many things that humans come up with in their mind are not actual problems, they're imaginary constructs if there's an actual problem, okay action needs to be taken, what is it that I can do, write down this, this, this and then you run out of ideas and then it's time to become still be aware of your breathing you don't need to close your eyes you can, but it's not necessary to be aware of your breathing because you can be aware of your breathing and there's still enough awareness left to be aware of your surroundings if you want to focus more deeply on your breathing, you can close your eyes and then really focus on your breathing but I say even one conscious breath makes a difference in your life

if you take that one conscious breath several times during the day what do I mean by one conscious breath it's one conscious in and out breath

[Speaker 2] (3:24:23 - 3:25:38)
how long does it take, I don't know, maybe, let's see I'm doing it, conscious breath goes like this, that was it, in and out 10 seconds, maybe, doesn't matter and that's one conscious breath, what does it do it creates a gap in your stream of thinking a stillness a presence arises, has always been there, is always there underneath all the thinking so presence is not something that you need to achieve or attain it's something that you discover because it's already there so you can't really work hard to become present because it's already there and this is why in some traditions people say well you are already enlightened

[Speaker 1] (3:25:40 - 3:25:45)
and the person says what are you talking about, my life is a complete mess, how can I be

[Speaker 2] (3:25:45 - 3:26:14)
enlightened, all my relationships are in shambles I'm not enlightened, well underneath all that mental noise and emotional turmoil, there is a presence there is a deeper consciousness so the simplest practice is to be aware of your breath and even if it's only one conscious breath

[Speaker 1] (3:26:14 - 3:26:28)
but taken many times during the day whenever you remember and you might want to take two or three instead of one, even better two or three conscious breaths while you're on your computer on your keyboard

[Speaker 2] (3:26:29 - 3:27:09)
okay stop for a moment one or two or three conscious breaths or just observe that you are breathing just direct your attention there you are breathing there is no doubt about it you are breathing so just observe that you are breathing breathing happens to you, you are not doing it but for most people thinking is the same, thinking happens to them, they are not doing it they have no control at all what their mind does, they have no awareness

so thinking happens to them in the same way that breathing happens to them but this doesn't have to, breathing yes that always happens something in you wants to live and it's breathing, it wants you to live in this incarnation and that's why you're breathing and no matter how unhappy you are, you cannot kill yourself by stopping breathing, you won't be able nobody has ever committed suicide by stopping their breath holding their breath something in you does not want to commit suicide it wants to come to the end of your incarnation naturally

[Speaker 2] (3:27:50 - 3:28:33)
and only the silly person wants to commit suicide so get in touch with that in you that does not want to commit, it's not unhappy the presence is not unhappy the awareness is not unhappy so the simplest practice be aware of your breathing now that can lead you into the next practice that they are closely connected the other practice is to be aware of the inner energy field of your body when you're breathing that connects

you almost inevitably with the inner energy field of your body because you breathe into and if you can feel that you're breathing into as deep as the abdomen without no effort, it's just happening don't make an effort it's just happening, you're breathing and your attention follows the

[Speaker 2] (3:28:55 - 3:29:08)
breath as deep as the abdomen, belly although the air probably doesn't go there but your attention goes with the breath and from there you can sense an energy spreading

[Speaker 1] (3:29:08 - 3:29:24)
out throughout your body an inner energy field it pervades the body I call it inner body awareness it's also an ancient meditation practice if done in a more structured way it's called Vipassana

[Speaker 2] (3:29:24 - 3:29:55)
or going back also probably taught by the Buddha too and by Jesus, we only have fragments of his teachings he talks about the possibility that your body can be full of light that's what he's talking about so inner body awareness to sense the inner energy field of your body and breath awareness are closely related and sometimes breath awareness inevitably could connect you to the inner energy field of the body and then they merge into one practice you're aware of your breathing and you're aware of that your body is pervaded by a sense of aliveness, that is the intelligence that inhabits your body it transcends who or what you are as a person and you feel intensely alive not in an excited way in a calm way so there's breath awareness and inner body awareness, they merge into one let's see if there are any other questions, Sybil?

[Speaker 1] (3:29:55 - 3:30:09)

[Speaker 2] (3:30:09 - 3:31:03)

[Speaker 4] (3:31:03 - 3:32:06)
We have a question from Southern California from Tam she says she loves all of the tools that you've given so far and it's been really really helpful throughout her entire life and there's times where some situations happen and it just becomes really overwhelming what's your best advice to help become present when we do have these overwhelming times and it just feels like it's too much to bear and none of the regular practices of presence are working, when you see or hear something that's extremely upsetting or you just feel totally overwhelmed and consumed in unconsciousness in the moment recently it felt like all the wonderful tools that were helping so far didn't help in moments of overwhelm and stress and probably deep unconsciousness what would be your advice to help pull me back to consciousness when that happens?

[Speaker 2] (3:32:08 - 3:33:29)
Thank you, we probably need to differentiate between different things here, there is such a thing as emergency situations emergency situations in your life that require an immediate response you're being attacked by a wild animal or a crazy human or your house is on fire or there's an earthquake all these things are happening more and more these days by the way, as you probably know for many people actually emergencies happen and they require an immediate when this happens there is no time to think about how can I be present the emergency can either

cause you to enter a state of panic

[Speaker 2] (3:33:35 - 3:33:56)
and extreme well panic is extreme fear it's also possible that an emergency makes you very present itself it it can have

[Speaker 1] (3:33:57 - 3:33:59)
either one or the other effect

[Speaker 2] (3:33:59 - 3:34:12)
on you, it can make you panicky and fearful or it can make you intensely alert and out of that alertness comes whatever response is required in that situation

[Speaker 1] (3:34:13 - 3:34:24)
no thinking is involved in an emergency situation if the emergency forces you into absolute presence

[Speaker 2] (3:34:25 - 3:34:39)
it's not a practice you can't say your house is on fire and say now I need to practice presence but it may be that the emergency itself creates this intense presence

[Speaker 1] (3:34:39 - 3:34:45)
in you and then an intelligence operates in you and causes you to take

[Speaker 2] (3:34:45 - 3:34:55)
right action for that moment whatever that may be, it is not premeditated and it does not come from the conditioning of your mind accumulated conditioning of your mind

[Speaker 1] (3:34:55 - 3:35:05)
so you are not reacting in some old predictable way when you are present it is more likely should you encounter an emergency situation

[Speaker 2] (3:35:05 - 3:36:08)
but you have been practicing presence in your daily life beforehand it is your chances of staying present and experiencing an intensification of presence when an emergency happens is much greater, it is in other words it is more likely when you've been practicing presence already in normal situations in your life when a true emergency happens, that presence will become very intense and that means immediately it will take action through you and you will do just the right thing for that situation, nobody can predict what that might be so sometimes people think people probably heard of accounts of people who have performed heroic actions maybe they have saved other people or heroic things and they later ask what did you how did

you are so brave, how could you do that and they say I couldn't help, I just did it, I couldn't help it there was no thinking involved it just happened, I did it and when this happens also you don't take credit for it if you save somebody's life because it just, the action then happens through you a greater intelligence one could say acts through you, it takes action so you are more likely to be prepared

[Speaker 2] (3:36:38 - 3:36:54)
you will be prepared for true emergencies if you have been practicing presence because the presence power has been growing in you, so you will not be paralyzed for example by an emergency, some people are

[Speaker 1] (3:36:54 - 3:37:05)
either paralyzed or they go into intense mode of panic and it's not likely that panic will lead to really intelligent and effective action they will probably do the wrong thing that makes the situation even worse or gets them killed that's panic so presence practicing of presence is a good preparation should life present you with an enormous challenge, an immediate an emergency that needs to be dealt with immediately, so that the emergency does not overwhelm you you can face it that's one thing but there's another form of overwhelm that's to do with the the thinking mind so you have some problems in your life or maybe a succession of problems that's why you become overwhelmed, you have several problems not absolute emergencies but difficulties in your life, somebody close to you dies and you lose your job the next day and then you get home the following day and your wife has left you or your husband left you or whatever

[Speaker 2] (3:37:05 - 3:38:15)

[Speaker 1] (3:38:15 - 3:38:35)
many things suddenly come I can't take it anymore, I'm so over well okay so here we're talking somewhat different situation from the actual immediate emergency this overwhelm is produced by the thinking mind trying to find some kind of coping with impossible, seemingly impossible situations that you cannot actually do anything about right now at some point you can take action to to solve situations but

[Speaker 2] (3:38:35 - 3:38:49)

[Speaker 1] (3:38:49 - 3:39:04)
right now because it's not an emergency so right now you just have all these problems arriving in your life what is your my investments have collapsed if you had any my bank account is empty I can't pay my rent

[Speaker 2] (3:39:04 - 3:39:30)
all these things are could lead to overwhelm but what is the overwhelm is the thinking mind creating havoc in your mind oh my god I can't take anymore, what should I do my life has come to an end I can't cope with it there you need to take action

[Speaker 1] (3:39:30 - 3:39:38)
and here again the preparation for that should it happen that in your life you are

[Speaker 2] (3:39:38 - 3:40:39)
faced with several problems occurring in a short space of time practice presence in your daily life again is a wonderful preparation for coping with a series of problems that may arise in a short space of time in your life so that's why it's very important to practice presence when things are going relatively okay so that what I call presence power grows in you and as presence power grows in you when these situations happen you are able to take your attention out of the chaotic thinking mind and bring your attention into the present moment in whatever way through your breathing or your awareness

don't believe your mind when it tells you I can't do it now

[Speaker 2] (3:40:45 - 3:41:09)
I need to think about my problems I can't do presence now it's impossible this thought is a lie if you have been practicing presence and then you have this thought that says I can't do it now there's no point don't believe in every thought that comes into your mind that's another practice don't believe in every thought that comes into your mind your thought says I can't do it now there's no point of course you can take a conscious breath there's nobody who cannot take a conscious breath if you decide to take a conscious breath and if you don't believe your mind

[Speaker 2] (3:41:24 - 3:41:55)
it tells you you can't do it then you take a conscious breath on a practical level physical movement helps if you feel overwhelmed go out into nature and breathe consciously there and take in your surroundings nature is a very healing thing

[Speaker 1] (3:41:56 - 3:42:05)
when your life is especially when your life has become chaotic go into nature even if you live in a city there will be nature

somewhere maybe you have a backyard maybe you have this big park where you can go there will be nature somewhere you can get out of the city even better so you go into nature and nature can help you become present it's easier to be present in nature than to be present in a city. Once presence power grows in you it makes hardly any difference you may still have a preference for nature but you can be as present in the city too.

But in the early stages of presence arising in you, nature is very helpful. So when life becomes a burden to you then go into nature

[Speaker 2] (3:42:54 - 3:44:02)
and bring your attention to your sense perceptions and your breathing, be there fully and it can liberate you to some extent it liberates you from this mental overwhelm this was perhaps an interesting story from my early life when I was a child I was I didn't have a happy childhood well there were some happy moments, yes in fact this is what I'm going to talk about now on the whole my life, my whole life was not happy because my family environment was chaotic and a lot of screaming and anger and horrible so my parents meant well but they were in the grip of their own unconscious conditioning they couldn't help it so I was not happy there very unhappy at school too so I carried this unhappiness and at some I don't know how old I was, maybe ten, I got a bicycle for Christmas

so I was able to get out of the city

[Speaker 2] (3:44:06 - 3:44:07)
it wasn't

[Speaker 1] (3:44:07 - 3:44:15)
it was a medium sized city so I took like a 15 minute bike ride and I would be out it wasn't grand nature

[Speaker 2] (3:44:16 - 3:44:28)
like just cornfields and hedges and trees and little groves but it was nature so I got out of the city

[Speaker 1] (3:44:29 - 3:44:44)
many times on my bike the moment I reached nature I felt so much better and there was one thought that repeated itself every time I did this it repeated itself in my mind and that thought said

[Speaker 2] (3:44:45 - 3:45:34)
I didn't fully understand what it meant but I just thought that this will always be here this will always be here this will always be here and this referred to nature so I had this intuitive realization there is a human made world which was a world of unhappiness for me and there was the natural world which represented the liberation from unhappiness and it represented well-being and harmony so that's my first that was my first spiritual experience in life was that occurred many many times

so nature is wonderful in a way you could people may not realize

[Speaker 2] (3:45:39 - 3:46:04)
the world that you inhabit consists primarily of human made things and natural things you can divide all your sensory perceptions into human made things that surround you all things furniture, cars buildings utensils everything human made and then you have

[Speaker 1] (3:46:04 - 3:46:09)
nature even as I sit here in my room I can see all the human made things

[Speaker 2] (3:46:11 - 3:47:34)
and then there is nature, look out of the window there is trees there is nature and I've got some plants here potted plants you can look at the plants there is the human made world and there is there is a plant and there is another one behind me it's a rubber plant it is and that's natural and it's interesting to see that you have these two dimensions the human made things and the natural things and then of course there is always the sky sky is always, even if you are in the middle of a huge city you can't see a single tree the sky is still there and the sky is a beautiful thing that actually can represent the inner consciousness this is why Jesus talks about the kingdom of heaven which in my translation is the dimension of spaciousness which is an inner dimension which is presence so Jesus talking about the kingdom of heaven dimension, kingdom of heaven vast spaciousness is the inner spaciousness of presence

[Speaker 1] (3:47:34 - 3:47:54)
Buddha talked about sunyata usually translated as emptiness but a better translation is spaciousness again as an inner state, a realization of this inner dimension all pointing to that it all comes together

it's only one truth one true teaching comes in just different forms so overwhelm is actually emergencies

and then there is the overwhelm by your mind and that you can do something about and get ready for it because we all get challenged and we are living in a time when collectively humanity is going to be challenged more and more so there will be challenges that affect every one of us there have already been some and there are some now collective challenges so you are either prepared for them or you are not, if you are not prepared you will become very unhappy and you won't be able to cope but if you are prepared it will, the challenges that humanity is facing will be an inseparable part of the awakening of humanity humans don't awaken even other life forms don't awaken unless they are challenged deeply that is part of the evolution of consciousness so it's all good what looks bad on the surface on a deeper, higher perspective

is all good and it all makes sense be ready for the challenges in life, it's incredibly important to grow in presence so to speak

[Speaker 1] (3:49:38 - 3:49:59)
so that presence power can manifest itself more fully through you presence itself is timeless of course but your ability to become a vessel for presence a conduit for presence that grows in time because here we inhabit the dimension of time

[Speaker 2] (3:49:59 - 3:50:05)
and yet presence is the transcendent dimension that is timeless

[Speaker 4] (3:50:11 - 3:50:37)
Eckhart, along those lines the final question as you know the title of tonight's event is the shift that changes everything and the final question we wanted to ask you this evening is what is that shift that changes everything and why is it essential right now for humanity to undergo this shift

[Speaker 1] (3:50:38 - 3:50:44)
right, thank you so I've already started kind of already started talking about that

[Speaker 2] (3:50:44 - 3:50:52)
question before you asked it so it's the

[Speaker 1] (3:50:56 - 3:50:59)
awakening to use that term

[Speaker 2] (3:50:59 - 3:51:09)
the term awakening has been around for thousands of years Buddha, the word Buddha means the one who is awake

[Speaker 1] (3:51:09 - 3:51:23)
Buddha means being awake Jesus talked quite often about staying awake it's misunderstood in most churches Jesus said a literal quote

[Speaker 2] (3:51:23 - 3:51:53)
this is probably one of the fragments that he actually truly said I can't remember what gospel it is from said, and what I say to you, I say to all stay awake that's Jesus Buddha is the one who is awake when people ask Buddha what are you, he said I'm awake so what is that awake awake is

[Speaker 1] (3:51:57 - 3:52:09)
they have gone through this shift in consciousness from the egoic consciousness that is totally identified with the thinking function to a deeper or higher consciousness

[Speaker 2] (3:52:09 - 3:52:19)
I usually prefer the term deeper but higher is fine too a deeper consciousness that transcends all this

[Speaker 1] (3:52:20 - 3:52:24)
so that you find a deeper sense of identity

[Speaker 2] (3:52:26 - 3:53:14)
than the one that is based on your personal history for most people their sense of identity is based on their personal history and however they interpret their personal history their personal history is a narrative they tell themselves, a story they tell themselves and they call it my life it's very limiting and ultimately very frustrating because this narrative is never fully at ease it's always a lot of the time it's an unhappy narrative, sense of identity it's a burden that people carry, it's the egoic sense of self, it creates problems where problems didn't exist before it creates dysfunction

as reflected also collectively in world history, read the history of the 20th century first half especially but

[Speaker 2] (3:53:23 - 3:53:48)
any history of oh my god this is insane millions, I can't remember, nobody knows exactly how many humans were killed by other humans in the 20th century alone but hundreds of millions and that's the manifestation of the collective level of this unconsciousness

[Speaker 1] (3:53:48 - 3:53:53)
so unless we, now we have created enormous technologies

[Speaker 2] (3:53:55 - 3:54:04)
which can amplify the dysfunction of the egoic mind it's already been doing that so it amplifies the egoic madness

[Speaker 1] (3:54:04 - 3:54:09)
and if we don't transcend the egoic state of consciousness

[Speaker 2] (3:54:09 - 3:54:17)
to a higher state of consciousness we are going to kill ourselves because

[Speaker 1] (3:54:18 - 3:55:10)
it's just technology amplifies the mental dysfunction that humans have been carrying for thousands of years it wasn't so bad in the past people had only got they had all these swarms to kill each other and then the technology grew and grew and grew and now we are confronted with the digital technology which to a large extent also amplifies the dysfunction of the human mind what people do on facebook not everybody you can use it consciously too but millions of people are using it to simply to amplify their egoic sense of self the image that they want to create of who they are, some fictitious image and now through technology they can project this image to the outward world using of course lots of filters so they look, everybody looks beautiful with all the filters they can apply to their facebook pages even I could look beautiful

[Speaker 2] (3:55:10 - 3:55:24)

[Speaker 1] (3:55:24 - 3:55:42)
if I put a filter supply oh everybody looks so great and everybody looks so happy and it's all fiction so you have an externalization of the human ego through the technology

[Speaker 2] (3:55:43 - 3:55:59)
we can talk about this for a long time but there's no need here and now but to see there's an enormous amount of dysfunction in the human mind that we need this all the ancient traditions talked about that already that

[Speaker 1] (3:55:59 - 3:56:45)
human mind has great possibilities but it has an inbuilt fundamental dysfunction the Buddha called it dukkha, suffering you always, wherever you go you encounter suffering unless you wake up and Jesus terms it's called sin sin means really missing the mark of human existence, that's the original translation of the word sin in the new testament is to miss the mark so you miss the purpose of your life the purpose of your life is to awaken as a human being to become more conscious, to awaken to this consciousness there is no other purpose to your life

[Speaker 2] (3:56:45 - 3:56:55)
than this awakening all the others are secondary purposes yes, on a personal level you have secondary purposes in your personal life, everybody has different personal

[Speaker 1] (3:56:55 - 3:59:04)
purposes, but they must be aligned with a greater purpose which is to live more consciously to awaken to this new consciousness these are the ancient teachings, they've already spoken about this but for the first time I would say in the history of humanity is the awakening now an absolute necessity rather than a kind of luxury so in the past a few humans here and there, not many of them we never heard of there have been humans always awakened humans in history but it has never been an absolute necessity for humanity to go through this shift in consciousness but now unless we go through this shift in consciousness we are undoubtedly going to destroy ourselves so this is why it's so vital, but the strange thing is, we need this, we need this crisis the evolution of consciousness needs this crisis so it's not a bad thing it's actually a necessary thing to be facing this crisis and because that will bring about the awakening then we begin to inhabit a different world, not a world totally free of challenges but not the havoc that we are creating at the moment which is all, whatever world humans create is a manifestation of their underlying state of consciousness it cannot be otherwise and so the only thing that is threatening us is the human mind dysfunction of the human mind, it's within us there are no external enemies ultimately, the true enemy lies within so that's what it is all about, so the shift in consciousness is now absolutely necessary but it is also

more available and somehow I would say, easier to realize than it has been in the past that's a good thing it is more accessible and easier to realize than it has been in the past but be ready

[Speaker 1] (3:59:24 - 3:59:29)
big challenges are coming and either

[Speaker 2] (3:59:29 - 3:59:43)
they will bring about your awakening or they will make you very, very unhappy to say the least so it's a wonderful thing that

[Speaker 1] (3:59:44 - 3:59:53)
the possibility of human awakening, that is the essence of our age the age we live in is a deep crisis leading to the awakening of human consciousness and it all comes back to where we started this moment presence is called presence because it's inseparable from the present moment that's why it's called presence intense present moment awareness of course you remember the past when necessary you can plan for the future when necessary, fine but otherwise the focus of your life is present moment then everything shifts this is all there ever is actually there is nothing else ever so you might as well recognize it present moment awareness, that's all there ever is this is your life not the memories or future projections this is your life your life is now, it's never not now so you become a friend of the now friendly with now you wake up into the now so to speak and no longer carry this heavy burden of this exclusively personal sense of self the heaviness of the self Buddha talked about the fiction of the self, the illusion of the self the mind made itself with its heaviness of course it's still there, but you're not trapped in it anymore you're still a person but there's more to you than the person and you can sense that there's more to you than the person, so it comes it all comes, very simple present moment present moment awareness is you're aware of whatever is in the present moment sensory perception feelings occasional thoughts and you're aware of yourself, very important you're aware of yourself but not the self that's the person but you're aware of yourself as the awareness itself as the consciousness itself you can sense your beingness so to speak you can sense your presence, you can sense the I am which has nothing to do with your history whether your personal history was a wonderful success story or a great disaster doesn't matter anymore there's something that transcends that if your personal history was a great success story you're probably not motivated yet to enter presence because you are satisfied by superficial things until they collapse because they will if your personal history is a disaster then there's a better chance of awakening but for most people it's a mixed bag bad things have happened, good things have happened but wasn't that great it's very limiting so you go deeper so you become aware of being aware, this sounds a little weird, you sense yourself as beingness or consciousness the presence, I am the presence I am and there's no time in it

nothing to do with whatever happened to you in your past, nothing to do with it and nothing to do with what's going to happen to you

[Speaker 2] (4:04:44 - 4:06:04)
in the future and there's enormous power there, it's the power of life itself, it's the Dao however you want to call it and so and then gradually you live more in that you become more rooted in that dimension and that's the shift that is needed great, thank you everybody stay present that's all that ultimately matters your state of consciousness is the most important thing, it's not an ego thing at all your entire world that you experience is mediated through your state of consciousness thank you, thank you

thank you so much Eckhart

[Speaker 2] (4:06:08 - 4:06:09)
thank you

[Speaker 4] (4:06:09 - 4:07:24)
and thank you all of you for being with us this evening, I wanted to invite you again for those of you who are joining us a little later in the program to Eckhart's new online program, if you want to continue this teaching with Eckhart the program will be beginning in several weeks and we hope you'll join us in a community all over the world and tonight when you sign up after you enroll you'll also receive a special bonus teaching called Living Free from Stress and Anxiety and it includes three of Eckhart's most popular audio programs and we wanted to give everyone the opportunity to listen to these special teachings and prepare for the upcoming program with Eckhart where he'll be guiding us through the doorways into presence, so in addition to receiving a special discount on the program you'll also receive the special bonus teachings when you enroll today and I hope you had a really really good experience here tonight it was so wonderful being with all of you and you can find out more about the program and register at EckhartTolle.com thank you so much

[Speaker 5] (4:07:24 - 4:07:25)
for joining us this evening

something is still missing in my life something is still not right and then you try other relationships and you try other places to live and you try other activities and sooner or later and usually sooner you come again to the place this isn't right either and then you ask what am I really meant to do, where am I really meant to be because it's not here it's never here ultimately because you're not at home deep enough in the now so you can never feel this is never but there's no external solution to that there's only an inner solution to that you come home to the now and you have to drop down beyond the mental emotional accumulations that you confuse with who you are and you sense as I sometimes say the ripple on the surface of the pacific ocean stops thinking of itself as a ripple and senses its own depths and suddenly the ripple feels at one with the depths of the ocean but also feels at one with every other ripple that it sees on the surface of the ocean because it senses its connectedness with the totality with the one and therefore recognizes every other ripple as also being an expression of that and then for the first time it can become comfortable with other ripples really at ease the ripples of course in our analogy are people but there is a source of power in you that transcends the person and it's not egoic power over somebody and it's one with the power that is the power of life in the universe where all life arises and people sometimes have a problem with self confidence or valuing yourself and sometimes you try to convince yourself by changing your thinking that you are actually good enough that you should be self confident but there is a better way to find the source of self confidence on the egoic level self confidence is there because you see you can tell yourself I'm actually more intelligent than most of these people or I'm better looking than most, I have to remind myself that I'm better looking than most and then you, okay yeah I feel a bit more confident now or you say I actually have more money than these people so I should have more self confidence whatever it is, some way of convincing yourself and then you compare yourself with others and then you focus in on those areas where you feel superior to others and try not to think about other areas where inevitably you are inferior to others because you cannot be superior in all areas it's a complicated game when you start comparing yourself to other people and if you want to bolster your self confidence and you only have to focus on where you feel I'm actually better than most but that doesn't really work that well so there is a better way of self confidence that has nothing to do with comparing yourself with others or with feeling you are better than or not as good as and that is direct access to inner power you don't need any comparison you can have it right now at this very moment if you are not stuck in your thinking mind but take your attention a little bit beyond the thinking mind and then realize that you are the presence behind the thinking mind without which there could be no thinking you're the aware presence behind it all that is deeper, you've gone deeper than the thinking mind and that aware presence is where power resides and it's not yours because it connects you with universal power therefore you don't need to compare yourself to anybody anymore or feel as the ego always does that you are either superior or inferior to somebody else that's not a comfortable way to live where you have to classify yourself when you meet people and so your fear is always I might be inferior or behind that fear is a desire to be superior power really, it is feeling your inherent power, I don't often use that word, I just use it for title of a book but there is a source of power in you that transcends the person and it's not egoic power over somebody and it's one with a power that is the power of life in the universe where all life arises and people sometimes have a problem with self confidence or valuing yourself and sometimes you try to convince yourself by changing your thinking that you are actually good enough that you should be self confident but there is a better way to find the source of self confidence on the egoic level self confidence is there because you see you can tell yourself I'm actually more intelligent than most of these people or I'm better looking than most, I have to remind myself that I'm better looking than most and then you, okay yeah I feel a bit more confident now or you say I actually have more money than these people so I should have more self confidence whatever it is, some way of convincing yourself and then you compare yourself with others and then you focus on those areas where you feel superior to others and try not to think about other areas where inevitably you are inferior to others because you cannot be superior in all areas it's a complicated game when you start comparing yourself to other people and if you want to bolster your self confidence and you only have to focus on where you feel I'm actually better than most but that doesn't really work that well so there is a better way of self confidence that has nothing to do with comparing yourself with others or with feeling you are better than or not as good as and that is direct access to inner power you don't need any comparison you can have it right now at this very moment if you are not stuck in your thinking mind but take your attention a little bit beyond the thinking mind and then realize that you are the presence behind the thinking mind without which there could be no thinking you are the aware presence behind it all that is deeper you've gone deeper than the thinking mind and that aware presence is where power resides and it's not yours because it connects you with universal power therefore you don't need to compare yourself to anybody anymore or feel as the ego always does that you are either superior or inferior to somebody else that's not a comfortable way to live where you have to classify yourself when you meet people and so the fear is always I might be inferior or behind that fear is a desire to be superior and when you access true power you recognize you can relate to humans without any sense of either superiority or inferiority and that's amazing liberation you can only do that when you feel your inherent power beyond the mind and mental images of who you are it's wonderfully liberating to be able to meet other human beings and absolutely have no interest in finding out whether you are superior or inferior because you see it's a delusion anyway and then you have that sense of absolute equality with every human being they are all your equals and you are their equals which is nice when you met VIPs then you don't have to go who am I compared to this person you are consciousness essentially and this person is consciousness essentially which has taken form so you may remember the story I told in one of the books there was a Zen teacher abbot of a Zen monastery in Japan who was about to meet VIPs that were visiting the monastery, the governor of the province was coming with his staff and as the governor of the province approached the abbot got up to greet him and at that moment he noticed the palms of his hands were sweaty which is a sign of nervousness and because, so he was very much able to observe himself and he observed that but of course he went on with the ceremony of greeting the officials and the next day he announced to the monks that he was going away, that his realization was not deep enough because he explained he became nervous when the governor of the province came he felt his palms got sweaty so he was not deeply rooted in his own being he went off for several years and then he came back and finally he was able to live in true connectedness with power which is not personal it's an amazing act of self observation another act of self observation you can do you can observe when you relate to people, whether your behavior changes even slightly, whether you behave to, whether you're talking to the lady who is cleaning your office or whether you're talking to the CEO of the company observe in yourself, is the ego still operating and don't beat yourself up if you find that the way in which you relate to the cleaning lady is different from the way you relate to the CEO of your company that's an insight because whenever you discover the ego operating in you which is built on image making it's a great thing meaning you're becoming more conscious the process of becoming conscious often involves becoming conscious of your own ego and see it in action if you then beat yourself up about it, that's more ego on top of the original ego so you get layers of ego, oh my god but I'm still not rid of my ego no ego is nothing, even ego looks personal but it's nothing personal really in ego, it's a pattern of behavior in humanity in the collective unconscious that has been there for been growing for thousands of years, a separate sense of identity, a sense of separateness yes, so observe how whether a great sign if you're beyond ego is that you're the same with everybody and you feel like actually the same with everybody and if you don't then you can observe the ego in action but when you observe the ego it begins to change it cannot sustain itself in the light of your observation the ego requires your unconsciousness so all the egoic patterns in you can only survive if you don't know what you're doing but if you know what you're doing, in other words you're there as the witness as it's sometimes called the observing presence then you can the ego cannot survive when you recognize it as silly for example or you smile at it and you see how silly it is to play one kind of role with one person and then play another kind of role with somebody else who has a different social function why?

what for? are you neither with the CEO nor with the cleaning lady it is a role and the ego plays many roles so is it possible to not play roles?

yes, just be straight, be yourself is the famous saying and of course the question is how can I be myself? who is myself? so you cut through the mental to the place of power and feel that the presence right now for example you are both a person and the deeper presence the moment you start thinking about where you're going to go next or you just think about what happened this morning or what's awaiting you next week or anything else you are the person and the moment you drop down into just spacious presence which feels very much alive you are the aware presence you're not a person right now this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation the most basic thing is not to have a confrontational relationship with what's going on right now and that's not only with your children if you can master that with your children you can master it anywhere that is one of the primary ways of dealing with things in a conscious manner not to internally oppose the isness of this moment

hello now that I'm up here my planned question has eluded me but I have the essence of what I wanted to ask I have two young children and a very busy house on a daily basis it feels like working at a night club it is just chaos with two very young children at the end of the day I feel so exhausted that often I find myself going oh I'm so tired and over time that kind of begins to mentally wear and I don't know how to do the meditating I take quiet moments in the day but I don't seem to know how to feel ah the days ended and that's great because physiologically I am so exhausted and I wanted to know is there a pointer that you could offer or even another form of talking to myself or not talking but whatever it is the response to the intensity of raising two young children which in time will pass but in the now I'm in it is incredibly overwhelming and I cannot seem to stop feeling even when I accept it I'm kind of getting sick of the accepting of the

how old are they

[Speaker 7] (4:30:10 - 4:30:12)
two and six

[Speaker 1] (4:30:14 - 4:32:44)
well ideally I would spend some time at your place to observe how you deal with things and then I could advise you perhaps on how to deal with things in a different way but this probably is not practical so you have to be rather than me you have to be the observing presence in your home you can imagine that it's me the awareness in you so here's Eckhart which just briefly symbolizes the awareness in me it's you watching how I deal with situations that arise throughout the day with the children and all the demands of daily life and that self observation may already be the beginning of some a little bit more spaciousness coming in so you can observe to what extent you just react to every situation so you're at the mercy of every situation because it triggers a reaction in you rather than having a space of freedom and then respond to the situation it doesn't necessarily mean that a lot of the time while you're dealing with things that you have to withdraw and sit on a chair or just rest a moment you probably won't be able to do that and it's not necessary you can't say I need to take a minute off now for presence they won't let you laugh cough but can you be present now let's see since I can't be there could you give one or two examples of because it's always best to look at how it actually arises of a situation and there are probably many during the day that create stress for you that create that kind of reactive turmoil yes

so I've got in the house organized some sort of organized sense it feels a bit calmer the I get the children they go to nursery school for a couple hours a day they come home and my two year old he's pumped up and ready to play and throwing stuff around and they love to run and scream and have a good time that's what they're doing is really having a good time we have calm down time but they're brothers they want to play with the same toy at the same time so that the it appears and feels not unnormal it feels like this is just the functioning of children but the intensity when I'm trying to stay conscious and using my own mind without reacting to them yelling and screaming and fighting over a toy and then we set up a new system this is going to be the new system and then that quickly changes so the changing is this it's like this it's so fast that my brain it's doing this this face expression this is it I'm like this and then they need the food and then the two year old needs all the needs met the clothing and the this and then the six year old wants all the needs met at the same time and it's just mom at home because dad's not home until eight and it is so much that my brain feels like it shorts out so I do take moments of I'll just stand there with them that's when they really try and get me going they know mom is getting peace and they're really great kids I mean it but when they see me getting the peace then they want to really get riled up and have a good time so at the end of the day I just feel knowing that this is a period of time and they grow and it will pass but at this exact now the lack of calmness even amidst a decent schedule a calm schedule feels really challenging

well the calmness of course has to come from within you it doesn't come from outside so one way of accessing it is to not it seems to me that this is quite normal that you spent a lot of time in an antagonistic relationship with what's happening in the present moment

[Speaker 7] (4:35:44 - 4:35:47)
yes I just discovered that the other day yes

[Speaker 1] (4:35:47 - 4:50:58)
and that is the basis of the dysfunction it's not what's happening in the present moment it's your inability which is not really inability because you are able but you just are not practicing it yet to align yourself with the present moment and whatever is taking place in it and not operate with the underlying assumption that this whatever is going on at this moment should not be going on because it's only that underlying assumption that what's going on now should not be going on they're screaming they're throwing things of course if the mind says this should not be going on but it is going on that's how suffering happens and how you then contribute more to this to the upheavals that are continuously taking place because you can't accept this moment as it is and so I would suggest to set aside at first brief practice periods give yourself five minutes ten minutes when you are so bring so much alertness when the children are there and do what they do you bring so much alertness into those five or ten minutes that whatever they do is okay and then you still talk to them tell them something whatever you feel you need to do but in a different way because it doesn't come from a place of non acceptance uh uh very unconscious parents and of course you are not one of them very unconscious parents get angry with their children I've seen parents with small children they knock over a glass at dinner or in a restaurant and the parent gets extremely angry uh no now it's in the nature of a young child not to be able to handle very well they're not as skillful yet handling physical objects so it's in their nature to knock things over and spill things of course you still teach them how to hold it and after some time they learn but obviously they cannot handle things as skillfully and things will get spilled and I have observed parents getting very angry and even hitting their children and spilling something that of course is totally it's a more extreme example I'm sure that's not what you do but it's just taking the same dysfunction to a more to an extreme but the underlying dysfunction is to not be at one with the present moment so instead of feeling that you need to seek stillness and then they will know that because they interpret it as you're withdrawing attention from them when you go into when you kind of stand still or something like that and then they make even more nice because they want to get your attention back so but in this practice they don't even have to notice what you're doing because it's not as doing as such it's see if you can immediately whatever they do it's already done it's already the present moment you can't argue with what is so and then if whatever action you need to take you take this is the most basic thing is not to have a confrontational relationship with what's going on right now and that's not only with our children if you can master that with your children you can master it anywhere in other areas of your life because it's for everybody in whatever situation you find yourself in that is one of the primary ways of dealing with things in a conscious manner not to internally oppose the isness of this moment basically you're already a master when you live like that but if you practice for five minutes at a time then okay then you're a master for five minutes and then you might get you might not succeed even during those five minutes but then you might but there will be times when you actually feels better to live in this way and then you get an incentive to practice a bit more give yourself instead of don't tell yourself from now on I'm going to be completely present with whatever they do that's too much give yourself small spaces at first and then when you find actually it works then they grow a little bit a little bit more space until it becomes second nature and then you're awake and then bringing up your children will have become a more helpful spiritual practice than 20 years in a meditating in a Zen monastery so that really it's your spiritual practice the another thing that is helpful to remember and bear in mind is ultimately bringing up doing what you do with the children telling them what you need to tell them and helping them with what they need is all important but there's something that's more important and that is your state of consciousness behind what you do and say or another way of putting it how you do what you do is more important than what you do how refers to the underlying state of consciousness so this is really the what I'm talking about is surrender doesn't mean they can do whatever they like but internally to be one with what is as it arises then you will sense a certain peacefulness underneath it all and a spaciousness and you don't even, nobody will even notice by looking at you well if I were there I probably would, looking at you very closely so that's the awareness in you growing and I'm leaving aside now other things that you can that are more of a practical matter to what extent to create boundaries for their children, to what extent their behavior those are things that you can learn from other people there used to be a thing on television, well we haven't had cable in some years but when we had still cable I occasionally saw a weekly episode of, I think it was called Super Nanny it was an English nanny she was an actual nanny and she became quite famous because of that program of course it helped that she had a British accent and so she went into the most dysfunctional families, at first the program would always show the chaos in the house and mother and father can't deal with things, everybody screaming and then the super nanny would walk in and I don't think she would have said anything what I said like surrender to the present moment but she had other ways, very useful ways of how one can deal with situations, create certain boundaries but not too many boundaries the balance between boundaries for the children of what behavior is acceptable and what is not acceptable the boundary needs to be wide enough to allow for creative art flow and trying things out and making mistakes and yet it needs to be prevent them from bringing total chaos into the house and those are more external things that you could look at the super nanny is the equivalent of the dog whisperer with the dogs who is again Cesar Milan as you may know had a conversation with on our TV a few years ago he has this ability, he always goes into places with the most dysfunctional dogs, so at first they show you the dog is and then Cesar Milan comes in and sometimes he just looks at them and then they start to behave differently so those are intuitive I believe he does it very intuitively but to come back then to what I can address here is only the level of consciousness what your state of consciousness needs to be in addition to what I said you may want to look into some external things concerning boundaries and so on because some parents for example as everybody probably knows some parents they tell children not to do something but when they start whining and shouting or throwing a tantrum after a few minutes they say okay then go ahead so that's teaching them dysfunction already at an early age another one because then they learn that if they just complain enough and shout enough and show aggression or anger then they'll get what they want another one of course is giving attention some parents only give attention when something is going wrong the main way the main instances when they give attention to their children is just when the children have done something wrong or when they're screaming then they get attention when they're quiet the parent is so busy they can't give attention they've got other things to do then the children learn the more I scream or do things wrong or break things or cry some children learn that the moment I cry she comes running okay then with some children you can actually see they're not really crying they're just going through the motions ahhhh and then the mother comes running get attention what lesson do they learn then when they become adults unhappiness works unhappiness gets me what I want they don't know that that's the lesson they learned it's unconscious and I had that too I had for a long time I was addicted to my unhappiness and the underlying assumption was that somebody, presumably God if I was really unhappy would eventually come and do something about it that was, I knew that was the underlying assumption and why there was so much unhappiness so people, basically they think unhappiness works the adult but the adult may have learned as a child that unhappiness works, because that's what their parents taught them, unconsciously so the adult and some people are stuck with that pattern until they die so they get, they complain and the pain body rises up and thinks I really have to be more unhappy because it's not working yet, but it will work and of course when you're an adult, the opposite is true when you're in that state of consciousness, nothing really works so don't teach the wrong lessons for the rest of their life and attention giving is vital and again just mention it again don't just give attention when there's something going wrong or when they cry or shout it's vital to give real attention when you have a quiet moment together and the reason why there are no quiet moments the children don't even know what it is, because the parents don't give them any quiet moments the life seems to be so demanding, life around them, that parents don't, it's only when something needs to be done, or something needs to be put right, or they need to stop them from doing something then attention is given so give attention, not when they're doing something wrong but when they're just sitting there there's a moment of, and then you talk, you look at them there are parents who only, whatever interaction they have with their children is about either telling them what to do or not to do now you do this, stop doing that now do that, you haven't done that yet, do that in some households the only thing you should do is either do this or don't do that that's from my superficial observation of things so there may be a little bit of that in your house too I don't know, but the quality of the interaction well, you know the expression, there's an expression quality time, it's a little bit of a cliche to spend quality time with someone what that really means is to be present with someone, that's quality time quality time is not watching TV together and have a beer, that's not really not quality time quality time means no time, it's present, giving your fullest attention to somebody, that's quality no time so all these wonderful learning for you and of course for them too so maybe I will see you again next time and you can give a progress report

thank you

[Speaker 1] (4:51:14 - 4:54:52)
so this is a typical example here of Saint Francis teaching and spiritual practice which is to make yourself into nothing very radical a very radical form of spirituality to make, allow yourself to be to disappear don't be the total opposite of what the ego wants the ego wants to stand out and Saint Francis goes that way I sometimes call that the mountain or the valley the ego wants to be the mountain, it wants to assert it's form identity, it's form it's me, it wants in some way it wants to stand out it wants to be the mountain if it cannot be the mountain in victory and triumph, it can at least be the mountain in misery so when you see yourself as a victim egoic identity, you're still a mountain you haven't become a valley it's a very strong ego identity and you complain to people how miserable you are and how life and other people have treated you you're still a mountain it's exactly the same as you say how great you are and the great things that you have achieved, both are egoic mountains and by strengthening your form identity you cut yourself off from the true power which is, of course that which is beyond the person, which is deeper than the person so in one way or another, the ego has to dissolve either through intense suffering that life inflicts on you, or the voluntary surrender to life, which is what Saint Francis preaches but also that what we do here, it's the voluntary coming into the present moment and so on they're all ways of transcending the ego

it is likely that you have encountered presence and you do from time to time, or perhaps quite often encounter presence without recognizing it for what it is it could just be a moment when you feel at ease

[Speaker 5] (4:56:20 - 4:56:28)
you feel a sense of well-being a sense of peaceful aliveness

[Speaker 2] (4:56:30 - 4:56:44)
not because you have desensitized yourself, not because you've taken some substances not because you're about to fall asleep not because there's a lowering of your consciousness, no it's a

[Speaker 5] (4:56:44 - 4:56:46)
heightened consciousness

[Speaker 2] (4:56:46 - 4:57:09)
thinking of course is a manifestation of consciousness emotions are a manifestation of consciousness, sense perceptions could not exist without consciousness, so we're talking about, when we use presence, talking about the essence of what you are

[Speaker 5] (4:57:09 - 4:57:21)
which is consciousness, the light of consciousness, one could

[Speaker 2] (4:57:21 - 4:57:52)
say this vast consciousness that is universal consciousness, it's not only within you, it is also without it is the, one could say the intelligence that underlies all phenomenal manifestations of the universe, there's a hidden concealed hidden vast intelligence that gives rise

[Speaker 5] (4:57:54 - 4:58:40)
to the evolution of all life forms impossible for us to understand it but we can sense it within ourselves as the essence of our being so the easiest way to point to presence is to say that you encounter it when you stop thinking for a moment without losing consciousness, stop

thinking means the continuous voice in the head that usually comments on what's going on around you or comments on all kinds of things, imaginary scenarios and so on, the conditioned voice in the head that you live with everybody lives with that voice in their head that talks all the time inside, or if it talks aloud then you're considered crazy people say there's people walking in the streets talking out aloud and you say oh they're mentally insane, but the only difference between a normal human being and those people that you call mentally insane is that those you do not call mentally insane they're still doing the same thing, they're just not talking out aloud, it's happening in their head it's a continuous stream of thinking and that creates the ego the egoic sense of self an ultimately fictitious identity that you are infinitely more than the entity created by the movement of thought and the emotions that reflect the movement of thought there's infinitely more to you than what you conventionally call the person a person is a conditioned entity, a form that consciousness has taken and most humans unless they are awakening already spiritually, which is what we are talking about, the arising of presence is spiritual awakening unless you are awakening and many of you are awakening even if you don't have words for it many of you are here because you're awakening otherwise this session would be totally meaningless to you and there may be a few to whom it is totally meaningless what is this guy talking about so you must have had a glimpse of what it is that I'm talking about and if you haven't perhaps you can have it now and that glimpse is the possibility

[Speaker 2] (5:00:55 - 5:01:04)
of arriving at the briefly at first the cessation of thinking the voice in the head

[Speaker 5] (5:01:05 - 5:01:27)
stops and yet consciousness remains and you can look around or look at this image on the screen or look around the room take everything in but you're not thinking about it

[Speaker 2] (5:01:29 - 5:01:39)
it's just sensory perception and what is behind the sensory perception? Presence. Another word for it is awareness awareness so there's an awareness that is perceiving at this moment and that awareness is silent but it's awake and that awareness is the

[Speaker 5] (5:01:39 - 5:01:59)

[Speaker 2] (5:01:59 - 5:02:09)
deeper dimension to who or what you are that's no longer the person that you usually think of

[Speaker 5] (5:02:09 - 5:03:00)
when you say I there's a deeper I there's a deeper I a deeper sense of being that transcends a personal sense of identity so you can sense there's an awareness in you a consciousness and that consciousness is perceiving it doesn't need to interpret it it knows at a very deep level but not conceptually you can look around your room or wherever you are you know that there's furniture or whatever there is

but you don't call it anything you just allow it to be so there is instead of a person perceiving things which is when you are always interpreting commenting and labeling mentally instead of a person you are now perceiving not as a person you are perceiving as an awareness so there's a shift from personal sense of self shift to a deeper level you could call it deeper or higher it doesn't matter to a deeper level of consciousness where you are not a person you are that which is prior to the person and that's awareness

presence and that's amazing you can then

[Speaker 2] (5:03:46 - 5:04:05)
be aware of that awareness you can sense this presence that you are in addition to whatever you are perceiving it's in the background of your sense perceptions, the background of your life it's a spacious vast presence

[Speaker 5] (5:04:06 - 5:04:14)
that connects you to something that we cannot really

[Speaker 2] (5:04:15 - 5:04:44)
define or talk about it's deep and it's infinite it's a soul it's not just the depth of your being it connects you to the very soul of the universe the ancients ancient Romans and Greeks had this wonderful term anima mundi which is latin for the soul of the world there is such a thing as a world

[Speaker 5] (5:04:44 - 5:04:47)
soul and that is

[Speaker 2] (5:04:48 - 5:06:19)
your soul presence, the consciousness that you are is a ray or a spark of that inseparable from the soul of the totality, so it's a liberation from the ego itself liberation from the self then life becomes more harmonious when you begin to invite that consciousness into your life, that presence your life begins to flow with greater ease, more harmoniously not that you are not challenged anymore, challenges continue but all the challenges do once you begin to awaken to presence challenges then deepen your presence and in fact you need the difficulties in your life to deepen your presence as you begin to awaken any challenge will deepen your presence in the early stages it could also happen that challenges take you completely out of presence, when you encounter difficult situations or people can take you totally out of presence, but gradually as you become a bit more established, rooted in that presence the opposite happens, challenges don't make you unconscious they make you more conscious

so in a nutshell presence is awareness without thought and then thinking becomes a more helpful

[Speaker 2] (5:06:45 - 5:07:23)
tool rather than something that torments you many people their thinking mind torments them continuously they have an unhappy sense of self they talk to themselves using unhappy words they talk about other people using unhappy words and concepts when they confuse what the voice in the head with actual reality out there they can't tell the difference between what is and the way in which they interpret what is, which is the conditioning of the mind when you come to an alignment

[Speaker 2] (5:07:29 - 5:07:45)
with what is, which is always now, life becomes easier not free of challenges but much easier and challenges don't produce unhappiness anymore

[Speaker 5] (5:07:47 - 5:07:59)
that's a big thing and the difficulties of your life don't make you unhappy anymore amazing

[Speaker 2] (5:08:28 - 5:08:29)
on solstice

[Speaker 1] (5:08:34 - 5:09:51)
the sun reaches its highest point and then reverses its course so to speak from our perspective doesn't really, but from the perspective of Tom here on earth and from our perspective it's a kind of still point between two movements solstice actually means sun and stis comes from latin which means standing still so it appears that for a moment the sun stands still poised little bit like throwing a ball into the air, you throw it up and it rises and then there comes a moment a very brief moment when it stops rising and hasn't started falling yet and that's the point of stillness

and perhaps that's the reason

[Speaker 1] (5:10:05 - 5:10:12)
or the deeper reason why in many cultures solstice is a spiritual event

[Speaker 2] (5:10:12 - 5:10:21)
the still point

[Speaker 1] (5:10:25 - 5:10:29)
it's a similar point that is there when you

[Speaker 2] (5:10:34 - 5:10:39)
breathe in and you come to the

[Speaker 1] (5:10:39 - 5:10:49)
end of the in-breath for a brief moment there's that still point between the two breaths

[Speaker 2] (5:10:49 - 5:10:51)
between the in-breath and the out-breath

[Speaker 1] (5:10:59 - 5:14:31)
and again at the end of the out-breath there's another brief still point before the in-breath starts and those are very powerful points if you become aware of them they are wonderful portals into stillness you can do it even now as you listen to me you breathe out the end of the out-breath there's a cessation of movement when you pay attention to it it might become a little bit longer but there's no need to force it in any way when you pay attention to it it naturally becomes a little bit longer so reaching that dimension within you becoming aware of that stillness the in-breath and out-breath can be helpful they contain the whole movement of your life and the universe the beginning of the in-breath that starts from the still point is the coming into form birth growth development then reaching maturity achievement and then you reach that point of cessation point of stillness and then comes the reverse movement and you have to become aligned with that reverse movement in your life

for example

[Speaker 1] (5:14:33 - 5:15:32)
and surrender into it and recognize it for what it is the natural movement return journey back into where it all started the stillness if you're not aligned with it or resist it it's very unpleasant because you realize that instead of growth and development and gaining and obtaining and multiplying and adding to you're experiencing the opposite you may experience loss

[Speaker 2] (5:15:33 - 5:15:36)
or people around you begin to

disappear

[Speaker 2] (5:15:39 - 5:15:48)
things are shrinking instead of growing

[Speaker 1] (5:15:50 - 5:15:57)
even your physical body you might begin to notice starts

[Speaker 2] (5:16:02 - 5:16:04)
shrinking in some way

[Speaker 1] (5:16:20 - 5:18:39)
so if you become aligned with that movement which traditionally might be called you realize that you're beginning to grow old that can be a wonderful thing and as I said if you're not surrendered to it recognize that it is a universal movement and can be deeply spiritual if you're aligned with it but if you're not it's a painful process if you're still stuck in your ego by the time you reach that reversal from development and growth to the opposite movement then the opposite movement is experienced as very painful in meditation I'd say that the out-breath is more important than the in-breath it's when you let go and in your life potentially the stage of dissolution has greater potential spiritually than the developmental stage but no matter how old you are, you may be 20 years old you can already experience in every in-breath and out-breath you can already experience that universal movement

outgoing outgoing and ingoing

there's content the content of your mind which consists of thoughts and most people have the need to fill up their mind and their life with more content it's a compulsion almost an addictive searching for more stuff to identify with so that you can increase the content of things that the mind identifies with so most people carry around content in the mind in the form of thoughts bundles of thoughts that contain a sense of self that you identify with or in the words of Don Miguel Ruiz that you have faith in and that's all they know their life consists of content both externally one could say everything absorbs their attention continuously stuff things things to acquire things to be worried about things to do problems and thoughts one after another you have to think about this and this continuously continuously so your entire inner space is filled up with content no breathing room a room full of stuff and that's the self there's a self identification with stuff which ultimately is the mind thought stuff life and you feel you're choking to death almost life is experienced as frustrating and bringing up one dilemma after another so the essence of our gathering here is to find the inner space that is there although you may have accumulated a lot of content in your mind there is always behind it or underneath it a vastness of inner space or stillness even in the most nervous and irritated and hyperactive human mind even there underneath there is a dimension of stillness you just have to look for it to feel it to sense it within yourself underneath all the stream of thinking it is therefore vital that you have space in yourself be aware of space in yourself stillness or space just two different pointers to the same thing no thing at this moment is there space in you now if you're not bored when you listen to these words there is space in you so don't try to figure out don't try to figure out whether or not there is space in me through the mind how do I know whether there is space in me a very simple criterion to use is if you are not bored or angry right now or irritated there is space in you the dimension is there that's because it's only from there that you can sit here and not be bored or irritated or angry now if you are bored or irritated or angry you can either walk out and be irritated bored and angry somewhere else or even there you can say oh I feel bored irritated angry and who knows that how do you know that well I'm aware that I am bored or irritated or angry so are you the boredom the anger or the irritation or are you the awareness of the boredom the anger or the irritation so I'm giving you another chance so before you walk out you can try that now I assume that most of you are not bored irritated or angry from sensing the energy field and so there's the why are you not bored irritated or angry because there is a stillness or space in you now oh oh and you haven't disappeared as a form identity you're still sitting there in the chair yes here's the body there may even be occasional thoughts occasionally in and out and then again under that all that is there may even be a little bit in your stomach that says oh I should have had breakfast am I picking up somebody's thought I should have had breakfast then I wouldn't be hungry now okay and again the stillness underneath it and between it and so your life then is continuously a movement of being there as a form identity but knowing yourself essentially as the space then you are free from being trapped in the form and making your life a misery because no matter how hard you try and what you do you can do all the right things but if the valley is missing in your life then the most vital dimension is missing from your life and no matter how conscientious you are and do all the right things and are tidy and your life is arranged logically and maybe you have a life plan for the next 15 years for every year you know what you want to do nothing wrong with that and you'll still be creating misery because no matter how hard you try if that the vital dimension is missing your life is one dimensional and then even the greatest success who knows one or two of you in three four years time or five years time maybe will reading about you in people magazine and there are worse magazines than people, people is actually people is not so negative there are many others who love talking negatively and then you taste the, what success is like and fame now am I saying don't seek success no the beautiful thing is you can you can still play in the world of form and you play more beautifully when you realize it is only a relative truth and anything that you achieve as this mountain is only relatively true and valid and it will come to an end and everything you achieve as a mountain will have its other side to it everything you lose is loss and gain there is always the interplay you may gain many things and they will produce their own challenges and you will see the other part of success and so you no matter what you do you will never for long find that now your life is actually great it's working, it's all working now that on the form level never really happens for very long but that doesn't matter when you are in touch with the formless however I am not saying that if you are in touch with the valley that it does not affect the world of form it does you will notice that first of all the sense of heaviness and seriousness which is ultimately fear goes out of your life and when you are no longer dealing with situations and people from that place of seriousness and heaviness and ultimately anxiety and fear then the world that you experience or what you experience as the world changes because a different quality flows out, it is that quality that comes from the unmanifested so there tends to be a great improvement in the way in which you experience the world because you experience in a more gentle way even the so called problems because you are not giving them you are not feeding the so called problems with your reactivity and your heaviness and your fear because the more fear you bring to the challenges the greater the challenges become or the so called problems become through your reaction and it's only from the place of being the valley that you can be in a state of non-reaction when challenges arise in the form of people or situations people can be very challenging situations can be challenging but if you if every challenge brings out the fear you cannot be without fear as long as you are identified with the mountain because you want to survive as this thing that fear only goes when you are in touch with the space and then you don't need to react respond when necessary, yes react, no and many problems are dissolved when you simply don't react because quite often there is nothing much you can do anything you do in many cases, not all, sometimes action is required, but in many cases anything you do, you only add to the problem so what's the problem now? what happens when you look at that phrase, what's the problem now?

your attention then goes from being absorbed in oh my god, what's going to happen to now is that a problem now? and then you have to wake up into now to answer the question on this little card, what's the problem now? you have to actually wake up into the now because you never know there might be a problem now, you have to focus attention and look and so suddenly your attention moves into the present moment, and there you stand in front of your bathroom mirror and, okay, what's the problem now?

you look, well then the mind says, oh, you're looking old it looks in the mirror that's the problem no, of course it's not a problem it's a thought that arises and usually the mind has of course more complicated things to say, but then you realize that at this moment it's not actually a problem but the mind says, yes, but it will become a problem in the next moment but of course when the next moment comes, it comes again as this moment and you have to ask the question again what is the problem now? and the amazing realization will come to you that there never is a problem now only a situation you can deal with it, or leave it alone for the time being it's never a problem some situations demand immediate action and then, of course, it's not a problem there's no time for it to become a problem if it demands immediate action you look, and you act other things you may have to think about you might occasionally have to think okay, what are the possible solutions to this situation and what to do then is to apply focused thinking, but before you do that you become still present and then you, out of that then comes, okay, what are the possibilities in this situation, I could pick up the phone and make a phone call to that person I can look, go to that place and ask for help, I can go there too, and I can do that 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, write it down put it aside, okay and then, which one of these can I do now, and then you do it it's never, it's not a it's not a problem, if I juggle ideas thoughts in my mind uselessly that's a problem what what if, what if attention back to now, what's the problem now and so it's always amazing to realize that the now is free of problems because you're breathing you're perceiving your senses you feel the aliveness in the body and more than enough to deal with any situation that may arise or may be there I've mentioned a few times the ancient Greek myth of Narcissus the young man who, according to this tale, mythological tale he looked into a pool of water and saw his own reflection and according to the story fell in love with himself or rather the reflection of himself and I see this as a way of explaining what happened to the human mind that created a reflection of itself in the mind and began to identify with the reflection so at that point humans began well when the myth of Narcissus was created by we don't know who by then probably that process had already started a long time before that so falling in love with the mental reflection of yourself or I would slightly reinterpret that not so much falling in love because it's not always necessarily love the relationship that you have with yourself can be a very problematic one and sometimes it's self-hatred so rather than calling it love I would say he became obsessed with himself he became obsessed with that image that he saw but what the myth is pointing to is that it's something that happened in the human psyche collectively and suddenly humans started every human being started to have a relationship with himself or herself it's a strange thing and then the increasingly the mind the thinking mind the unobserved mind contributed more to that so the image it's not just a visual image gradually got replaced more and more by a conceptual image in one's mind of who one is and then gradually deriving one's sense of self from that conceptual image of oneself the other day I looked up I'd forgotten what happened to this man Narcissus in the mythological tale I looked it up the other day and it seems that he eventually committed suicide this is significant too because here too there's a deep truth embedded in that and that is that the human ego seems to have a self-destruct mechanism built into it in other words it is the main it is the main cause of human suffering because it is the egoic unconsciousness especially on a collective level that creates a large the largest percentage of human suffering if you look back 20th century most of the dreadful suffering was not through natural disasters or even through illness that happened to individual human beings or accidents that happened to individual human beings but man-made suffering suffering through violent conflict and so the ego creates suffering for yourself both on a personal level and on a collective level the ego being the unobserved mind in the absence of awareness in the absence of presence it creates suffering, it doesn't want to create suffering it wants you to be more fully yourself it wants you to be better than others if you can't be better in victory you can be better in your misery than others more miserable than others and through the suffering it creates the suffering is also the factor that as you may remember yesterday I described as a spiritual teacher everybody has a spiritual teacher and for most people it's their suffering it's a strange fact that eventually the suffering that is to a large extent not 100% self-created that huge amount of suffering that if you look at it objectively you say, why? it seems so absurd and unnecessary both what humans do themselves on a personal level and collectively it is so unnecessary if you look at the madness of the first world war that then got extended into the second world war for almost for nothing they started killing each other the ego, the collective ego needed to triumph so the suffering large amount of which is self-ego created eventually awakens you and then the awakening is the end of the ego so there is a self-destruct mechanism built into the ego which is a good thing one of the most important things on your spiritual path is awareness of those patterns that we call egoic that still operate in you and you only really recognize them in situations when you relate to people when you encounter problematic situations, difficult people obstacles on your path it's then that's why these things are so helpful you could easily remove yourself to a little cabin for a year and you might find either you will go insane because your own mind will drive you insane or you might if you are a good meditator you might be able to achieve a measure of inner peace through daily meditation in your cabin and there is nothing wrong to occasionally withdrawing but if you do that as your as a way into the spiritual dimension then you may find that the depth of your presence that arises in the protective environment of the cabin or even the ashram it may not be very deep and then when you come out of your cabin and go back into being with people and encountering situations you may find that you quickly lose it as the story I told before that was told me by a monk, a buddhist monk, western born buddhist monk in Thailand he went very deep eventually but when he was a young monk he meditated in a little hut up the mountain half an hour from the main monastery and was there in isolation for I believe six months or longer and one person would bring him food once a day and nothing disturbed him except the bees and the mosquitoes and the heat so he had to surrender to these things which after a while he was able to do and then he became more and more peaceful. At some point the bees, for some reason there were lots of bees there and his sometimes his body would be covered with bees and he made peace with the bees and said it's okay giving them loving kindness, metta and he didn't get, they didn't sting him it's amazing and then after a few months he had to go, come back into the monastery and then he had to go to the city, Bangkok to renew his visa after achieving what he thought was sublime states of inner peace in the cabin so he overcame the obstacle of the bees, he overcame because he surrendered, the obstacle of the mosquito, the obstacle of the extreme heat the obstacle of relatively little food all that he surrendered to and so became very very peaceful and thought this is enlightenment, I made it and so he had to go to Bangkok to renew his visa and there was a line up and although he was a Buddhist monk for some reason he was highly respected in Thailand but he still had to line up and after one hour in this line up he got to the man and said no this is the wrong line up you have to go there and then he could feel he was beginning to lose his inner peace and then he went to the second line up waited there and finally after half an hour got to the next man and said okay well there's something missing here there are two stamps on this form you should have gone over there first before you line up here and at that point he lost his peace completely and he found himself banging onto the table I have been standing here for two hours lining up and you are telling me now I must go there and at that moment he observed himself again so he wasn't totally lost he just lost it briefly but the deep peace didn't come back for a long time after that this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation it's working it says the time is now totally accurate over the years many people have sent me now watches I have a collection of about 10 with different dials some dials at every hour it says now, now, now and then I have others you have to press a button and then it says now and then another button that gives you the time or we have in our kitchen we have a clock that somebody sent it doesn't say now but it shows all the numerals the numbers in a pile at the bottom of the clock and on the dial it says whatever laughter it's easy to forget that it's always now and only now and if you could remember that, not as a memory but have that as a live realization every moment or to put it more accurately in the moment because there's only really one moment although what happens in it changes if you knew that then there would be it that's the awakened state of consciousness you would be in alignment with whatever happens so the ultimate spiritual practice is to remember remember may not be the right word that it's now and only ever now this is now this is your life that you may remember from a power of now or somewhere I talked about usually when people refer to my life, they say my life I call that it's your life situation whatever is going on in your life connected with the usual things that are of concern to people which is your health your relationships your work or lack of it finances living situation usually those things make up your life, my life but I call that your life situation as opposed to life which is only ever now your life situation exists in the mind you have to keep it alive there it's important of course you have to deal with situations as they arise in your life but they only arise in the present moment and when you think about your life situation you can only think about it in the present moment it's important to have these two your life and your life situation and not allow your life situation to completely obscure your life your presence your sense of aliveness your spaciousness and that's helpful to bring attention to learn to bring attention to your senses the expression we could use is come to your senses those five senses so you become more aware of what surrounds you inhabit the body it's another one that connects you with life it takes you out of the conceptualizing mind be here now come to your senses inhabit the body be here now all one and then you don't carry continuously with you like a heavy burden your life situation of course you address whatever challenges arrive you deal with them as they arise in the present moment occasionally you might have to do some planning or some strategy occasionally but also that happens in the present moment for the rest of the time don't allow your life situation to completely obscure completely stifle your sense of aliveness your presence in the moment because then you walk around with the burden of a very heavy personality and you don't see what's around you anymore you can't truly relate to other humans because you have the heaviness of your problematic life situation and whose life situation is not problematic it's in the nature of life situations to be problematic of course you arrange your life as best you can your life situation as best you can yes you may acquire new skills or you can get a better job or in whatever way you improve or attempt to improve your life situation find a nicer place to live why not that's all fine but the expectation that at some point life should leave you alone and not challenge you anymore and that there's something wrong when life challenges you that's a delusion that itself the unconscious assumption that there's something wrong when life presents so called problems to you better word is challenges there's an unconscious assumption and an unconscious resentment and negative reaction the moment you are faced with a new challenge because of the underlying assumption that these things should not be happening but no matter how carefully you arrange your life situation and no matter how much positive thinking you do which is a nice thing you will still be challenged by life you will still experience the polarities of life you will experience for example that every situation, every new situation has its new set of challenges and you will realize even when you achieve what you want to achieve the very thing that you believe would lead to ultimate fulfillment when you achieve what you want to achieve when you finally get there you will find very quickly that even that new wonderful situation presents a new set of challenges so you're never left alone your life will not leave you alone and so it's in the nature of life to give you challenges in your life situation so if you could remove or realize the fallacy of believing that such challenges should not occur then that will improve your or enhance your ability to deal with situations greatly it also will remove the otherwise continuous arising of negativity when you are faced with life situations from big to small with challenges in your life situation if you assume that there shouldn't be any challenges you become negative there's something wrong you resent it you resent, if you believe in God, you can have an argument with God I can't take anymore God you've gone too far this time laughter or you can draw the conclusion that there is no God because your life would be easier if there were an intelligent God he would obviously make your life easy and everybody else's life too so therefore there can be no God we'll address that some other time laughter so the it's the very same thing as I've mentioned before somewhere people like to watch movies and movies are a kind of reflection of life, especially if they are good movies and they are art in general, like literature good fiction is a reflection of life it's always ultimately about you and would you want to see a movie in which nothing ever goes wrong? laughter it would not be very interesting the characters would not be faced with any dilemma, no challenges they wouldn't develop you would fall asleep or you walk out it's the essence of every movie the plot, the so called plot, almost every movie there might be one or two exceptions can't think of any you can reduce every movie, explain what happens in the movie soon after it starts something goes wrong in the plot it has to, otherwise there's no interest so you love it when you see it in a movie you hate it when it happens to you laughter so if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack, of insufficiency of not enough and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack in order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness of not enough spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary focus on the realization of being it's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person and you become aligned with the isness of things thereby the ego diminishes now most people only begin doing that when they realize that they've been unhappy for too long the greater part of their unhappiness arose through the mental narrative about the situations they encounter in their lives the I that most people then refer to this word refers to is what I call the surface self that is made up of your personal history of course all the things that you have experienced and all the things that from your past that you identify with, things that you have done, things that were done to you, things you have achieved things you have experienced, the entire culture in which you grew up the collective culture in your particular country the familiar the background of your family how they behaved all those things together leave traces and all these after a while it begins at an early age of course it begins already when the first time you utter the word I, when you are whatever two years old as you probably know very young children when they first learn to speak they often refer to themselves in the third person and they might say oh John wants a drink, but who is John? I oh that's interesting after a while they switch from the third person to the first person and they utter the word I and that becomes the most fascinating word for them and gradually things accumulate around this I which at first is just a sound I and then over the years things accumulate around that sound but of course it's not just a sound but it's also a thought it's a concept in your head it's a thought, it's a primordial thought the thought form of I so it's not just a sound it's a thought and around that thought gradually things, it's like things stick to it it attracts things so with a child it starts with toys, there are certain toys, but this toy is not the child very quickly learns this toy is not just any toy it's mine I have a relationship with this toy, it belongs to me it's my toy and that is how very often the child well, not very often, always the child experiences for the first time the suffering that arises through egoic identification just remove that toy from here to there or maybe just touch it and the child goes that deep suffering oh my god my toy and then of course you put it back and then immediately it goes and then another child comes and again the same thing happens and you can see how enormous suffering arises not because this toy has been removed from the child or moved from this point to that point by somebody, that would be a very neutral event but because something has happened in the mind of that child the concept of I has attracted to itself this thing which is another thought ultimately because the toy is out there but in my mind the toy is a concept this my toy and that concept sticks to the primordial original concept of I which is the surface I of who I think I am the I and then for the first time the child experiences what 2,500 years ago the Buddha described as suffering and the Buddha said wherever you go whatever you do whatever situation you are in you will encounter dukkha which in the Pali language translated is suffering because the I that you think you are identifies with things that are unstable that cannot last things that do not have the capacity to make you happy or to fulfill you or to tell you who you are and so for the first time the child at this early age experiences the truth of the utterings of the Buddha without knowing it of course and the suffering that arises when you identify with something so when your feeling of identity becomes associated with things and concepts and then of course you graduate from the it's not just a toy only the beginning and of course then the person grows up and identification comes with many other things your parents what your parents have or don't have or more and more concepts accumulate around the I what you are taught by the surrounding culture that you live in who you are, the culture may tell you who you are you belong to this particular culture if you grow up in Australia whatever sticks to the I will be very different from the collective culture from what would stick to your concept of I if you grew up in Saudi Arabia would be very different, a very different I and yet the basic mechanism behind it would be the same, the central concept I identifies with certain things and then your sense of who you are gradually develops and it consists of things that ultimately you are not, but you don't know that, so you identify with the collective, you identify in some countries you still identify very strongly with not only your family, but the history of your family which are all mental concepts what your grandparents did and their, what their parents did and in some cases you can you need that people from some cultures who come to the West are surprised that many Western people know very little about their ancestors and in other cultures you have a very strong awareness of your ancestors and again, that looks like a nice thing on one end you could say but unfortunately these ancestors that you identify with, either in a positive or negative way positive, hopefully positive, they have achieved this or that or they were the victims of those other people 300 years ago and then that becomes part of your collective victim identity that you are already taught when you are 6 years old that 300 years ago these things happened to your people, inflicted by those people and of course immediate, all those concepts accumulate around the central the central concept of I and you, without knowing it, you become more and more trapped in a prison-like identity and finally you reach adulthood and then you have an I that is feels semi-complete but by no means complete, it is still looking out continuously for things to enhance its sense of self, its sense of identity, of who you are because your personal history, yes it has done a lot to give you your sense of identity but it's not enough, it feels unfulfilled, this sense of I it feels not enough and it feels not clearly defined yet so in order to be more clearly defined in some cases you might say what I need is achievement, there is nothing wrong with achievement but in the service of I achievement is something different I need a possessor and possessions to tell me who I am I need that and once I have that then I'll be okay and then you spend a few years 10, 20, 30 striving after accumulating this or that or recognition of other people they need to recognize that I am the greatest or people need to recognize that nobody has been more victimized than me I have been so victimized by life that I'm superior in my victimhood to most people so the I doesn't mind whether you have, when people talk about ego, people usually think that these are people who have a strong ego who think they are better than everybody I'm the greatest I'm the master of the universe I work on Wall Street and I manipulate things behind the scenes and so you feel great until your bank collapses or whatever and then you have big suffering but let's put that aside for a moment so you have, you identify with that very strongly and so this is usually what people associate with E when they say he has a big ego or she has a big ego or if you're not on Wall Street maybe you have a wonderful body I saw a man walking in the street this morning he had taken off his shirt it wasn't that warm but he was he was the only one who walked around the streets by the harbor without a shirt but of course I immediately realized why he had taken off his shirt because he had the most fantastic physique just masculine everybody looked at him and some people tried not to look maybe he's even here tonight in which case I congratulate you on your fantastic physique and why not enjoy that but realize that it's being used in the service of this surface identity it becomes a mental concept that makes you feel superior to most others and if you say my body is superior to most others then well it probably is for a while and then of course a time will come when it no longer is superior just wait a little as the years pass and then one day you look in the mirror and you realize that something has happened to the mirror and it's not good but in the meantime of course you can be okay for a while and the suffering comes later the suffering is always just around the corner when you identify with things concepts, things, because even that body it's not really, it's not the body that makes up the ego it is the mental concept of my body of identification with that then it becomes ego you can enjoy your body if it's strong and I never had that my body was never strong and great looking so my ego didn't go that way my ego said leave the body alone because this is for people who are not highly developed so my ego said but I have intelligence and knowledge I've read more books than these people they probably never read a single book in their lives but I had more and more I attempted to accumulate knowledge through reading and then I could feel and sound temporarily superior when I met people with wonderful bodies and I could say I could say clever things and make them feel inferior so it was a struggle sometimes it worked but it always meant there's an underlying feeling of unease am I superior or not other people, I lived in England for many years when I was young there of course you still have identification with your social background less these days than it used to be but the way it used to be in England to some extent perhaps still is the moment you opened your mouth and uttered a word in English in England, people would immediately know what social class you belong to weird and so people consciously emphasized their accent upper class accent and even the way you pronounce the word no would betray your social background or you were so good at imitating and many people did that that you sounded upper class just by saying, you don't say no, you say no no and you could talk about your ancestors and their country and their very mansion and whatever okay, that's great I feel superior I couldn't do that either because I didn't know I'd know my grandparents but nothing beyond that so it can't have been a very big story to identify with so all these things as you know the collective eye in some cultures is much stronger than the personalized eye in the western world it tends to be a bit more personalized for men, not for everybody but in some countries you're a very strong collective and often might have to do with your religion and of course that was also the case in the west until not that long ago and then you have a sense again of superiority that's one of the key things to understand about the surface eye is a feeling of superiority it looks for that it needs that and it always finds it and even if you are if you have nothing if you can't think of anything any way in which you are superior to anybody else neither physically nor mentally nor in possessions nor in ancestry what do you do then?

you become a victim and you can in your mind what clings to the eye is you as either the personal victim or the collective victim and this is becoming very fashionable these days collective victimhood not to deny that of course things have been done to certain groups of people in the past things also have been done to individuals in the past that were very bad but to use that history, that collective history or personal history in the service of an identity that is a delusion and it is unconscious and people don't know that this is what they are doing because everybody is seeking for a stronger sense of identity so if they can't find it in a positive way they will happily have a negative identity as the greatest victims so the this is the collective identity thing is very fashionable these days and again it's unfortunately an illusion because that is not you get trapped in your surface identity enemies it loves the surface identity if it can't feel superior in any other way it loves its enemies we are surrounded by enemies you can do it personally regard other people as wanting something from you or out to get you or the whole collective does it in some ways certain nations do it, entire nations cannot survive without the collective concept of our enemies for example, National Socialism was that in Germany, Communism was that especially in Soviet Russia and nowadays we still have North Korea North Korea can only be held together by this collective victim identity of we are surrounded by enemies and that keeps the collective ego going or we feel so our identity is now so clearly defined because we are surrounded by enemies, isn't that wonderful they are all out to kill us now we know who we are and let's kill them first so they don't kill us you can see how the it is a form of it is a delusional identity so that is everybody walks with that sense of self and it makes your life difficult it creates enormous amount of unnecessary conflict when I talk about enemies, just one more thing almost everybody the way in which there is one little function that one could call also creating enemies, I call that complaining complaining is when you can do it either in your mind or out loud it doesn't matter, it works both ways you can complain in your mind about where you are something is not right about the situation who you are with, what you are doing, but don't want to be doing but you are doing it, but it's terrible or you complain about something that should have happened, but didn't happen or something that should not have happened, but it happened and you can complain about how people behave when you talk about how people behave towards you for example, you have a enormous, inexhaustible source of complaints because people tend to be difficult and not do things that they are supposed to do so you have an enormous source of complaints and every complaint in your mind, you know what he did he told a story of what he did or didn't do or you all know people wherever they go into a hotel they are looking for something to complain about and of course, invariably they find something if you are looking for something to complain about, you will find something you can come here too to this talk and if you are deeply trapped in the complaining pattern you are already in your mind complaining about what is this guy saying I shouldn't have come here I knew I shouldn't have why did I listen to him I always do that complain if you can catch and this is an egoic device which is really you making either a person or a situation or a location or an activity that you complain about mentally, you are basically making it into an enemy and therefore it strengthens the illusory identity of the ego so I recommend that as your spiritual practice you catch yourself mentally whenever you have a complaining thought in your head and when I say complaining, I am not talking about something you can actually do something about obviously if you move into a hotel you get into your room and the bed has not been, the sheets have obviously not been changed and it's dirty, the bathroom is dirty I am not telling you to be so spiritual that now you sit there and say I am not complaining I am going to sleep in this dirty bed and feel really spiritual no by complaining, I mean the useless complaining that is not designed to and cannot change anything in the situation so there of course you have an example of something you can take action you can go down to the reception and you can say the bed has not been the sheets have not been changed and the bathroom is dirty, could you please do something about it and again there are two ways of doing that and saying that, one is in the service of making wrong which is the ego way so then you talk to the receptionist or it's probably not the receptionist's fault but you're making the receptionist wrong how dare you put me in this room with a dirty bed the ego loves that and then the receptionist becomes your enemy and in making the receptionist your enemy you feel stronger in your identity and then you look for something maybe I can complain about something else just wait until they serve you the soup or the food at dinner laughter it's not hot enough laughter but you can also go to the receptionist and say without any kind of undertone of making wrong in a way that is free of ego you can say oh I got in my room and I discovered that the sheets have not been changed and the bathroom is still dirty, can you please do something about it, no ego so the situation is there not used in the service of the ego, not used to strengthen the illusory identity of ego, therefore to in this situation the second option I just gave you is not satisfying to the ego, it does not feed it and this is why many egos don't like doing it that way laughter so complain is something very very common in many people even people who are already awakening to the spiritual dimension to the deeper eye, they're still trapped in this complaining pattern in their minds of course it's easier to catch others your friends or relatives when they complain and of course I recommend unless you have a prior agreement with your friends or relatives or family members to remind the other when the ego surfaces I don't recommend that you tell people you're complaining again laughter because then you come into conflict with their ego and you cannot fight another ego without being dragged into a useless conflict which probably will bring up your own ego complaining there's a story about the same master who had several disciples and one disciple came to him and said I've been studying with you for five years and I still not quite get it therefore I'm going to leave you and travel for a year, can you give me some spiritual practice for that year and the master said yes, I'll give you a spiritual practice okay thanks, here it is so in your travels wherever you go, whatever situation you find yourself in whatever you're doing or whoever you're with just repeat these words thanks for everything I have no complaint whatsoever and then you'll become enlightened oh that's cool, thank you so after a year he came back to the master and the master said well how did your spiritual practice go and the disciple said well I did what you said, thanks for everything, I have no complaint whatsoever I said it all the time and I'm still not enlightened why did you give me that practice and the master said thanks for everything I have no complaint whatsoever and at that moment the disciple became awakened ah so before he had repeated the words but there was not the underlying consciousness behind the words and when the master did not complain that the disciple didn't get it, that was fine too so alignment with the present moment is already the beginning of the end of ego non-alignment with the present moment strengthens the ego and that is why the ego most of the time tries to get away from the present moment so that is actually a very, if you really practice that little practice recommended by the Zen master, thanks for everything there are two aspects to this practice thanks for everything I have no complaint whatsoever thanks for everything of course refers to gratitude I have no complaint whatsoever is the absence of the mind arguing with what is and by arguing almost constantly with what is continuously strengthening an illusory sense of identity that needs superiority how do you become superior when you complain about something well, when you complain about a person you obviously feel superior in some way morally, whatever way to that person when you complain about a place you feel superior to that place because you are pronouncing judgment you are the judge even when you complain about an activity that you are doing you become the judge and this is bad so you can see how the illusion arises so we have on the one hand gratitude and on the other hand the absence of interference mental interference with reality where is reality?

in the present moment and again it does not mean you are condemned to non-activity it does not mean you are like remember the person whose bed has not been made in the hotel you can take action but it is a different kind of action and you become aligned with the is-ness of things and thereby the ego diminishes now most people only begin to do that when they realize that they have been unhappy for too long and at some point they realize that the greater part of their unhappiness and this is an enormous realization the greater part of their unhappiness arose not through the situations they encountered in their lives but through the mental narrative about the situations they encounter in their lives so it is not what it is in most in 95% of cases when unhappiness in whatever form arises in you unhappiness is a generic term it could be slightest irritation it is already a form of unhappiness I don't want to be here they shouldn't do that already arising of unhappiness then more unhappiness can come because you can have an entire sense of narrative in your mind an identity that sticks around the eye and this is my unhappy life my unhappy life and many people are trapped in a mental narrative that is the foundation for the illusory sense of identity and they call that my problematic and unhappy life oh how do I what can I do about this all these things that happened shouldn't have happened but did happen were not meant to happen but happened I never expected these things to go so badly wrong life has treated me so unfairly what these people did to me and what God did to me I've had enough of God there is no God how could it be all long stories how unhappy my life now millions of people carry they are unhappy they have an unhappy life because of the narrative in their minds even if you were in a more extreme situation now you might think well you're talking about westerners who are relatively well off even if you were let's say if you were a refugee now there's always these days there are many refugees moving from place to place and you would say is this person not justified in being unhappy no I was happy I was lucky enough to have experienced a period in my life when I had no place to live as a kind of refugee and already I had stepped out of unhappiness so I could verify in my own life that if I had been unhappy in the situation of sitting on a park bench with virtually no money in my pocket and not knowing what to live on the next day that would be regarded by many people as justification for unhappiness but it's not this is how certain limit situations in your life things that go badly wrong and then not just waiting in the supermarket and starting to get unhappy about how slow they are that's one form of unhappiness a minor form of unhappiness but that accumulates too over the years every other time you're in the supermarket you get irritated and unhappy it accumulates more in other places every traffic jam you get worked up mentally why are they they shouldn't be more dreadful than this so in extreme situations often it is in extreme situations and I know that quite a few of you have been there you have been there you have encountered either something happening to your body you encountered some great loss in your life either to do with relationships or work situation or home situation or finances or people close to you people dying you have been there you have experienced a collapse of certain structures in your life and the reason why you are here is that this collapse in the certain structures in your life has created an opening in the egoic shell because you suddenly became so unhappy that you woke up so the suffering that the ego generates is also potentially an opening into realization of first of all of who you ultimately are not many people have to lose a lot before they realize who they are so this can be a great blessing to lose your foothold either because the body becomes ill or you lose somebody close to you who dies or leaves you or people close to you suffer enormously or you lose your home or your work or all your money possessions or your reputation all these things are potentially are first of all things that are enormously painful for the ego that has built an identity around these things but potentially they are an opening into who you are beyond the ego but the good news is yes many of you or quite a few of you are here because you have already experienced that and some of you may even be in the middle of experiencing a very difficult life situation it is not unusual for people to experience a very difficult life situation it is not unusual at all so the ego might tell you that you have been singled out for this type of suffering but that's not the case there is suffering all around you and sooner or later in one form or another it will come to everybody so but the wonderful thing is it has worked to the extent to which it has created in you an opening so you are no longer completely trapped in the ego because something has broken off the egoic structure a big chunk of ego of this mental structure has broken off and that at first is painful, the breaking off of a big chunk of ego is painful but it allows an opening there are the lines I believe it was Leonard Cohen who wrote there is a crack in everything there is a crack in everything that's how the light gets in so when something cracks in your life it is potentially an opening into the deep I because what cracks is the surface I that had identified with this, that or the other but the wonderful thing is now you have reached a point where you no longer need to be hit over the head by life to crack your ego that's probably happened already and if you haven't suffered deeply maybe it happened in a past lifetime if you are 20, 25 years old and things have been fine in your life and yet you are here, there must be a deeper reason why you are here so the good news is it worked it has brought you here and I don't mean here, this particular occasion or with me it has brought you to a certain state of consciousness that is deeper than the usual state the deepening has started to happen now this deepening for many humans is first brought about by suffering but then a point comes when you can actually choose the deepening so you don't have to wait for things to go drastically wrong in your life before you awaken to the deeper which we could call the spiritual dimension of life before you deepen and for most of you that applies, you don't need to be hit over the head by life anymore and be inflicted with dreadful suffering I'm not saying challenges will not come to you, they come all the time we'll come to that in a minute but already what we are learning here and now we come to the more essential part because so far I've really been talking about the bad news which is the ego but it's important to understand the mechanism behind the ego if you don't understand how the ego works and the favorite ways of the ego to reinforce itself and strengthen itself, then if you don't understand it, then you cannot recognize it when it happens for example, if you didn't understand how the ego loves complaining you could be trapped in a complaining mindset for the next 30 years why am I not enlightened yet? I've been trying all that kind of stuff why is it not happening? these people seem to be enlightened, they're smiling I'm not why doesn't it happen?

why is it etc but now you recognize it now you can actually choose to be present rather than to be trapped in a mental thought form, that is ego now ego is ego consists predominantly of thought so when your identity is egoic you are deriving your sense of self from the movement of thought and not only that you are identified with certain thoughts which means you derive your sense of self from thoughts all the things that I've mentioned you believe in thoughts that arise in your mind and there is an identity in the arising thoughts, my car my suffering and everything that comes in it's not just a thought that's how it is my life is awful why is it this situation is awful I just can't stand it anymore why are these people that's how it is you look out in the morning you open the curtains the weather is quite good but in other places it rains a lot so if you live in London or in Vancouver or in Seattle often you open the curtains in the morning and then there's a difference between looking out and saying oh fuck not another not another grey miserable day what am I doing here stuck in this hole that's called suffering now there is another way of getting up and opening the curtains and looking out and you open the curtains and looking out and you see there's water dripping down from the sky and on the window pane and there's not a single thought in your head not even a thought oh the rain is good for the trees and the grass no just you look and you see there's an aliveness there but you don't have to tell yourself that there's just there's light filtering through the clouds of course there must be light light comes from the sun but you don't have to tell yourself that you just see it you open the curtains and you look and there's a moment of wonder and a moment almost of yes gratitude remember thanks for everything I have no complaint whatsoever the spiritual practice of course you don't even need to say that you can actually experience a situation without the baggage of a complaining or negative commentary the same situation that before made you unhappy because it became your entire life suddenly it's neutral and it's not only neutral it's actually alive this moment is alive the rain is aliveness but you don't have to tell yourself that you just see it and so this really I gave just one example of how something changes when you do not impose the baggage mental egoic baggage of a narrative on the situation and then you see the rain is completely neutral it's fine but you don't even have to tell yourself that it just is and you become aligned with the isness of things it doesn't mean that you cannot move to Hawaii or somewhere else where it's sunshine, you can but if you're unhappy there then you move to Hawaii where you will be elated for a few weeks or a few months and then you'll be lying on the beach and you suddenly realize I'm turning into a beach bum and mosquitoes are there at night that's not, shouldn't be happening that's not happening

and it's too hot

[Speaker 1] (6:47:31 - 6:48:56)
can't stand this heat anymore now this is some many of you will know him Jack Kornfield renowned writer of many spiritual books and spiritual teacher and meditation teacher that's a mountain and a lovely formless presence and that's where the books came out of Jack has been bringing the essence of Buddhism to the West for the past 40 years through his books and you were a Buddhist monk for a while in Thailand and then how many years were you a Buddhist monk?

[Speaker 8] (6:48:56 - 6:49:03)
I was there initially for about 5 years and then I've gone back at different periods

[Speaker 1] (6:49:05 - 6:50:23)
and if you haven't read any of his books many of you will have I'm just rereading Wise Heart and one book I haven't read yet but it has a wonderful title it's After the Ecstasy the Laundry and which of course is about incorporating presence or mindfulness as it's called in the Buddhist tradition incorporating it into everyday life rather than just experiencing it in a meditation setting or meditative environment where you can go and then you have to go back into daily life you have to bring it in there mindfulness is the term that of course is used in the Buddhist tradition I don't use the word because although I respect it because it kind of implies that your mind is full I don't know who first came up with it what is the original Pali or Sanskrit word that has been translated as mindfulness

[Speaker 8] (6:50:23 - 6:50:45)
the Pali word is Sati S-A-T-I and the very best Buddhist scholar that I know a man named Anilayo who lives in Hamburg Germany says that the closest translation to Sati that he would give in English is presence But it's too late now

because everybody

[Speaker 8] (6:50:47 - 6:51:19)
Mindfulness has become a kind of industry you know there's mindfulness in education and it's a good thing in mindfulness there's all this wonderful neuroscience another translation that I like a lot we talked about a moment ago is loving awareness which has both the quality of presence of awareness and also somehow weds or gives the sense that we can rest in love, that love and awareness actually are the same

[Speaker 1] (6:51:21 - 6:52:03)
Metta is another word, loving kindness is sometimes translated as the loving there are metta meditations where you send we send out loving kindness to your surroundings the the meditation that you teach mainly is called Vipassana which is to do with bringing awareness into the body is that right? maybe later on you can give us a little taste of it towards the end so can you say a bit more about Vipassana?

[Speaker 8] (6:52:04 - 6:53:25)
Vipassana is a Sanskrit word that means basically to see clearly and the primary practice of it is mindfulness or loving awareness and it's generally established although not always first in the body partly because there's this line from James Joyce where he wrote Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body, that characterization that somehow we're so lost in our thoughts that a first step in coming into presence is to recognize that there's this body and breath that are actually present here and now and that the body experience is a here and now experience and then from awareness or loving awareness of body and presence then it becomes possible to first notice the rivers of feelings and thoughts and so forth and then to actually become the space of awareness the knowing that to recognize that there's experience and there's also the knowing of experience so that's kind of there you have it you don't have to go to the Himalayas or you know travel all the way that's the essence of it save you airfare laughter I also talk about that as although the meditation is very structured and when I talk about inner body awareness it's the same thing in an unstructured way so for example as we speak now I could invite everybody here while we listen to actually have some awareness in the inner energy field of their body as you have it now I have it now you can have it now I call that sometimes an anchor for presence to have awareness in the inner energy field of the body and you can you have plenty of awareness left for sense perception sensory perception so a very quick way I would say you would probably agree of getting out of continuously being trapped in the movement of thought is to consciously decide to direct awareness into the body and then look around and you can then give some people the first taste of being able to have sensory perception without the continuous involuntary interference of conceptualization and judgment so you can look around you feel the energy field we can do it now and this is I'm doing now an unstructured body awareness meditation later on Jack is going to do with us a slightly more structured so right now just as you listen feel the energy throughout your body it's easy and then you don't have you don't have unnecessary stuff that you add mentally to this moment let's see Vipassana then has been around for a long time it is possible which is that that was actually one of the original meditations taught by the Buddha

it's believed so of course you get history and myth and so forth you never know but it's certainly been taught for thousands of years yes

[Speaker 1] (6:55:41 - 6:55:54)
yes and of course the breath awareness is also probably was also taught by the Buddha and breath awareness is part of Vipassana yes

[Speaker 8] (6:55:54 - 6:56:57)
and the point in doing it isn't to become a good breather particularly or to have particular special kind of breath it's just what you're saying Eckhart it's to use the ever changing life flow of the body of breath to just invite presence and to be if you're trying to control the breath you already start to struggle and suffer but if you realize oh it breathes itself and in fact the world starts to breathe itself more as you feel it it invites that quality of presence or loving awareness through the breathing and one of the beautiful things is that as people deepen in their ability to be quiet for the mind to quiet and the breath to open then there comes quite naturally a lightness and a joy very often that is just innate in us when we're not fixated in past and future yes

[Speaker 1] (6:56:57 - 6:57:38)
so breath is also thousands of years old as also breath being a term similar to I just talked a while ago about the sky heavens or emptiness breath is also something that is has no form as such and this is why traditionally it's a word that sometimes means spirit breath and why in the German language for example the word to breathe is Atman which is goes back to Sanskrit

[Speaker 8] (6:57:38 - 6:57:44)
Atman the spirit within or to inspire in English the same thing yes

[Speaker 1] (6:57:53 - 6:58:11)
this mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive to be free you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation

[Speaker 2] (6:58:47 - 6:58:49)
there are some patterns

[Speaker 1] (6:58:49 - 7:06:27)
in the mind that everybody inherits that even for advanced presence practitioners like yourselves can still reassert themselves because they are so normal by the way my definition of normal is insane as you probably know and you may be able to catch yourself many times during the day when this normal, one of these normal patterns reasserts itself and of course one of the most prevalent patterns is the is reducing the the present moment to a means to an end it could be a simple thing like you get up in the morning and you are getting ready to go to work what, how, what is the quality of your doing during that time of getting ready to go out or here you got up this morning getting ready to go to breakfast and then come here how do you experience that time are you able to be present in what you are doing or is the doing no more than a means to an end and that's a huge difference whether you you fold your pyjama and put it on your bed is that do you give it attention is it a pleasant thing to do do you acknowledge the being of this pyjama and feel the texture and give it some loving attention and then you put it away or is it what's the next thing and the next and the next because I need to get I need to if you are not you may, if you don't this habit is always there the present moment is a stepping stone that and not much more than a stepping stone to the next moment which is always a mental projection because it never comes, the next moment never comes does it no I don't think it does because when the next moment comes it's the present moment so the next moment doesn't come, it can never arrive there's only this moment but if your habit is to treat this moment most of the time as a means of getting to the next moment so not being fully in it but mentally being somewhere else and then just need, so the basic attitude is I just need to get this moment out of the way then I will get to a better one and that is a very deep seated pattern that prevents you from being present but it's only when I voice it like this that it becomes apparent to you because otherwise you won't even see it because it's so normal to live in such a way that unconsciously it's not, you don't you don't tell yourself in your mind that I just need to get this moment out of the way because the next one will be better that is an unspoken and unconscious assumption behind what you do and it's not only, people also treat entire life periods in that way then it's not only of course most fundamentally the present moment but they also treat entire chunks of their life in that way for example you're waiting for the weekend so it's only two more days of having to go to work and then there comes or you're waiting for something else getting a better job finding the person who is going to make me happy in the meantime I'm just ticking over I'm just waiting for well what's the expression I'm waiting for the big break or whatever I'm waiting for the big thing to happen and finally I can start living when that happens whatever form that takes when that happens then my life will really start and that's another way another manifestation of the same dysfunction I don't know if you remember reading about Socrates Greek philosopher who never wrote anything he just talked and Plato who was one of his disciples wrote about what Socrates said, we never know how much of this is Plato and how much of it is Socrates but one certain things are definitely Socrates and one of his most famous sayings of course is well when he was asked why

[Speaker 2] (7:06:29 - 7:06:44)
does the Oracle of Delphi call you the wisest of all men he he said the reason why I'm the wisest of all men is

[Speaker 1] (7:06:44 - 7:06:59)
that I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing not many people actually have understood over the

[Speaker 2] (7:06:59 - 7:07:05)
centuries what I see as the deeper meaning of those words

[Speaker 1] (7:07:09 - 7:07:14)
mostly it's interpreted as pretending not to know feigning modesty

[Speaker 2] (7:07:16 - 7:07:24)
which is a disguised form of ego it's like saying

[Speaker 5] (7:07:30 - 7:07:33)
I'm the most egoless person of all

[Speaker 1] (7:07:46 - 7:09:27)
I'm the most egoless person of all nobody is more egoless than me that's for sure I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing so it's not I suggest it's not feigned modesty there's a deeper meaning and the deeper meaning is that all his extremely creative teachings they all you might know that the teachings all are he used to teach in the form of dialogues with people so they would ask him questions and he would ask them questions and finally the teaching emerged out of the dialogue and often he showed that the original premise that somebody started with is erroneous but it gradually emerges so I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing means as I see it that he started every talk in stillness he did not begin his teachings with accumulated knowledge in his mind which he then regurgitated he was able to be so creative in his thinking very creative thinking in fact many people say that

that we learned western civilization at least learned how to think through the ancient greek philosophers and especially Socrates he taught us how to think so he was thinking able to think creatively use of his mind he had access to the creativity within him and the only way you can do that is by not starting from knowledge but starting from ignorance now the ignorance the way I use the term is not the conventional meaning of ignorance it's to step out of the thinking mind into just aware stillness and in that moment you don't know anything that's how I start

every talk it always starts with

[Speaker 1] (7:10:45 - 7:13:22)
thoughtless awareness in other words I have no idea what I'm going to say that's another way of putting it thoughtless awareness sounds better but the truth is I have no idea what I'm going to say before I start occasionally earlier I came in with a newspaper of course I had some idea then I was going to show you the newspaper and the article so it does happen occasionally and that is not only when you are about to give talks that is the most vital state for you to become familiar and comfortable with that state of not knowing which is there the moment you step out of the thinking mind with its continuous interpretations and judgments then you are in a state of not knowing when you look at a sky or a tree or at another person and there's just a background of awareness to your sense perception at that moment you don't know anything not conceptually you know nothing because without thought you don't know anything there's no knowledge and that is something that could hold you back because the ego is afraid of that state it feels I become as nothing I become stupid I no longer I'm at the mercy of other people if I can't judge them anymore and all kinds of things that are obstacles that can arise unconsciously and they very quickly take you out again of that state of aware spacious presence so it's good to look out for that there is something in you that's not comfortable with it is even afraid of it feels diminished by it and that's the ego the ego feels diminished of course by not knowing the ego has to say I know even to utter the words I don't know the ego it feels like a diminishment to the ego

hello friends welcome welcome to this special live meditation with Eckhart Tolle the world needs you as a teacher of presence and from my perspective that's a very true statement a teacher of presence someone who is grounded in being and knows that their most important purpose in any given moment in any interaction is the state of their being the state of their attention the state of our here-ness our now-ness our total presence becoming teachers of presence at a time when the world is experiencing such a feeling and a sense of accelerated turbulence my language for it sounds true and Eckhart teachings are working together and we've created a new school of awakening five month program it's called becoming a teacher of presence and it begins on May 21st and many of the themes that Eckhart touches on and will touch on in this live global meditation about how the world needs you to become a teacher of presence are what we're exploring in this five month online deep dive immersion program it begins with a virtual retreat that will be broadcast from Lake Louise and then it's followed by a five month robust community journey that we have the opportunity to take together and if you're interested in learning more if you're on the player page you'll see a learn more button and if you're on YouTube you can look for the notes in the description you can click to learn more about becoming a teacher of presence the final registration date is May 16th now as we move into this global live meditation together here with Eckhart this is an invitation for us to deepen presence as a practicing community it's an invitation to how we listen how we receive right now and that also includes how we might potentially relate or not relate to the comments function that is available both on the player page and on YouTube you may choose to not engage in the comments at all if you feel and sense that it increases your ability to be part of our practicing deepening presence community perhaps by not engaging in the comments at all or if you do deepening presence and as you comment or read comments do it with a full sense grounded in being and with that here's Eckhart Tolle on the world needs you as a teacher of presence

[Speaker 1] (7:17:28 - 7:17:33)
thank you Tammy welcome to our live

[Speaker 2] (7:17:36 - 7:18:05)
meditation session I will probably be talking for most of the time but there may be

[Speaker 1] (7:18:09 - 7:18:14)
quite a few gaps of stillness in between the words

[Speaker 2] (7:18:16 - 7:18:24)
as they are now and these gaps are very important

[Speaker 1] (7:18:25 - 7:18:44)
I would even say more important than the words if you become conscious of these gaps of stillness

[Speaker 2] (7:18:46 - 7:18:52)
in between words you notice the gaps

[Speaker 1] (7:18:54 - 7:19:24)
instead of just impatiently being in your conceptual mind and saying why is he talking so slowly why hasn't he said anything significant yet if you are able to notice the gaps give them attention that is the arising of that state of consciousness

that we call presence it is a state of alertness relaxed alertness clarity a state in which the conceptual mind

[Speaker 1] (7:20:02 - 7:20:24)
has come to rest and something else arises thinking is most people's normal state of when they are awake in conventional terms and when you become aware of these gaps

[Speaker 2] (7:20:26 - 7:20:40)
thinking subsides and presence or we call it awareness arises thinking subsides

[Speaker 1] (7:20:42 - 7:20:53)
presence arises of course thinking will come back but it has briefly or materially subsided something else has emerged

[Speaker 2] (7:20:56 - 7:21:03)
and that is what we call presence it is

[Speaker 1] (7:21:03 - 7:21:09)
a state of one could say pure

[Speaker 2] (7:21:09 - 7:21:23)
awareness or pure consciousness so that is what sometimes people

[Speaker 1] (7:21:23 - 7:21:52)
hope to achieve when they actually do formal meditations meditation is a good tool but it is not enough it is not even for everybody the most important thing is to bring that state of clear

[Speaker 2] (7:21:53 - 7:22:08)
alert presence into everyday life then the way in which you interact

[Speaker 1] (7:22:10 - 7:22:33)
with other people the way in which you perceive the world respond to situations is very different from the way in which you would habitually react to situations if you were completely identified with the conceptual mind

[Speaker 2] (7:22:33 - 7:22:39)
that's the egoic state

[Speaker 1] (7:22:39 - 7:22:56)
complete identification with the conditioned mind, conditioned by the past that's the ego identification with that it's vital for us to go beyond that state of consciousness, that egoic state of consciousness

[Speaker 2] (7:22:59 - 7:23:10)
because it creates a lot of suffering in the world a lot of trouble you create suffering for yourself

[Speaker 1] (7:23:10 - 7:23:14)
you create suffering for others it operates on an individual

[Speaker 2] (7:23:14 - 7:23:21)
level, it operates on a collective level it is a

[Speaker 1] (7:23:21 - 7:24:08)
to a large extent dysfunctional state of consciousness it had its purpose, we had to go through it but now we need to emerge out of it to the next stage in human evolution if we get, this is a very critical transition from the egoic state of consciousness to a more enlightened state, an awake awakened state almost all the problems that we are facing both on an individual and collective level

arise from the human mind the greatest danger

[Speaker 1] (7:24:18 - 7:24:28)
humanity is facing does not come from without, it comes from within the human mind and the havoc

[Speaker 2] (7:24:28 - 7:25:02)
that the egoic state creates in the world so the danger comes from within so this is presence in that state of presence

[Speaker 1] (7:25:06 - 7:25:53)
who you are or who you perceive yourself to be shifts from deriving your sense of self your sense of identity from a narrative in your mind which you call my life that's the normally egoic state you derive your identity from the movement of thought in your mind it tells you the story of me, you call it my life that is the deriving your identity from the stream of thinking ultimately me, what's going to happen to me

and then there's all the past that has created that me the past that has created me but it's

[Speaker 1] (7:26:04 - 7:26:57)
in ancient spiritual teachings such as Buddhism that's called a fiction, you live it's a mentally created fiction that becomes your personality, your person your sense of self there are certain characteristics that are dysfunctional for example it needs conflict, it loves conflict it says I seek peace but it acts out conflict it loves enemies because it defines itself through the other it demonizes the other it criticizes the other judges the other makes the other as possible in order to strengthen its own fictitious sense of identity that is the ego that is what we need to go beyond

[Speaker 2] (7:27:01 - 7:27:29)
entire nations can do it to other nations too so there's the your identity then is no longer derived from this narrative this ultimate mental fiction your identity comes from a deeper place a place of beingness or presence and at first it seems

perhaps a little disconcerting because when you're not involved in conceptual thinking, who are you? when you don't remember your past or not at least don't derive your identity from your past, who am I without that?

[Speaker 2] (7:27:50 - 7:28:38)
in this space of stillness of alert presence, alert relaxed presence who am I? you are that sense of beingness or presence that has no form it is just the light of consciousness itself so what's left of you is a sense of a sense of aliveness of beingness of presence stillness, but alive stillness and that is your deeper identity

[Speaker 1] (7:28:38 - 7:30:10)
I call it your essence identity so connecting with that essence identity is the vital step of transcending the egoic identity and then you can feel that this presence is not just an absence of thought or an absence of sounds the stillness is not just an absence it is a very powerful sense of presence there's an enormous power in that stillness in every human it's already there potentially underneath the stream of thinking so to speak like a vastness of the ocean underneath the turbulent surface of the ocean there's the vastness of the ocean underneath the turbulent waves on the surface which is the stream of thinking they're not separate the consciousness that you are is also your thoughts your thoughts are not separate, they are a manifestation of form that this consciousness takes but it's only a surface phenomenon the consciousness itself is far deeper than any thoughts in your mind or even any emotions

there's a depth to who you are that is unfathomable it's and when I say you that connects you with something much vaster than what you normally call you I don't want to give it any name right now but it connects you to

a vastness that you are an expression of but if you don't know that then you

[Speaker 2] (7:30:49 - 7:30:55)
realize you live like a fragment disconnected from other fragments in this world

[Speaker 1] (7:31:01 - 7:31:09)
and then as you get little taste of that state of consciousness

[Speaker 2] (7:31:09 - 7:31:20)
that we call presence for example now you feel yourself you feel your presence right now beyond any

[Speaker 1] (7:31:23 - 7:34:27)
beyond any thought that's connected with your life situation or whatever it may be whether what age you are becomes irrelevant what gender you are becomes irrelevant what you have achieved or suffered in this world it transcends all that it is more powerful than any of that it liberates you from all that it's not that the person disappears completely of course the person the personal self is still there it continues to operate in this world but there is a continuous knowing that there is more to you than that and that is vital so you continue to operate as a person in this world but no longer deriving your identity from the personal sense of self you can operate as a person you need to in this world in this world of time past and future you can operate in this world without losing yourself in this world and without losing yourself in identity that ultimately is a very shallow and fleeting thing that you call me the person so that thing continues to operate for a while but your challenge is while you operate in this world as a person not to lose connectedness with a deeper dimension and that is bringing presence into every situation that you deal with every interaction in this world and that is a skill that skill develops and it is quiet presence itself is timeless but it is a skill for you to it requires some practice a high degree of alertness to bring presence into everyday life whatever you do here whatever function you have in this world function and for example not to confuse your function with your identity it is a function I am a teacher of presence you are a teacher of presence or you are becoming a teacher of presence by living in that way by bringing that consciousness into every situation so that you don't lose yourself in the doing whatever it is you are doing in the situation and you don't lose yourself sense of identity that is to do with your function

[Speaker 2] (7:34:28 - 7:34:38)
and to reduce other people to their function in this world so when you when you

[Speaker 1] (7:34:39 - 7:38:41)
talk to somebody whatever purpose the interaction has let's say it is a very simple thing it is it is you are in a restaurant and you order a meal and or you are the server in the restaurant and you are talking to the customer is all there is to this interaction the customer talking to the server or is there a deeper is there some presence there that causes the interaction to be deeper and more meaningful than just a customer talking to a server that reduces you reduce yourself and you reduce the others to some temporary function and so you lose your sense of the humanity in the deeper sense of the other because you have reduced the other to a mental concept and you are relating to the mental concept this is the waiter, the waiter is the server and you by doing it to another you do it to yourself also you reduce yourself to that particular in that particular situation you are the client, the customer, could be any situation so what's the difference then when you bring presence into that moment in that moment you may still be talking, there is a menu you are looking at the menu I would like a minestrone soup and you are looking at the server and yes all that functions in a normal way but while you order this meal, I'm giving just one example out of hundreds of thousands, while you order the meal you can sense what I've been pointing at in our session today you can sense within yourself this presence underneath the thinking there is a space of stillness behind the thinking and you are aware of it and that's you, that's your presence and you speak the words and then you listen to or you look at the other person and you can sense the same dimension of consciousness in the other the other also is essentially that presence, the other also is essentially that consciousness that is the essence of who or what you are so you sense the consciousness of the other through sensing the consciousness within yourself beyond the personal selfhood and that brings an added vital dimension into the interaction and it's not something that perhaps is immediately noticed by the other the waiter may not notice that you can sense his or her being however

server in this particular example it's possible that he or she may be so absorbed in their mind that it just does not penetrate but it's also possible that the response the person that you are connecting with at this deeper level not through words just sensing his or her presence or some other pronoun, you have to be careful with pronouns these days so it doesn't matter which one you sense their presence and it may well be that you get a response so the person may suddenly feel so good about you, doesn't know why because everybody deep down they love being recognized in their beingness beyond their personality, there is an unconscious longing in humans to connect with a deeper level that is beyond the person, the personality there is an unconscious longing in every human being to become free of being trapped in their personality the person, they want to be free, they don't know that but they feel I can't stand it anymore, so they go to drugs or some other things just to have a moment of freedom for themselves so to speak, but it doesn't last and not only that, they fall below the normal state of consciousness instead of rising above the normal state of consciousness you don't want to free yourself from from yourself by moving towards sleep or unconsciousness that's happened with many drugs, or why they make you feel better feel so relaxed so good you can't think about your problems anymore so how wonderful and then of course you come back and you haven't risen above thought, you haven't risen above the ego you have fallen below the ego, yes it's been a moment of freedom but it didn't last and it is not our purpose to go that way our purpose is to rise above to rise above to transcend the egoic self so that your identity increasingly is derived from that beautiful sense of presence of beingness and not the story of you and so you become a teacher of presence by in a wider sense by bringing this state of consciousness into every interaction teaching itself can be interpreted in different ways usually when things of teaching is imparting information a teacher teaches gives information facts, or teaching can be teaching somebody how to acquire a skill how to do this, how to do that teaching presence could involve words in certain situations, it can be very helpful to say something to a person if the situation is right maybe I'll come back to that a little later, to say something but more than words a teacher of presence lives endeavours to bring presence into every situation in life this obviously applies to people who have helping professions people in helping professions psychotherapists doctors, nurses teachers, social workers body workers people in close contact with other humans in helping professions some of them already in some way without knowing it bringing presence into what they do but others are just stressed and can't it becomes it's so hard many teachers are stressed

doctors are stressed, nurses are stressed

[Speaker 1] (7:43:42 - 7:43:45)
social workers are stressed not everybody

[Speaker 2] (7:43:47 - 7:43:48)
I was

[Speaker 1] (7:43:48 - 7:48:29)
for the first time in my life I was a patient in a hospital last year and so I experienced the nurses primarily more contact obviously with nurses than with doctors and some nurses seem quite stressed they're doing their job but it's tough and I've seen a couple of others were actually bringing presence and they probably don't they've never heard of the word presence something has arisen in them naturally and spontaneously when they relate to people you're not just to them particularly two I found that I had contact with you're more to them than a patient again, they don't reduce you to a conceptual identity called patient and you can sense that they give they relate to you as a being, a human being and so that without perhaps knowing it without having a word for it spontaneously in the course of their work some presence has already arisen and that's beautiful and this may be the case with many of you also that already in your whatever work you do there's already that dimension coming in perhaps not all the time but already you're able to bring that dimension in or perhaps a better way of putting it is to say you're allowing that dimension to come in because when I say you are able to bring that dimension in that seems to imply you need to do something and that's not quite it it's not that you need to do something to the other it's allowing the presence to flow through you it's not a doing as such you have to be careful that in any situation the ego can come back in so for example when we say I become a teacher of presence you become whenever you use words referring to yourself through words it's dangerous because when you say I'm a teacher of presence and not realizing that it's only a function but it's not an identity it's a function and it could easily happen that you create another conceptual identity of I am a teacher of presence, you have another conceptual identity and then you compare yourself to others which is what the ego itself does and then you say I will show you the path let's just listen to me ego comes in very easily through the back door so being a teacher of presence is a function, it's not an identity your identity is presence itself your identity is consciousness itself and so as I said some people especially in helping professions are already bringing some presence into what they do without having a word for it and if they do it more consciously this can deepen but it doesn't have to be just the helping professions because anybody who has contact with other human beings in their work, you may be a hairdresser, you may be a flight attendant, you may be a lawyer the incredible opportunities because you are relating to others of course it's important there to differentiate between the function that you have on the level of your conceptual interaction and the deeper transcendent consciousness that can flow into that some people have very difficult jobs with other people

for example lawyers for example lawyers tend to come into contact with their so called clients with other human beings when they are at their most unconscious because lawyers tend to come into contact with people involved in some kind of conflict

[Speaker 1] (7:48:41 - 7:48:58)

[Speaker 2] (7:48:58 - 7:48:59)
with others

[Speaker 1] (7:48:59 - 7:52:09)
and often divorce lawyers for example so if you are a divorce lawyer you are more likely to encounter people at their most unconscious they may be in other situations they may be significantly more conscious than in the situation if you encounter them if you are a lawyer so this is an even greater challenge for you to stay conscious there because you typically you will encounter other humans at their most unconscious and so a lawyer for example needs to be really intensely present it's a huge challenge but also a wonderful challenge if you can live up to that challenge and bring presence into interactions but even in professions like a realtor maybe not quite as bad as a lawyer but when people are involved in signing contracts they become reactive they become aggressive and the ego comes in so again being a realtor is also maybe not quite as challenging as being a lawyer but can be challenging too all kinds of jobs flight attendants these days, very challenging job, it used to be relatively easy but now humans have become so toxic in many so unconscious to various challenges they encounter collective challenges and others so that can be very very very challenging job too and again here wonderful opportunity for bringing presence and again I have encountered some flight attendants my frequent travels who are able to bring that presence, who give you attention beyond reducing yourself to a passenger which is a conceptual identity they don't reduce yourself they relate to you as a human being and some do it and others don't quite manage it and so this is a skill that is vital, the challenges that you encounter in relating to other human beings is exactly what is needed for you to strengthen the arising presence if you were not challenged you could meditate every day and it's fine, you feel quite good and you think okay I'm present but the moment a real challenge comes the presence, you're not deeply enough connected with that dimension and you lose it again and the difficulties that you encounter

[Speaker 2] (7:52:09 - 7:52:17)
you challenge with other human beings are perhaps the most important

[Speaker 1] (7:52:19 - 7:52:53)
ingredient in the arising of presence, you need the challenges and you may have noticed that many of your challenges of course some are physical challenges or financial challenges, all kinds of living situation challenges but many of your challenges or I could say your suffering comes from other human beings

[Speaker 10] (7:52:53 - 7:52:55)
because

[Speaker 1] (7:52:57 - 7:52:59)
humans can be so difficult

[Speaker 2] (7:53:03 - 7:53:05)
and but that

that for most, there may be a few humans here and there whose spiritual path is to be a hermit to withdraw from life to live out in nature there may be, there are a few whose destiny is to be not very much in contact with other humans but most of us our spiritual path is through relationships with others we evolve

[Speaker 1] (7:53:43 - 7:53:54)
through, we no longer demand that other humans should be more conscious, we realize that what matters is

[Speaker 2] (7:53:56 - 7:54:01)
what matters is your state of consciousness, not the other person's state of consciousness

so it's a this is very vital to be able to hold presence in challenging situations and life is full of them fortunately because you need them holding challenges holding presence in challenging situations so whenever a challenge happens small or big always realize in any situation the most important thing is not what's happening the most important thing in any situation is the state of consciousness with which you meet what's happening this is easy to forget people always think the situation that I'm dealing with right now is the most important thing this is really important it's it's importance is secondary the really important thing is with what state of consciousness are you facing that situation what state of consciousness do you bring to this situation and so if you can reorient so to speak yourself and remind yourself continuously the moment a challenge happens be aware of your state of consciousness that is primary the situation is always secondary and the state of consciousness needs to be one of non reactivity reactivity comes from the egoic self that says you shouldn't behave like that, this shouldn't be happening, this is wrong that mustn't be, I don't want to be here I want to be somewhere else it's always opposition to what is reactive and in presence you respond to situations if a response is called for but you don't react, react comes from the conditioning of your mind so you react in the old predictable way and then you recreate situations through your reactions because in the way in which you react to a situation that then determines to a large extent how this situation develops, does it get worse or does it get better so many people amplify conflict a challenge comes into their life some small conflict they unconsciously react and the reaction amplifies the conflict and then gets bigger and the other person perhaps caused the conflict gets even more unconscious and they become even more reactive and this is part of the old egoic consciousness where very often it's not the situation that's so bad, your reaction makes the situation so bad

and it blows it up and that's karma one could say, it's a karmic reaction

[Speaker 1] (7:57:33 - 7:58:23)
karma by the way means action and karma is a law of action and reaction so any unconscious human being you meet a person who is angry at you for some reason are you angry immediately in turn do you react with anger too, which is a normal thing for humans, one person is angry accuses you of something and you immediately instead in any situation my state of consciousness right now is what matters are you able to just observe and be present bring that relaxed clarity to the situation instead of amplifying it and that determines what happens in the future so

[Speaker 2] (7:58:27 - 7:58:33)

[Speaker 1] (7:58:34 - 8:02:09)
it also collectively it applies also when we have a collective problem how do we deal with the collective problem through presence or through reactivity and if we deal through by the way when you deal with something through presence it means there is wisdom this is another important word wisdom arises out of presence wisdom is different from intelligence, intelligence is the ability to use the conceptual mind that has its purpose, it's fine but there is something deeper and more important potentially in every human being and that's not intelligence, it's wisdom wisdom is this faculty that arises out of presence and then you can deal with situations truly intelligently rather than reactively and you do not make the situation worse by your reaction to the situation so you need wisdom what the world needs is not more intelligence very soon AI is probably becoming more intelligent than humans and the human challenge is to access the dimension where wisdom arises that's computers don't have that they can be very good at thinking probably they are making incredible advances but not wisdom so we need to as we are being almost replaced by artificial thinkers this coincides with the transition of human beings to a higher state of consciousness than thinking of course they can still think but they are not trapped in thinking and so it's terribly important and again coming back for a moment to that situation collective situation there is a collective challenge we have the pandemic situation as a huge collective challenge was there wisdom in the way in which we reacted to that challenge not very much there was a lot of fear there was a lot of panic there was a lot of anger and many measures were taken not necessarily seeing all the possible repercussions of measures that were taken that would play themselves out in the next few years we don't need to go into details but the question is always do you create more suffering by your reaction to a situation than is contained in the situation itself that's lack of wisdom does that and lack of wisdom means lack of

presence or awareness whatever word you want to use so using

[Speaker 1] (8:02:20 - 8:02:35)
life situations all the life situations that arise in your life become your spiritual practice when you realize it's not the situation that's the most important thing it's my state of consciousness

[Speaker 2] (8:02:35 - 8:02:44)
that's the most important thing give your attention to that at this moment

[Speaker 1] (8:02:45 - 8:02:49)
it may be relatively easy to be present

[Speaker 2] (8:02:51 - 8:02:57)
or not maybe you're challenged

[Speaker 1] (8:02:58 - 8:04:05)
maybe not by some external situation but maybe you're challenged by your mind if you're not challenged by some external situation like you're in bed it's 2.30 in the morning and you wake up or you couldn't go to sleep and dreadful things are happening in your mind oh my god you're not challenged by an external situation because it's a warm bed and you're fine in the now but you're challenged by your mind so many times the challenge may not come from external situation but from your mind and ultimately everything comes from your mind in a deeper sense because every event becomes a mental thing you experience it as a mental event anything in the external world is recreated

[Speaker 2] (8:04:05 - 8:04:40)
in your mind it becomes a mental event so everything is ultimately your mind so when you encounter a difficult situation

[Speaker 1] (8:04:41 - 8:04:48)
and you don't react in the usual old way but you stay present and you look

[Speaker 2] (8:04:48 - 8:05:04)

see the situation and this presence arising it's a difficult person and you don't react

[Speaker 1] (8:05:04 - 8:10:49)
in the old predictable way your lack of reaction is a teaching also I've sometimes found when people were difficult no matter various situations difficult people, angry people accusing or just being in a bad mood and when you don't react they get very disconcerted because they want, they almost need the reaction, the ego itself or their pain body needs the reaction and if you don't react then they become a little confused and then the whole thing collapses even a little thing in traffic for some reason, traffic makes people very unconscious too when they are driving and they get angry at other cars other drivers they don't know them they get angry it's very strange so they personalize all that and occasionally I found people got angry at me, I'm sometimes maybe a bit slow driving and then they shout something and then I look at them they expect please shout something back, almost unconsciously they expect I could see this it was pointless to react what is the point in shouting something back there's no point whatsoever so I just looked and then some thought I was deaf and they shouted louder and but the situation very quickly collapses if it's not being fed, it's not being reinforced many conflict situations if you deal with it only factually take the ego out of it, which is the reactivity presence then arises and presence arises, you can deal with the situation factually, what can we do here, this, that or maybe nothing then very quickly a situation that potentially could have become enormous conflict written and gone on and on begins to dissolve so as a teacher of presence in a wider sense a lot of the time your teaching is dissolving conflict, not avoiding conflict or anything, it's nothing to do with that, but dissolving conflict through non-reactivity and not bringing a self into it and you stop complaining about other people for example, when they don't do what they're supposed to do which happens a lot or they do something that they're not supposed to do, which happens a lot too and so you don't bring so an important thing that a teacher of presence does is they dissolve conflict they don't feed it and if you don't feed it it very quickly collapses now if conflict collapses it's not food for your ego so your ego does not want conflict to collapse, it might say that it wants peace, but it acts differently the words say I want peace no, the ego doesn't want peace it wants more conflict so when you when you are present you are able to dissolve conflict and that simultaneously it is a dissolution of your ego too because the ego wants the conflict, but you don't you the essential you the you that is transcendent to the ego does not want conflict, it loves peace it loves the state of love so so the teacher of presence teaches not very often, a lot of the time not through words not even necessarily through doing but through bringing a certain state of consciousness to the situation and it dissolves conflict, imagine if that happens on a world scale if there were world leaders conscious enough present enough to dissolve conflict instead of amplifying conflict, because what happens on an individual level also happens collectively the amplification of conflict that's how for example I mean if you know the history of century century first world war it started with one little thing, well tragic for the person, but an assassination, the assassination of the Archduke Ferdinand whoever his name was somewhere in the Balkans and then people, various nations the leaders of nations reacted and it became bigger and bigger just one event reaction, and the others reacted against their reaction, before

they know it

you have the most unbelievable devastating conflict that ever happened on the planet until then like 30 million dead or something, just unbelievable it all happened from one little thing unconscious people amplifying conflict at every stage and this could happen again to some extent it is happening again in the world because not many leaders are present or conscious very few let me see trying to think of a conscious leader it's not coming to me right now but it must be someone so all these things are vitally vitally important and even just this one little thing of not not contributing to conflict but dissolving conflict would change the world it changes your life and if people who have a certain amount of power are able to practice that then it's the end of useless

warfare and terrible suffering that humans create for other humans

[Speaker 1] (8:12:19 - 8:12:44)
and for themselves so that's the path, our path is the path of awakening to presence so important it's never been more important than it is now consider the world situation but the true change starts with you and then it spreads

from you to others

[Speaker 5] (8:15:39 - 8:15:40)
thank you

[Speaker 2] (8:15:49 - 8:15:53)
there's a line in Shakespeare I don't remember which play

it says nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so there's a very important lesson here an essential part of spiritual awakening or we could call it the awakening of consciousness is to learn to become aware of the difference between the situation that you find yourself in and what your mind says about the situation that you find yourself in particularly challenging situations many of you at this time are perhaps confined to a small space perhaps a small apartment not allowed to go out except to buy groceries or other essentials perhaps you have to share that space with several people or there's nobody else and you're feeling lonely or you may be experiencing that money is becoming scarce because you've been laid off no more income or you're feeling sick and there's a fever this cough now all these things that many of you are experiencing now would conventionally normally be called bad and yes I suppose on a conventional level they are not pleasant particularly if you're sick so what does it mean, what does Shakespeare mean when he says nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so so your very essential spiritual lesson is to be able to differentiate between a situation that you are experiencing and your mental commentary about the situation that you're experiencing the thoughts that you have concerning the situation that you're experiencing now for most people anybody who's not sufficiently aware for most people whatever they experience and the mental commentary that they have about their experience are a single phenomenon they cannot separate them so let's say you are cooped up in a small space have been there for already a week or two weeks and you're thinking about how much longer and you can't stand it anymore, this is just too awful and the self talk continues and it's telling you how awful and unacceptable this situation is and you might this self talk may generate self pity may generate anger it may generate depression it will certainly will generate fear because a lot of the self talk is about how bad it is, it's not just how bad it is now but how bad it's going to be, it's going to be worse that's what the mind is often saying and then when the mind saying that it's going to get worse then basically for you it is already worse and it gets worse and worse so since many of you have spare time these days I suggest experimenting a little bit and becoming aware of the difference between the situation you find yourself in and the mental commentary about the situation so when you feel unhappy basically suffering where you are and you're saying I can't take much more of this whatever the mind is saying or the mind is saying it's going to get worse I can't take another three weeks of this, how could I what am I going to live on and so on so the commentary concerns certain things that are happening now, it may concern certain things in the so called future so you become aware of the self talk basically most humans talk to themselves a lot or you may also be talking to others if you share a space with other people then the self talk becomes the dialogue that you have with others and as an experiment I would suggest that you ask yourself how would I experience this situation if I did not add any unnecessary thought to it how would I experience this moment, the situation that I'm finding myself in without the addition of an interpretation of the mind I sometimes call that in most cases this addition this interpretation, in many many cases it's negative there's usually not that much that the mind can comment on a very pleasant experience, it just experiences it but the mind can loves it when it there's a difficult situation then the mind can really get going and has a long story about it how would I experience this moment without the addition of unnecessary thought, that's a strange question I sometimes say that this addition of thought is excess baggage in your life and many humans don't realize that they are making themselves unhappy for years and years and sometimes a whole lifetime because they never learn to differentiate between situations they find themselves in and that which the mind adds to the situation, so they experience the situation through the narrative of the mind they cannot say here's a situation and here's a narrative, but this is what I'm asking you to experiment with now, because you have plenty of time, or many of you have how would I experience this moment if I refrained from interpreting it, calling it either good or bad okay now this question doesn't have an answer on a conceptual level, this question directs your attention into the present moment the aliveness of the present moment, and if you don't add any thought to it, with just an experiment, you can if the experiment fails, if you don't like it then you can continue with adding, continuously adding narratives to the situation and continue to experience the situation through the veil of the narrative that comments how awful it all is that your life is falling apart, the world is falling apart it's all so dreadful that's the narrative so how would I experience this moment if I did not add, okay let's do it, or let's refrain it's not a doing, it's a refrain from doing something that is normally an unconscious mind process okay, what am I left with?

here I am, I'm sitting here looking around, breathing whatever is here in this room look out of the window, see a bit of sky, tree see light coming through the window furniture in the room, whatever else is happening here, sensory perceptions and you're breathing and you're alive presumably, although you may not actually experience being alive but you can experience it by feeling the inner energy field of the body which is alive, it's all part of the experience of this moment and there you are sitting there and you have dropped the narrative and all you are left with is the bare isness, beingness or isness of this moment that's interesting and you may suddenly feel a kind of weight lifting of your shoulders the weight that you habitually probably carry which is the weight of this is why I call it excess baggage it is a weight of unconscious thinking reactive thinking the mind creating unhappy narratives and then what you then experience is the body is reflecting back to you the unhappy narrative in the form of an unhappy emotion that's called normal living that's what when you watch a movie or everybody is doing it that's just normal, not very few people question it but there is another way and that's the way of awareness or presence so this is the perhaps one of the most or the most fundamental spiritual practice is to be able to separate the narrative from the situation and if possible as much as possible let go of the narrative and just be present with this moment as it is and of course the amazing fact is this moment is all there ever is your entire life unfolds in and as this moment, in other words it's always now it's never not now your entire life is now whatever happened in the past happened in the now and when you remember it you remember it now whatever will happen in the future will not happen in the future it will happen in the now because when the future comes it's no longer a future it's the now and when you think about the future it's a thought in the present moment in the now so life and now your life and the now are inseparable and there's an enormous power hiding in the now which means hiding in you and a deep sense of aliveness and beingness that goes far beyond what we conventionally call happiness it's not happiness, it's deeper but you need to be challenged by life to find it and this is what's happening for millions collectively now on a personal level everybody gets challenged periodically also but now collectively we're being challenged we need to wake up wake up out of unconscious thinking out of complete identification with the thinking mind which is conditioned by the past and we need to realize that there is in us there is in you another dimension of consciousness that has always been there but habitually one could say overlooked and that is the dimension of awareness which is consciousness without thought and you probably have experienced it on many occasions briefly for example when engaged in an activity that requires you to be absolutely present climbing up a mountain or sometimes perhaps engaged in some kind of sport activity requires you to be absolutely present and then there's an awareness there but there's no conceptual thinking, there's no time for thinking and the strange thing is this awareness is a deeper identity the awareness that you are frees you ultimately from yourself, the self the limited self the conditioned self the mind made sense of self that for most people that's all they know but there's more to you and there's a deeper identity in you and that identity is awareness itself, that is consciousness itself, it's the unconditioned consciousness itself and it's not difficult to experience that, to realize that but humans don't they need the challenge to be driven there and this is why what we are going through right now is potentially very helpful so the practice is how would I experience this moment without the addition of thought and then you come to experience the pure isness of this moment in which there is no suffering there is only the isness of this because all the unhappiness ultimately was not created by the situation it was created by the narrative but you didn't know that as most humans still don't know that because they cannot separate the situation from the narrative and so whenever you feel unhappy you feel fearful you feel depressed you feel resentful what's happening, self pity, whatever it may be use that as a little wake up call say okay, how does this arise, where does this how is this feeling of unhappiness in whatever form how does it come about and then you become more and more aware of what goes on in your thinking mind the awareness is deeper, a deeper dimension of consciousness, we can say higher or deeper, it doesn't matter it is a deeper dimension of consciousness than the activity of thought, which is also consciousness every thought is a form that consciousness takes but underneath that there is a vast realm of consciousness in the same way that a ripple on the surface of the ocean, let's say that's the thought but the ripple is only a temporary fleeting expression of a much deeper reality underneath it and so you wake up to that deeper identity by realizing the fundamental difference between what is and what the mind has to say about it and then more and more you're able to experience situations with the power of your presence, you're facing a situation with the power of your presence it's not your presence but let's just call it yours you face it with the power of your presence, which is true intelligence instead of being reactive and complaining about what it ever is you're experiencing a lot of that unnecessary mind activity the narrative the excess baggage a lot of that you might have noticed is complaining you can complain about life about other people around you you can complain about the unfairness of it all, how life has treated you or whatever it is you can complain about, whatever the politicians and all kinds of the infinite things you can complain about so a lot of that narrative has an element of complaining to it and it's not pleasant but the false sense of self, the ego, the me it loves complaining because then it feels it has a stronger sense of identity, a fictitious identity it loves to make somebody wrong another person, you can make a whole situation wrong, this should not be happening, it should not be happening, it's a travesty but it is happening this should not be happening is the narrative and that what makes you unhappy in most cases perhaps all cases, is the narrative in the mind not the situation the situation is as it is and as when you realize that, then more and more are you able to face every situation which is in the present moment the only place where any situation can arise, you face it as it is in the now, with the power of your presence and if action is required, you take action if nothing can be done you leave it alone it is as it is and you are not unhappy about it anymore you rise above it so to speak, you are no longer at the mercy of whatever is happening or not happening around you yes, it is nice when nice things happen and it is not so nice when unpleasant things happen but it doesn't touch you that deeply because you have access already, a deeper dimension within yourself, so you are no longer at the mercy of conditions because as long as you are at the mercy of conditions life is very frustrating because conditions or situations you find yourself in are never satisfying for very long and a lot of the time they are unsatisfying, a lot of the time they are challenging because life is not here to make you happy the world isn't here to make you happy it is here to awaken you to make you conscious how does it do that? it does that by challenging you and it is doing it now so and as you are able to let go of the unnecessary narrative that makes you unhappy then you automatically become present to what is and then you understand perhaps what Shakespeare meant when he said nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so thanks, I will talk to you again soon in the meantime please try it out, practice and see what happens thanks as you know I may have mentioned before nature can always help you to get back into presence and out of your mind out of your mind is usually has negative connotations but not in the way I use it so even in the midst of a city there's always a little bit of nature somewhere, in New York you might have to look like a tourist but the tourists are looking at the buildings and you'll be looking at the little bit of sky so the sky is always there so even to look at the sky can be a meditation you can look at the sky and whether it's cloudy if it's cloudy there will still be light coming through the clouds otherwise it would be completely dark so there is the analogy is the sky is your consciousness the emptiness of the sky the vastness of the sky is the unconditioned consciousness and the clouds are the thoughts thought formations or mental emotional formations and sometimes the sky is totally cloudy, dense layers of cloud even then there is some light coming through and there's the interesting, it's a good analogy the best thing probably that you can find in this world of sense perceived phenomena the best comparison or analogy to the inner spaciousness stillness unconditioned consciousness is actually the clear sky now the interesting thing about the clear sky we have a name for it we say the sky in some languages you have two names one is heaven and one is sky in other languages there's only sky which can mean heaven or sky so in those translations Jesus says the kingdom of the sky in French Italian, probably Italian Spanish, German Jesus actually says when he talks about kingdom of heaven it's actually translated the kingdom of the sky and so that's very interesting because the sky is actually nothing if you ever went up in this direction hoping to get there you would never find it because ultimately the sky does not actually exist as something in this sense in the same way that a table exists or a cloud exists although we have it appears as if it were one of many things in this world, we have a noun for it the sky but if you look, there is no such thing as the sky, it's a certain appearance, there is the sunlight, beyond it there is the vastness and darkness of outer space and somehow the two coming together creates the illusion that there is something there but you could never touch it or feel I'm now in it, you can be in a cloud, but you can't be in the sky, you never know where is it I've been going upwards for 20 miles and still don't know where it is and before you know it you're in outer space, where was it?

There is no sky, in the same way that the consciousness that underlies everything that is the essence of who you are does not actually exist in this world in the same way in which an object exists in this world, although we have a word for it, we have a noun for it, we call it the consciousness believing that there is something that is consciousness but there isn't, it is an emanation from the unmanifested, so in itself, the consciousness is not an object you could never say, there it is, that actually Jesus said literally when they asked, when does the kingdom of heaven come or where is it? kingdom of the sky you can never say, ah there it is or it's over there that's what he literally said so you can't say the consciousness this is the analogy, the sky is the consciousness, not the only place where it's used, it's also used sometimes in Chinese, ancient Chinese spirituality, Taoism and so on the heaven, the sky the vastness of it, but it is intangible it does not exist in the same way that consciousness does not exist, because exist that word means x is from the Latin out, is to stand, it stands out something that exists, stands out into this world, it projects itself into this dimension but the sky does not exist, because you can never find it and the consciousness does not exist in the way that something out here exists, it is the the ground for existence it is the being before the being becomes something so there is being and there is existence, the being very different it sounds almost like an obscure existentialist treatise, being and existence but that is why people like Jesus use this use the sky as the closest he could get to explaining what the unconditioned consciousness is and so when you look at the sky, the equivalent of the vast emptiness or spaciousness of the clear sky is your inner spaciousness or emptiness and you can never say it can never become an object for yourself in the same way as I see the table or I am now aware of the consciousness you can't be aware of the consciousness because the awareness is it so there can't there is no duality, you can't make it into an object and that means when you are rooted in that dimension within yourself that is very different from the form identity, the egoic identity in the egoic identity you have made yourself into an object of consciousness starting with, as we mentioned the other day the pool of water in which Narcissus saw himself, the ancient myth and so that was the beginning of human consciousness forming an image of itself and mistaking the mental image for who you are so you make yourself into an object of consciousness then you have a relationship with this object of consciousness which is a mental creation a mental formation and this object of consciousness becomes you and you have a relationship with yourself that's a strange thing now you will find that this your dog is so much happier than you and experiences so much more joy because the dog does not have a relationship with him or herself hasn't created a mental image that he can be unhappy with I'm not happy with the way I look my tail is too short my legs are too short so it has no therefore it's life, nothing in nature has a relationship with itself, it is itself, the tree is itself, the flower is itself, it is never unhappy about itself you can only be unhappy about yourself if you have a relationship with yourself which is the ego so if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you are in a state of lack of insufficiency, of not enough and you feel that the answer to, the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible, then you probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack, in order to transcend to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary focus on the realization of being it's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack, which is ego go within and discover who or what you are beyond the passing

the book has been used

[Speaker 1] (8:52:18 - 9:21:54)
I'm told, to combat anxiety and depression how?

people who read the book begin to realize that the majority of their problems most of their problems ultimately arise not so much from the circumstances of their lives, but from how their mind interprets the circumstances of their lives, there is a story that people could continuously tell themselves in their head they talk, this is the self-talk that most people engage with, sometimes without even knowing it, we've all met people in the street who are talking out aloud and we say they're crazy they're talking to themselves but ultimately everybody is doing it inside their heads, so there is a there is a voice this is a conditioned thinking it never stops talking and for many people it's not a pleasant voice because it works on small scale in small situations as well as in significant situations, let's say you are you're becoming anxious because you're lining up at a supermarket or the airline check-in counter and it's not moving and you're becoming upset and anxious and this is awful and at that moment I would recommend that you ask yourself the question how would I experience this moment if I did not add these thoughts to it, if I did not add this baggage of thoughts to it that says this is awful, how would I experience this moment, this is just an experiment you can conduct, okay here I am, I'm still standing here and now I'm not adding any narrative to it, I'm just taking this moment as it is and suddenly you don't experience the upset, the anger or the anxiety anymore because you have let go of the narrative which interprets this event in negative terms there are many books by Krishna Murthy, most of the books were not written by him, they are skillfully edited transcripts of his talks there are only about two books that were written by him and one of those books is the book we're just going to look at today it's called Krishna Murthy's Notebook and in 1961, 62 the impulse came to him to get a notebook and write every day a few small short entries into his notebook every day and he did that for a year and a half or so and then suddenly stopped and that was it and the entries, I'm going to read a few to you today and comment on each one they are all about the way in which he perceives nature so many descriptions of nature nature perceived through his state of consciousness of stillness so to read that, to read those brief passages can also take you into stillness and as we read them here some passages together that's an invitation for us to enter the same state of consciousness through which he perceived what he describes that is some practice to get used to until it becomes second nature to have your attention in the present moment rather than elsewhere have the main focus of your attention in your daily life in the present moment the rest of your attention, so that's the main focus, here's this, the rest of your attention is where you want to go to whatever task you're engaged in has a certain purpose the purpose is you want to finish the task and it has achieved its purpose and that's here and that's in your peripheral the peripheral vision of your consciousness, that's where you want to get to and this is what you're doing in order to get there and your main attention is not where you want to get and in the meantime you're just doing it in order to get there you can see how that already creates an inner stress I'm here but I want to be there that's a normal way of living is the main part of people's attention is there, but in the meantime they are here where they don't really want to be rather be there as shown in famous stickers on bumper stickers on cars which say something like, I'd rather be fishing when I visited Ram Dass the spiritual teacher who is now passed away, he lived on Maui on his car I saw a bumper sticker which said I'd rather be here now that's a good teaching on a bumper sticker so your attention is and this is a reversal almost of how humans normally usually live, it's the opposite that is in itself already a shift in consciousness and then of course you're also aware of the past, the certain things that may have a relevance in the present that's fine so peripherally past and future, usually future is more important because you're moving towards that and here's the central vision of present moment, in the present moment you're either actively doing something or you are more passively perceiving something you're there as a an observer or you're just there, not actively doing but simply perceiving that could be when you travel back from here already you might be sitting in a car, if you're driving you're doing something there it's particularly important to be present or you might be sitting on a plane and this is a good opportunity for being the you go into the witnessing mode there's nothing particular to do unless you get out your laptop and start doing that's fine and sometimes situations arise that are problematic that's quite normal in life they are challenging rather than problematic and then you face the challenge, you look at it so to speak, not necessarily visually, but you give it attention that this is the challenge and instead of unconscious reactivity the challenge is your flight is cancelled it's not one of the greatest challenges a human can have but some people react as if it were and when any challenge arises is there anything I can do to respond to this situation or is that something where I simply have to say, well for the time being I accept the way it is because right now there's nothing I can do I heard for example at some airports they're so busy not sufficiently staffed people when the plane lands they're still trapped on the plane for two or three hours it has happened in Toronto and other places that's a good opportunity of surrender some people can't do that they start screaming and shouting no particular purpose, but they can't help it it happens to them so always the question is is this an opportunity for surrender or is action called for that is a practice to get used to until it becomes second nature to have the your attention in the present moment rather than elsewhere and it usually implies you are aware of your surroundings that's inseparable from being in the present through your senses a more alert human being than a normal human being but an alertness in which there is no tension often alertness in a human is associated with being tense but there is an alertness without tension but it's not enough to be just aware of your sense perceptions, that's a good thing it also can help you to avoid dangerous situations that otherwise you just stumble into and you don't know how you got there, you're more alert of your surroundings you see how animals in that sense are very alert because if they are not they get eaten by other animals many animals have this incredible alertness not the same as the human alertness but it is an alert awareness of their surroundings that many humans don't have, they walk in the street they're not really there in their mind thinking about all kinds of things except where they are and so they're not here whereas the bird sitting on a branch or the deer that's stepping out of the forest and there's a field and the deer stops for a moment and the ears, they're very huge ears, they go and it can hear probably a hundred times better than the human or a bird on a branch sitting it goes like this and then suddenly it goes and of course there's no decision making involved when a bird suddenly flies off it did not think, I'm now going to fly off this branch and I'm going to go over there, it just happens there's a flow to life there's no mind there is a consciousness there but there's no conceptualization at all but when an animal rests an animal also rests completely it is completely at rest not thinking about my life my life I have to figure something out what's the purpose of it all this is why it can be very healing to live with an animal, yes it can be quite a bit of work too but it can be very healing to live with an animal and to have an animal presence in the house dog, cat usually this unproblematic existence except when the dog or cat are neurotic which can happen but there are reasons for that you're usually connected to their early life just like human childhood, when things go wrong in childhood it leaves traces so if but usually dogs and cats normal status, unless they're hungry or want to go for a walk they can be really rooted in being and joyful the cat purrs the dog's tail wags and it's a joy just to see it no problem with no psychological problems unless it spent too much time with neurotic humans it's a conscious practice so an animal can bring you into the present moment just to look at an animal in the present moment an animal that lives with humans may not be quite as alert as an animal out in the wild because it knows that the environment is relatively protected nevertheless dogs are quite alert and cats too so you become again the center of your attention always bring back into the present because it's first of all because it's all there ever is, well that's a good reason, because it's life itself your life situation yes it exists in time there's a past and a future as far as your life situation is concerned but it's not your life I wrote about that a long time ago but it's so important people confuse their life situation with something more fundamental more real, more immediate deeper which is called life life situation is circumstances and events in your life and most of your life situation is experienced in your mind and then life situation is relationships work situation, financial situation living situation all kinds of problems often problematic situations it's very rare that all of these situations are working smoothly and perfectly relationships family professional work financial environment living situation health situation all working in harmony and perfectly it can happen for short periods but usually something somewhere goes wrong, it has to periodically, frequently that's normal and that's good but your life situation always has this element of uncertainty instability too, although you might not recognize that when you look at seemingly solid things and your life is the experience of this moment the only thing there ever is so as we sit here I'd like to put a little question mark into your mind and like you to ask yourself whether at this moment you're thinking so you will know the answer and try it again I'll stop speaking for a few seconds and just be alert inside yourself to find out whether you're thinking, because usually you don't even know that you're thinking you are the thinking so there's no outside thing that knows that you are thinking you are just the thinking you become the thinking, the thinker and the thinker is the person and to step out of the person you have to experience that there is a dimension in you where the person is not but something deeper is there that's what we want to explore so again a moment of stillness in the power of now I talk about a mouse sorry, a cat watching a mouse hole now if you've ever watched a cat watching a mouse hole then you will have noticed that the cat could spend a long time there being extremely alert and just watching in the same way that my dog watches a treat when I put it down and say, not yet and then the dog goes and so the cat watches the mouse hole, is in a complete state of complete attention so one spiritual master I believe it was a Sufi master said his teacher had been a cat when he was asked who had been his spiritual teacher he said a cat, how is that and he said, I watched a cat watching a mouse hole and by watching a cat watching a mouse hole I realized I awakened because by watching a cat, he entered a state of alert attention in which there is no thinking like now just that, there's no just a short moment but it's not matter how long, it's a wonderful thing to realize that you can not think it's a wonderful thing to realize that you are still there when you're not thinking as Oprah said, when we started for the first time in the moment of silence and we started to talk again, she said ok, I'm still here I just checked in, I'm still alive I'm still here, I haven't disappeared one more time be alert, you need to be alert to know whether you're thinking or not so there's an alertness like a cat and there may be thinking or there may not be thinking there may just be the alertness I also mentioned in the Power of Now that another question you can ask yourself is what's my next thought going to be I'm going to just watch out, see what's the next thought is that's going to come into my mind if you're very alert it'll be quite a while before the next thought comes, but the moment the degree of alertness decreases thoughts come flooding back in interesting experiments you can do with yourself and your mind now from the point of view of the usual thinking mind the realization that there is a dimension in you where thinking either does not happen at all or becomes unimportant to the thinking mind, that is either a threat or completely uninteresting because what could be less interesting than not thinking so from the point of view of the thinking mind the state of consciousness in which there is no thinking is either a threat oh, I don't want to go there, I'm going to disappear, but of course Oprah didn't disappear after the stillness I'm still there, I'm still alive and then when she said that I said perhaps you're even more alive now and that is pointing to something you there is an intensification of aliveness when you begin to enter that let's call it dimension in yourself the dimension in which compulsive thinking doesn't operate anymore but you have to be careful because you could easily because, okay what we're doing here is we rise above thinking we become so alert that thinking either doesn't happen or is seen as unimportant from there you can easily suddenly drop through thinking to below thought in other words you go to hot sleep so when you stop thinking there's the alertness here's the thinking level that's the normal level for most human beings while they are awake and even when they dream they're still going on here's the thinking level underneath the thinking level there's consciousness above the thinking level there's consciousness and even within thinking there's consciousness, thinking is an expression of consciousness but there are infinite varieties of manifestations or expressions of consciousness this flower is an expression of consciousness taking on the form, this beautiful form, incredible beauty consciousness being born into forms and consciousness, not all consciousness is form, there is a dimension of consciousness that is formless out of which all forms come the ground of all being and that's what we are exploring here thinking you rise above thinking or you fall below thinking we met, well I can't remember when we first met but then we really got to know each other a few years ago when Oprah was doing the webinar with me the ten week seminar on the internet and you were a part of that

yeah, that was that was I've had a lot of wonderful experiences here, but I count that as one of the great experiences of my life I didn't know Oprah at all before that, I had been interviewed once by her but she admitted later she was interviewing me to test to see if I'd be a good person to work with, with you on this someone had told her that I had experience creating curriculum out of spiritual books, which I do from being here and I knew your work you had been here once before so actually I was driving in my car one day home from work, it was snowing and I I went to turn my cell phone on to call my husband and tell him I'd be late and the phone rang and it was Oprah, but I didn't think it was Oprah because if Oprah called you would you think it was Oprah?

I thought it was one of my friends pretending to be Oprah but it was and she invited me to do this and I would meet with her to go over, it was all happening very fast so I was living in a new earth, I was living in that book she had chosen it, her first non-fiction book she ever chose for her book club and she chose this and I was so impressed and I remain so impressed that she chose a very subtle, not easy book to grasp for her audience of millions of people for whom are on all different steps in the spectrum of awakening and it was her intent to bring the teachings into a language and a form that perhaps the most people could understand because she loved it and felt it had changed her so much so she would meet with me to help we'd dive into a chapter starting with chapter one obviously and try to talk about what did it mean to us and then she would say can you ask Eckhart to do this, this and this and get me questions and then I was writing a workbook that would go online so people could prepare for the next chapter all in that same week so if I got to the airport and the airplane was cancelled for six hours, I wouldn't care because I was just feeling the energy in my hands and it didn't matter if I was at O'Hare and there were kids going stranded, going to Disneyland on school break, like I was I was so present for all those weeks I think it's the most present I've ever been for an extended period of time and then I would come to you and say like Oprah wants some meditation exercises for chapter three and you'd say no you'd say exercises takes you away from the present moment just tell her to feel the energy in her hands so I'd go back to Oprah and say no we just have to feel the energy in our hands and we would laugh hysterically and then and she did such a masterful job the first night, eight million people tried to log on and it wiped out the entire internet at Chicago in all of Chicago and then they got it together and by the end, something like fifteen million people were together in those two hours live, Skyping in from Russia and Ghana and Brazil and Singapore and everywhere and it was a true it was a new earth and it was and she often says it was one of the best experiences of her life

yes, well she said to me it's the most exciting thing I've ever done and she's done many exciting things so thinking can happen against that background of awareness speaking can happen but it's also possible for the complete cessation of mind activity to happen and happen is not the right word to be there that you may notice it in the gaps between words or sentences you can be aware so acutely aware that thinking does not arise anymore you have risen above thinking or transcended thinking a state of consciousness higher than thinking in which thinking can operate doesn't have to transcend means gone beyond it's not eliminated you're able to use your mind when needed but you have the choice and this is the radical step into a new state of consciousness you have the choice not to think that's an amazing thing and not everyone here tonight is able to have that choice yet but many of you are and we are here to strengthen that ability to rise above thinking when you rise above thinking you also rise above the person or the personality which of course can still operate and does operate in everyday life but another dimension is present another dimension to who you are and if you even want to use the word enlightenment what it means is that in addition to the personality the person a deeper dimension is present and whether you call it deeper or higher it doesn't matter a deeper or higher dimension of consciousness that is more essentially you than thinking more essentially you than your personal history and in that all the other things that for most of your life you have been identified with as yourself such as the physical body whether you are a man or a woman your background your upbringing your achievements your failures your knowledge your abilities your likes your dislikes your opinions all these other things that in the so called normal state of consciousness give people their sense of who they are all those things are recognized as not self of course if you know a little bit about Buddhism or a lot about Buddhism you recognize in this the teaching of the Buddha in the Pali scriptures the word is anatta not self or no self it's a recognition that all the things that had given you your sense of self are ultimately illusory and are not yourself I have a little bit of a cough but that's okay so your sense of self is no longer in all those things although they still exist for you on the level of the person and that's a big relief because you're no longer looking for yourself where you can't be found you're no longer looking to strengthen yourself by strengthening an illusory construct with the inevitable frustration and suffering that it leads to and with the inevitable misinterpretation of other people of yourself of situations because if you live through an illusory construct of your mind whatever you perceive whatever situation you are in your relationships with people will reflect that illusion and that illusory construct the egoic self the mind made self creates an enormous amount of unhappiness in your life or as the Buddha called it suffering dukkha which can also be translated as misery or unsatisfactoriness and in that illusory state when you derive your sense of self from this illusory construct you don't realize that most of your suffering is created by your state of consciousness and you think the cause of your suffering and suffering is a generic term it's any form of unhappiness, upset discontent frustration irritation anger despondency irritation you think that all your unhappiness in whatever form is caused by factors outside of you other people situations events things that happen or fail to happen when they should be happening according to your mind things that people do or fail to do according to your mind situations or places that are found unsatisfying when they should satisfy you according to your mind so you can observe this at work even when slight upsets arise in your life where do they come from or bigger upsets and then you can if you are aware enough in that moment and I recommend that you use any form of upset as a signal that more awareness is required that you need to become present and then you discover that in most cases the upset is caused by your mind and a misinterpretation of situations and people and so on the mind creates a gap between the isness of things which it cannot accept so there is a gap between what is and what should be and then you start complaining about situations and people and you become anxious or angry or frustrated it's tedious to live like that and people live like that all their life and all that is dukkha misery, suffering, unsatisfactoriness unhappiness but the egoic mind doesn't even recognize it as such to the egoic mind it's enjoying itself the egoic mind enjoys unhappy states it strengthens itself through unhappy states so the egoic mind a lot of the time doesn't even recognize suffering as suffering it believes implicitly it's a good thing that you are angry now with that person or about that situation you have the right to be angry these people shouldn't behave like that the situation shouldn't be as it is he shouldn't have said that he should have said that or you can imply to yourself I should have in other words normal existence is like that there is a line in the course in miracles it says I'm never upset for the reason I think how do I transcend the limited me the conditioned entity it's very simple becomes still[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 37:21)

Limited entity is transcended. So if you find the stillness in you, that is the realm where the conditioned mental emotional entity is transcended. And if you haven't found the stillness, no matter what you achieve in life, it'll turn into something frustrating.

In other words, the whole life experience that you have, even though the world may tell you that you are phenomenally successful, the whole life experience will be a very frustrating business and what I call frustrating, the Buddha called dukkha, suffering can also be translated as being miserable or translated more freely as being unhappy at the mercy of conditions and circumstances. The weather is good, you feel great, it rains, you're miserable or whatever it is in your circumstances. So the most vital thing is to find the stillness and let's just, that's just a word.

What is, what is the stillness? What is behind, what is hiding behind that word stillness? So if you go on the internet, you can see a significant percentage of whatever people post there is angry and critical about others to the point of saying, these are all awful people, awful.

And so those are the patterns that come when you live for years and years and years and years and years identified with the conditioned mind. And then you grow old and you bang a cranky old man or a woman, but this has been going on for decades already. It just becomes more and more rigid.

Anyway, you are not going that way, but we need to see what we are up against, which is your mind. It's not an enemy, but you need to see that it's been the momentum that is there. It's been there, been growing for thousands of years.

And it's been a wonderful thing, a wonderful evolutionary development to have a thinking mind, except that it has absorbed almost everything into itself. Your entire consciousness has become absorbed by really, it's more than an instrument, an instrument for communication, instrument for dealing with things in this practical realm, an instrument for manifesting even, but nevertheless an instrument. So just as in the movie theater, even much more so in the movie theater, everything demands your attention.

External things and your mind. And this is, we are here in order to deepen our ability to live from a different state of consciousness where the thinking mind is transcended, can still operate, still does operate. But you have stepped beyond it.

You, which is the consciousness, you are the consciousness. So the entire essence of spiritual life is not, one could say, is not to have your consciousness continuously being absorbed by primarily your mind and sense perceptions. In the Bhagavad Gita, there is the analogy of the wild horses that are drawing the carriage in which Arjuna travels and Krishna, I think.

And the horses represent the sensory organs which continuously take your attention out. Now that was 2,000 years or more ago. Nowadays, what demands, what absorbs your attention even more than externals is your mind.

And so as you walk around here, the hour retreat place, outside or inside, look at it, you take everything in, your sense perceptions, of course. But see if you can be aware of yourself in addition to being aware of whatever you happen to be aware of at that moment, people, nature, objects, the sky, walking. In addition to being aware of whatever you're aware of, can you be aware of yourself?

Not the historical self that gets restless and impatient, but yourself as the conscious, the unconditioned consciousness, which is the same as what emerges when you listen to the silence right now, that, that self. Can you be aware while you're walking, sitting, eating, listening to people or listening to other sounds? Can you be aware of the fact that you're aware, which means to be aware of yourself as the consciousness?

That's a new way of living. And that's why we're here, in order to deepen our ability to live from that level that frees you from believing that all there is to you is your historical person, the little me. And that's a wonderful liberation.

It's not that it no longer exists, the historical person continues to exist. It will also, the egoic self, if you identify with it, it becomes the ego. If you simply observe it, it's just the historical self.

That's the difference. If you lose awareness, your historical person becomes an entity that you think is you, that's delusion. But if you're aware, the historical entity is still there, your personal you, your personal history, or whatever is in your mind is still there.

But let's use a Buddhist term. You recognize that it is not who you are. And the Buddhist term would be, you recognize it as no, not self.

And that's an enormous liberation. So it's not, we are not eliminating who you are as a person. We are just adding a dimension to it, or rather, we don't do anything, we don't add it.

We discover that there is another dimension to you. And then you begin to live from that deeper dimension, whereas the historical person and the person, the personality, it still operates. But not as you anymore.

It operates as a person. That means you become aware of your thoughts. You become, you still have your opinions, but yourself isn't in your opinions, which means you hold them more lightly.

You are not possessed by your opinions because otherwise humans that have no awareness, they don't have opinions, the opinions have them. They don't even have thoughts, the thoughts have them. So that's the shift is, the person remains, but there's a suddenly a depth to you that was there all the time.

But because of the seductive or hypnotic nature of sensory experience and more importantly, mental experience, you didn't know it was there. You didn't know the dimension of depth. You had been seduced out of the depth of who you are onto just the surface level of life, thoughts and perceptions, surface.

And it becomes a very unsatisfying experience to live on the surface of life only because on the surface of life, nothing is fulfilling for very long. So there's the continuous search. Now, because of the momentum that's behind the conditioned self, you may find that even here from time to time, although the environment is conducive to awareness, to presence, to being the unconditioned, unconditioned consciousness, nevertheless, there's such momentum to the mind.

It will, from time to time, take you over again, probably or possibly, some of you. And so even here, you may lose awareness and get totally absorbed again in the mind. Not present, absent somewhere.

And then the moment comes when you notice it. It could be a moment when you feel restlessness, impatience, irritation with something, upset, complaining, angry, all the usual things that accompany, inevitably, the personal sense of self. All the things that many persons are addicted to because it strengthens their personal selfhood, self, their personal self.

They're addicted to those patterns, addicted to being right, which means somebody else has to be wrong, otherwise you can't be right. And you can go on the internet if you have nothing else to do to strengthen your ego, no other great achievements. You feel, I did that, look at me.

Okay, well, I can't think of anything that I did. Look at me. But I can go on the internet and I can make a hundred people wrong and then wait for a response.

There are so-called trolls, trolls on the internet. They leave posts that are offensive or extremely angry and it's an ego device that didn't exist before the advent of the internet. An ego device for those who have nothing else they can identify with, that's good enough.

If I can make 10 people wrong a day as I sit behind my computer, that's good enough for my ego. It enhances itself every day through that. And the more people respond, the better.

I'm just giving examples of extreme forms of unconsciousness, which are very common, of course, but little remnants of those things, which you may occasionally discover in yourself, even here. So there is a pull to the mind. You cannot fight it.

You can only be aware of it. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Internally, transcendence is a state of mind. It is possible. And some people had to encounter the most severe limitations on their lives through physical disability, complete loss.

Had to encounter, in whatever area, severe limitations on their lives, prison cell, to realize that there is a freedom within where limitations can be transcended through non-judgment of the present moment, non-reaction, reaction is unconscious, response, yes, reaction is against, through bringing that openness, the yes to what is, the internal yes, not necessarily a verbal yes, but as in the inner attitude of being one with the present moment, that opens up in you that which is beyond form, and there you transcend limitations, and there's freedom. And that's what being dead means, dead to the world. It's not a negative thing at all.

You are much more alive when you're dead. Much more alive. And you are much more powerful when you are valley than when you are mountain.

The mountain aspect of you, by mountain we mean the form identity. Of course, you have that for a while anyway. You don't have to worry about that.

Yes, you have a form, okay. Be the valley while you are walking around as if you were a mountain, and that's peace. That's inner peace.

You walk around this world, which is not peaceful, as an energy field of peace. Not the peace that has abdicated consciousness and said, okay, I'm going to go back into semi-consciousness, desensitize myself, and go back into the vegetative realm, and be peaceful in that way. There could be an escape also from the world of form.

I'm at peace now, peace. That's the state you can also encounter just before you go to sleep in that last few moments. Something pulls you, something very sweet that we call tiredness.

Tiredness is something, we think we know what it is because we have a name for it and it's so common, but there's something very, what is that? And you say, I'm tired. It means there's a pull.

You're being pulled from within. That pull gets stronger and stronger. And that pull can get so strong that you'd rather give up your life than resist it.

People who get lost in the wilderness, they will lie down in the snow knowing that they're never going to wake up again, but the pull becomes so strong. Now, in conventional terms, we say they're so tired, they have to go to sleep. But what is tiredness?

It becomes so sweet wanting to go there. You can tonight have a look, have a feel, to stay conscious and feel the pull, how sweet it is to go into sleep. Just as you enter sleep, feel the sweetness of sleep.

And there are no problems there. Now, am I saying that's where we are going? No, but it's one way.

You're going below thought to the one. Our destiny is to go beyond thought and then reach the one consciously. Reach it realizing that you are it, but consciously.

So the sweetness of being is there when you go into sleep. It's so beautiful. After a long day, you lie in bed and go, ah, no more problems.

You're going below thinking into that beautiful sweetness of being. And here the evolutionary impulse of the universe is to encounter that consciously, to be one with that consciously, which is the dead state. Because when you go into dreamless sleep, you're virtually dead.

You don't exist as a person anymore. Temporarily, you unite with the source and then you come out again. But it is our destiny to consciously unite with the source.

Don't ask me why, I know that it is. It's our destiny to consciously unite with the source. Unite with the source of who we are.

And you can only do that if you go around as if you were already dead. Because dead means it's the formless. Death is just a dissolution of forms, but death ultimately is already life.

So that's why we have the old saying, the ancient saying, die before you die. Die before you die. Or we could, in some traditions, find death before death finds you.

Because death will find you. And if you find death before death finds you, in Christian terms, Jesus' teaching, you find what he called eternal life. Now, eternal, of course, means not it goes on and on.

It means timeless. If eternal meant it goes on and on, it would become very boring. It would become a limitation.

In heaven, you would be, after a while, you say, I don't want to be in heaven anymore. Maybe there's more going on in hell. There was a song somebody played to me some years ago by a music band.

I don't remember the name, but the title of the song was Heaven, the Place Where Nothing Ever Happens. So find death before death finds you. Beautiful.

Eternal life, of course, the teaching of Jesus has been misunderstood. First of all, they interpret it as being something that you're going to find it in the future, where after you die, you find eternal life. And then eternal was interpreted as everlasting.

There are even some translations of the Bible where it's called everlasting. But that's not right. It's eternal means timeless.

So I would substitute, then I would neither call it everlasting nor would I call it eternal anymore. I would just call it timeless. Timeless.

The timeless life that you are. That's hiding in death. And so as we realize that, more and more humans realize that dimension that is a new evolutionary level that humanity reaches, consciously uniting with that, that means you save the world.

The world becomes saved, the world out there. And it's an added bonus. Oh, that's good.

And if it were to collapse, ultimately, there is no death. Only the forms dissolve. That is the deepest.

That's not conventional reality, of course. In conventional reality, death is everywhere. So we've had the bad news, which is everybody's going to be wiped out of the planet.

Okay. Which ultimately is not the bad news at all. It's the good news.

If you realize that how so fleeting it is that why attach yourself to form as if that were all there is. The little problems of my life obscuring the divinity of who you are, the depths of who you are. All the little stuff of your life, allowing it to completely obscure who you are, how vast you are as an expression of the whole, as an expression of the timeless life, of consciousness itself, how vast you are.

And you're allowing little marital troubles and stock market concerns to obscure that. Ultimately, you're allowing the mind, because that's what it is. The stock market isn't the problem.

Your thoughts about the stock market are the problem. And the identification of millions of people with their minds have actually created the stock market, but that's another matter. So now, it's not that the problem is never out there.

The problem is always your thoughts about it. Out there, you may have a situation that may require action. That's fine.

You look at it, become still for a moment, and you act, action arises out of intelligent action, out of the stillness, that little space of no thought. Alert stillness. You look, okay, and then action, if possible.

If no action is possible, you look, and you are, that's what it is. That's power. You're in touch with power.

Not your power, the power. So we do not need to fear the end of the world, nor do we need to long for the end of the world out there. Get to the end of the world in you.

The end of the world is the end of reliance and identification with the mind. Because the mind is the world. We don't, you don't even know whether there is a world out there.

Because you can only experience it through your mind. The mind is the world. Attachment to the world really is attachment to your mind, to your thoughts.

And so, that is the transition from one state of consciousness to a higher state of consciousness. The relinquishment of that attachment to every thought that arises. Is there a world out there, or is it just our mind?

Maybe it comes to the same thing. Waking up means stepping out of identification with thought, and that means death. So simple, it's death.

When you don't believe in thoughts anymore, suddenly a spaciousness arises, an awareness arises, which from the point of view of thought is called death. Thought calls it death. Amazing.

All this we could call the good news. This is one, sometimes the gospels in the New Testament are called the good news. And of course, basically, that's what it is.

The basic message was already there. It became distorted and obscured and misinterpreted. That's all very well, but it's there.

All the ancient teachings point to it. And now it comes in a new form, because the expression of it is form. That which it points to is formless.

And that out of which the expression of it arises is the formless also. So what is happening here is happening because the universe wants it to happen. Life wants this to happen, this awakening.

Awakening out of the dream of form, ultimately. Consciousness is awakening. It's a huge, vast thing.

I do not fully understand it, nobody can, but you can be a conscious expression of that movement. And it frees your life from problems. Oh, that's a little bonus.

Oh, and it gives you inner peace. Oh, that's another bonus. It makes you a loving being.

Oh, that's a bonus. You no longer contribute to spreading unhappiness in the world. Oh, that's good.

That's good. And you actually, you change the world by being an expression of that shift in consciousness, by allowing it to happen through you. You change the world because you are all that.

And a few more doing, a few more not doing it, but realizing it. And the world changes. Now, whether in the meantime, whether the world as we know it now has to collapse substantially first before the new change can manifest and express itself also through new forms remains to be seen.

It perhaps depends on how quickly the new world and new consciousness arises in humans. And if forms need to collapse that were created by the old consciousness, from Soviet communism to Wall Street, just to take two extremes, but basically the same things, to the political system, the economic system, social or the institutions and so on. Are they going to survive?

Some may survive, many probably will not. Is that something to be feared? No.

It's enormous change coming in internally and externally. They go together. Yeah.

[Speaker 12] (37:49 - 38:06)
I wonder if you can have any advice about ego longing for something. For example, an experience that was so wonderful that I want it to be repeated.

[Speaker 1] (38:08 - 38:48)
It could even be a spiritual experience. It's not uncommon for people who have had, and then 10 years ago, I had this great meditative experience. And ever since I've been trying to get back there and- Yeah, something like that, for example.

Is it, in your case, is it one particular thing, especially, or is it something that happens frequently, thinking back on monetary experience? Or is it something that you want to mention? Tell us what it is, or would you prefer not to say what it is?

[Speaker 12] (38:48 - 39:10)
Yeah, of course, I can be open. It's spending time together with a particular person. And it's wonderful.

And I do realize that ego wants more, and it's never enough. And I do see it's kind of insane.

[Speaker 1] (39:10 - 39:18)
And that person is no longer in your life? Yeah, he is in my life. Oh, but why don't you spend time now with him?

[Speaker 12] (39:21 - 39:37)
Because I do realize that he's another human being, and he might want something else. And it feels not healthy to have this desire to be with that person all the time. I would like to have my freedom, too.

[Speaker 1] (39:38 - 39:42)
So you are in a relationship with that person, but you're not living together?

[Speaker 15] (39:43 - 39:43)
Yes.

[Speaker 1] (39:44 - 39:46)
Right. And you want to spend more time.

[Speaker 15] (39:46 - 39:46)
Yes.

[Speaker 1] (39:47 - 39:48)
But he wants to have his freedom.

[Speaker 12] (39:49 - 39:51)
I guess. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (39:53 - 53:10)
It's good sometimes to know a few details of the question, because that can be helpful. Details are very important. Sometimes I've had, before I answer your question, I don't know if there is an answer, we'll see.

Sometimes people send me manuscripts of things they have written. Often it's called my life. And often I read, and I read things like, when I was between the age of six and 10, I went through the most horrific experiences with my dad who had issues with this and that.

And I was totally, and it's all abstract. The reader cannot even imagine what exactly did happen, except we are told it's horrific. And they say, and I don't want to go into it here.

Well, if you don't go into it, nobody's going to read it. People want to know concretely what actually happened. And anyway, that's, it's helpful to know because then we can truly relate to the question.

It's the important thing is to become more comfortable with yourself and spending time with yourself. Now, in order to become more comfortable with that, you have to go more deeply into yourself where the, what I sometimes call, I haven't used this term here so far, but recently have been using it occasionally. What I call the deep eye, not this eye, the first person singular eye, the deep eye, as opposed to the surface eye.

The surface eye is of course, the egoic identity, the things that normally people refer to when they use the word eye, they refer to me and my story and my needs and my desires and my anxieties and my ambitions. That's eye. But, and I call that the surface eye that is identified with forms and is fields, certain needs, continuous needs.

And the surface eye lives in a state of frequent and in some cases or many cases, permanent and permanent state of unease at best. Unease, not quite, not completely satisfied, except briefly just after a great meal with two glasses of wine, ah, but of course you're moving towards unconsciousness or after having sex perhaps for a little while, ah, no more desires. Of course, the desire movement is just starting up again at the back and an hour later, the unease comes back.

This is the, Freud wrote this book I read it 30 years ago, so I don't remember exactly what's in it, but I remember the title. The Unease in Culture. It's the English translation.

He's saying there's an unease that underlies civilization. Now, I assume, if I don't remember the details, he says a civilization needs this unease, but I think he's wrong. The original word for unease as used by Freud for those of you who speak German is das Unbehagen, das Unbehagen, translated into English as unease.

So there is an almost continuous sense of unease and it says, what I need. I need, I need, I need. Sometimes you don't even know what it is you need, but there's just a neediness, a free floating neediness.

And these are all symptoms of the surface I. And as long as you live on the surface I, then you can't get rid of these symptoms. They will remain.

So the practice is exactly why you're here. This is the reason why you've come here. You've come here in order to go beyond, in order to transcend the surface I.

It'll still be there, but it's no longer the foundation for your sense of identity. So you become still and the mind subsides. And then you begin to, at first, just as little glimpses, little glimpses of presence of yourself as experiencing yourself as an underlying presence, consciousness, you become aware that you are conscious of consciousness.

And at first it seems to be insignificant. Okay. And the mind says, and now what?

And you just, you just, oh, it does. Yes, I knew that. And now what do I do with that?

Now, where does that take me? So you have to give yourself a little bit more space because space is exactly what you want and allow yourself to go more deeply. And then the thoughts will keep coming in and say, think about something else.

Think about what you need. This is what you need on a truer level, but it's not so much that you need it because you already have it, but you need to be conscious that you have it. You be conscious of the deep eye.

It's already there. You don't need to bring it to you or to go do penance or work hard for the next 25 years and then find it. No, it's already there.

So you have to give yourself that space where you go within what we're doing here.

I mean, by coming here, you're hard doing it because you realize that the solution to your so-called problem lies here, which means it's all about you, lies in you. Become still.

Find that dimension of stillness in you where you're fully alert, but not thinking. Five seconds and then a little longer. Go into nature.

Allow nature to help you. Look at a tree. Allow the tree to teach you stillness.

Look at a tree for two minutes and you will notice the tree exists surrounded by stillness and it's very still. And so you tune into that. So you go into, you look at the sky, the spaciousness.

I take photos of the sky all the time. I think they showed some here before. It had to be cropped a bit, unfortunately, but the original photo, there's even more spaciousness because I love the spaciousness of the sky because the moment you take that in, you become aware of spaciousness in you.

The moment you look at the spaciousness of the sky, you're not thinking. You're just taking it all in and then become aware of the presence that's taking it all in. You are that, and this presence, then you feel that more and more strongly in you, the still presence.

And that is not a place that needs anything. And there you become, you're at home then, at home with yourself. Rather than always trying to get home because it's the ego state, so to speak, it's, I'm trying to get home, but where's home?

You never feel, this is where I belong. This is where, you might think sometimes a physical place is it, but it's not it. Home, home, home.

It's wonderful that the English word and the home are so closely related. So the answer is in yourself, the more you live from the deep eye, the less you need the other. But that does, that also means the more deeply you can relate to the other, because then you can relate to the other no longer through your neediness, but through your aliveness, through your inner peace.

And you can share that with the other. And then the other wants to spend more time with you because it's so lovely to be around somebody who doesn't need anything. And the other then feels so much, feels so good to be with you.

But that's not why you do it. That's not why you go there. But, so the, the thing is it's written somewhere.

I don't remember where, well, I do. And the, the things that you, that you need, all the things that you need, or more accurately, the things that you think you need, many of those things, when you connect with a deep eye, will be added unto you. They will be added.

Now, what does that mean, added? Added means you no longer need them. And then you get them.

You didn't get them when you needed them. This is the irony of the universe. The universe is smiling, or God.

And when you don't need, it comes, or he comes. When you need, it stays away, or he stays away. That's a, well, the ego says, well, that sucks.

And another way, another story would happen to me is the, in my twenties, when the ego was growing and growing and growing, and I was becoming more and more unhappy, if I had gone to a psychic and the psychic had said to me, you will become a great spiritual teacher, the ego would have said, whoa, this is so great. Wonderful. I'll be great spiritual teacher.

It would have been very elated. But if it had been a good psychic, he or she would have added, you are great, but you have to die first. You have to die to the illusory self.

And then, yes, it may be satisfying when you're a great spiritual teacher, but you don't even think of yourself as a great spiritual teacher. And you do not regard it as a personal satisfaction. There is a something satisfying there, but not a personal, like I did something.

And if the psyche had predicted that, the ego would have said, hmm, I'm not sure if I want it anymore. So that's, so the paradox is the adding on. Seek first that, find that, and then the things that you thought you needed will be added on.

And that's, it's miraculous how that works. And so that's good. So the whole situation has brought you here.

It's all perfectly designed to bring about your awakening.

[Speaker 15] (53:14 - 53:15)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (53:44 - 56:12)
The way in which you communicate can be done in such a way that you don't make the other person wrong. That is a very helpful thing. Don't, I was staying, many years ago, I was staying with, in somebody's, when I didn't have a, I was actually writing, it doesn't really matter what I was doing.

I was writing the beginning of the power of now. Somebody offered me a room in his apartment and he had three cars and he said, you can have one of them, you can use it. I don't use it anymore.

He would always buy the next more expensive car because he got dissatisfied with the old one. So I got one of the old ones that he was dissatisfied with to drive around. And it was a beautiful car, a few years old.

But I thought when I, one day I left the car and there was a signal when I closed the door, but I didn't realize why the sound was beeping. And when he realized, he realized the next day, well, I wanted to use it again and the engine wouldn't start. So it seems that the light stayed on.

The sound was to advert me to the light. But why I'm telling you this is, he had done some spiritual work and I was very impressed when he left me a note because he got up before me. He left a note which said, the lights were on and the battery got depleted.

You need to call the AAA too. That's all. And I was very impressed by that note because he didn't, a normal person who had not done any consciousness work would have said you left the lights on despite the fact that you must have heard the warning signs of the engine.

So I would say, well, this person has some awareness. He's not making me wrong or that it was my mistake, but he's not making somebody else wrong in the service of being more right than me. Oh.

[Speaker 15] (56:15 - 56:37)

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. Oh.

[Speaker 1] (57:20 - 1:06:58)
In the Pali scriptures, the word is anatta, not self or no self. It's a recognition that all the things that had given you your sense of self are ultimately illusory and are not yourself. I have a little bit of a cough, but that's okay.

So your sense of self is no longer in all those things, although they still exist for you on the level of the person. And that's a big relief because you're no longer looking for yourself when you can't be found. You're no longer looking to strengthen yourself by strengthening an illusory construct with the inevitable frustration and suffering that it leads to, and with the inevitable misinterpretation of other people, of yourself, of situations.

Because if you live through an illusory construct of your mind, whatever you perceive, whatever situation you are in, your relationships with people will reflect that illusion and that illusory construct, the egoic self, the mind-made self, creates an enormous amount of unhappiness in your life, or as the Buddha called it, suffering, dukkha, which can also be translated as misery or unsatisfactoriness. And in that illusory state, when you derive your sense of self from this illusory construct, you don't realize that most of your suffering is created by your state of consciousness. And you think the cause of your suffering, and suffering is a generic term, it's any form of unhappiness, upset, discontent, frustration, anger, despondency, irritation.

You think that all your unhappiness in whatever form is caused by factors outside of you, other people, situations, events, things that happen or fail to happen when they should be happening according to your mind. Things that people do or fail to do according to your mind. Situations or places that are found unsatisfying when they should satisfy you according to your mind.

So you can observe this at work even when slight upsets arise in your life. Where do they come from? Or bigger upsets, when you can, if you're aware enough in that moment, and I recommend that you use any form of upset as a signal that more awareness is required, that you need to become present, and then you'll discover that in most cases, the upset is caused by your mind.

[Speaker 2] (1:07:43 - 1:12:05)
I may have mentioned before that one obstacle to meditation, especially for people who practice formal meditation regularly, they may not realize, although whatever method they use, whatever meditation practice they use, may be good, potentially helpful. There tends to be, however, always an underlying, unexpressed thought, feeling, perhaps, that you are doing a meditation. Sometimes you do many things every day, and one of the things you do is you're doing a meditation practice.

I'm doing my meditation practice. But what is the aim of meditation? Meditation, it's supposed to take you into a realization of being.

Now, we live in a culture, westernized culture, which is not confined to the geographical so-called West these days. Westernized culture is many places in the globe. We are predominantly focused, or almost many people exclusively focused on doing.

So it seems normal that you include, when you start meditating and even continue that practice, becomes part of the idea in your head that this is something that you have to do. There's a doing idea involved. Doing involves time.

Doing has an aim. I'm here, I want to get there, or I'm doing this in order to achieve that. All doing involves time.

So with the idea of doing comes the idea of time that you are, that you need to get somewhere with your meditation practice. For example, I want to become enlightened, or maybe you're not as ambitious as that, I want to still my mind. Now, meditation is a practice that is meant to give you access to a particular state of consciousness.

I call it presence. To help you realize that apart from doing, and of course doing is not just external doing, running around on the computer. Doing also is thinking.

Every thought you think you're doing something, you're doing, you're thinking.

[Speaker 1] (1:12:09 - 1:12:18)
Meditation, the aim of meditation is to bring you to a realization of being.

[Speaker 2] (1:12:21 - 1:29:17)
So to help you access another dimension within yourself, it's not thinking, and it's not to do with external activities, but you don't go to sleep either. So it's the realization of being, to become aware of your own presence. So to speak, of presence or your presence is just words.

Right now, instead of thinking we're doing something, I would suggest that an alternative access point to the state of consciousness that is presence is to let go of all doing, or any idea that you have to get somewhere. Improve yourself. There is a place for that, that exists on another dimension that also operates in your life, getting better at things and so on.

But then there's something else where any kind of doing doesn't really help. If, I'm not saying let go of all your meditation practices, if they're used correctly, they can take you into being also. But for many people, there's an underlying, continuously arising obstacle created by the idea that you're doing something and need to get somewhere.

So instead of taking you into being, it just creates more doing. Being and doing, those two dimensions, need to be present. And it's not just meditation is there to help you access being.

But in the rest of your life, which is most of your life, 98% of your life, even if you meditate a lot, 95% of your life is still something else. It's not the meditation. There, there needs to be a balance between being and doing.

Not as separate things, but coming together. And this is why here I'm not using any technique. And I just want to invite you to become aware of the fact that you are.

I wouldn't say that you exist. Of course you exist. But exist, the word itself comes from Latin, in Latin, ex means out.

Exist means to stand out. Now that's your body exists, your psychological self with its conditioning and thought processes and emotions exists. It's there, it manifests.

Whatever is manifested, not necessarily just through the senses, because the more important part of you, you can't see through the senses, that's invisible self, psychological self, exists, stands out, is manifested. So it's not so much becoming aware of the fact that you exist, but becoming aware of the underlying being that gives rise to your existence. Something deeper, becoming aware of yourself right now, as I speak, of the essence of who you are, not as a physical body, not as a psychological entity with a past, a personality conditioned by the past.

But is there anything deeper than your personality that's conditioned by the past, consists of all thought processes and emotions and opinions and viewpoints, likes and dislikes and so on, so on? Is there something else, something deeper, something without which all those other things could not manifest? Yes, you can't define it, you can't understand it, there's nothing to understand there.

If you examine your historical self, your psychological self, then you may need understanding, you might need to go to a psychotherapist to figure out things that you had not been aware of, your psychological self. But here, in that immediate realization of being, I am. There's no doubt about that, that there is a consciousness here.

Prior to whatever arises in that consciousness, there is a presence, a consciousness. Even when I don't think in exact, it's only really when there's a moment of not thinking that I become aware of that consciousness that I am. I become aware of awareness, which is not how it is, it's just language.

Awareness, which is who you are, consciousness, which is who you are, becomes aware of itself, there's no duality anymore. Can you feel yourself? Your consciousness, your beingness, the I am, without adding anything to the I am, which would be your name, your age, your gender, your position in society, your knowledge, your memories, these are all things you add to I am.

The I am is the essence. If you can sense that in your daily life, in the background, then you are always connected with being, you're rooted in that deeper dimension. And then all the comings and goings in your external life, and all your doings may still be important, are still important, whether you gain something, you lose something, whether you're healthy or ill, rich or poor, but then there's always something deeper.

And from that deeper dimension of beingness, where you can sense your essential reality as that, and not the psychological personality, that means you have found that which is of primary importance and then you deal with all the things that are of relative or secondary importance, which is everything else in your life. So you are both who you are in this world, the person, the historical entity, the physical, psychological entity, yes, you are that, but more fundamentally, you are the consciousness without which the person would not even be, would there even be a world without a consciousness perceiving the world. Molecules, atoms, and empty space make up this body, this room, everything, wherever you are, molecules, atoms, and mostly empty space.

It's not a world at that level, it's not a room, and then consciousness comes and suddenly there's a world. But molecules and atoms themselves may also be just primordial manifestations of consciousness. And ultimately, humans will realize first of all through spirituality, through your own spiritual realization, at some point, perhaps even through science, we're not there yet, that all is consciousness, that the entire universe is an expression of the one consciousness, vibrating, so to speak, at different frequencies from so-called inanimate matter to plant life, to animal life, to human life, and other dimensions of existence. In the same way, the kind of water that can be solid, it's ice, seems to have nothing to do with water, it's very hard, and then water exists as a liquid, and that water can also exist as a vapor. The same thing, at least at different frequencies, one could say, and consciousness is just an analogy for consciousness, you are essentially consciousness.

And then there's a temporary appearance of you as a person, and that's fine, it's part of the miracle of manifested existence, where consciousness breaks up into countless streams, coming all continuously from the one source. To realize yourself as consciousness, you need to become aware of the space between thoughts. When I stop speaking for brief moments, are you able to stay so present that you do not add any thought to this moment?

You add nothing to it, it's just a sensation. Yes, there is still, if your eyes are open, you can still see the screen, and can see me, or the image of me, and hear the words, or if your eyes are closed, you can still hear the words. But what else is there?

Something deeper, more vital, than whatever appears in your sense perceptions. Something without which there would be no sense perception. Oh, yes, just a stillness at first, a seemingly, a seeming nothingness.

I like that English word, nothingness. You can, the word nothing consists of no thing. An apparent no thingness when you're not thinking.

And if you were in a place where it's very totally quiet, nobody is speaking, and your eyes are closed, you can become even more aware of the no thingness. It's just a presence, an underlying presence. It has nothing to do with who you are on the level of the person, but you know.

An alive stillness.

Through thinking, you cannot be aware of those spaces between words, because thinking is object consciousness. The space between words takes you to space consciousness. So the entire secret of our gathering here of all spirituality is just one thing.

All the things that happen, your financial situation, your health situation, your relationship situation, your work situation, your living situation. Yes, these things matter, relatively speaking, but there's one thing that is more important that matters absolutely, and that is your state of consciousness. And whether or not you have awakened to what we could call, it sounds a little abstract, but it's not.

We could call the transcendent dimension of consciousness in you, the transcendent dimension of consciousness. Now, I'm not going to immediately define what that means, because actually it cannot be defined. It can be pointed to, this is what these words are for, but these words are not a substitute for it.

The words point, famous phrase in Buddhism, it's the finger pointing to the moon, but the finger is not the moon. So there's nothing that I say tonight that you need to believe on a conceptual level. I'm not asking you to believe anything whatsoever.

There is what I sometimes call the two levels of consciousness, the conceptual. I sometimes call that object consciousness. These are all the things that happen in your perceptual field and in your mental field, thinking, emotions, sense perceptions.

Things arise, things pass away, things come and go, sense perceptions, ideas, thoughts, opinions, feelings, emotions, all belong to object consciousness. One object after another happens. You perceive things, ah, oh, there, oh, and then thought objects arise continuously, a stream of thoughts, oh, no, no.

No, for most people, the stream of thoughts has such a gravitational pull that they get completely dragged along by this continuously proliferating stream of mental activity. I sometimes call it the voice in the head. It never stops speaking.

It continuously comments on where you are, what you're doing, or takes you somewhere completely different in the so-called past or the so-called future, one thing after another, one damn thing after another, to paraphrase Churchill. Churchill was talking about history. History is just one damn thing after another, and that's true, but for many people, their conditioned mind, the experience of their conditioned mind is just one damn thing after another because it never leaves you alone.

It goes, so most humans who are not awakened or even awakening are completely trapped in their object consciousness. They are confined by it, and not only that, they are completely identified with all the arising thoughts and emotions that continuously go through their mind, and there's no separation between the thoughts and the emotions that accompany the thoughts, and you, you're not even there. When you're totally identified with the voice in the head, you are, spiritually speaking, asleep, or another word for it is unconscious.

So an unconscious person, in ordinary usage, unconscious means, of course, you've completely lost, you don't know what's going on, and this is unconscious. In conventional usage, unconscious means, pfft, in spiritual usage, unconscious means completely and continuously identified with a stream of thinking, and the emotions that go with a stream of thinking. What does it mean to be identified?

It means you derive your sense of who you are from the stream of thinking. Every thought is imbued with a sense of self, so you're identified, it has you in its grasp, and therefore, if people conventionally say, I think, I think, what do you think? As if thinking, for most people, were a voluntary activity, whereas for most, not you, but those who are not awakening yet, which is the majority of the population still on the planet, for most, that is, they are completely identified with a stream of thinking.

They are, spiritually speaking, unconscious, and that is a terrible thing, because then everything that you perceive, reality itself, as you perceive it, goes through the filter of your mental, emotional conditioning from the past, so you never see anything as it is, perceive anything clearly, and most importantly, there is never a sense of inner, true inner peace, spaciousness, joy, sense of aliveness, sense of connectedness with something that is deeper than your historical person.

You're always at the mercy of what goes on out there and the reactive patterns of your mind, so you're completely unaware of the possibility of realizing the other dimension of consciousness, which is not object consciousness, but space consciousness. I call it sometimes space consciousness. Now, what is space consciousness?

You cannot define it, because it's beyond concepts. You can know what space consciousness is in this very moment by becoming aware of the gaps between words when I speak. I'm just slowing down a little bit.

So instead of being totally interested in the words, you're also interested, although that's probably not the right word, you're also giving attention to the empty spaces between the words, because they are needed. Without the spaces, there could be no sounds. The sound needs the space to exist.

Oh, that's interesting, to be aware of the gaps between words, or in this room, in this hall, to be aware not only of the objects in this room, the objects that make up this room, what's in it, the bodies, the objects, that which confines and defines the room, the ceiling, the walls, the floor. This is the room. You're not only aware of that.

That would be, in this analogy, object consciousness. You're also aware of the space in this room. Now, the space isn't something that you say, oh, it's there, or it's there.

But it is the most important part of this room, is the space, and it's a wonderful space, but you cannot define it. It has no actual, you can't even say that space exists, because exist means to manifest, to stand out. Exist, ex means out, from Latin.

Exist means to be manifested. That's it. But space doesn't manifest.

It enables everything to manifest in the physical realm. Without space, these things could not be here. So space is prior to existence.

Space is prior to manifestation, and that's very interesting. So there is something in you, which I sometimes call space consciousness, that is prior to who you are as a person, your personality, and you can know it, not conceptually, but immediately, and experientially, by becoming aware, either of the spaciousness outside of you, or becoming aware of spaces between sounds, spaces between words. Now, how do you do that?

How do you become aware of a space between two words? There is no how, because it's too simple for how. Quite simply, there's an attention in you, a field of alert attention, and this field of alert attention is aware of the space between words.

You notice that silent space. What does it mean to notice that silent space? It means in this brief moment of noticing, or noticing the space in this room, in this brief moment, you're not thinking, you're just aware.

Thinking, through thinking, you cannot be aware of those spaces between words, because thinking is object consciousness. The space between words takes you to space consciousness. So the entire secret of our gathering here, of all spirituality, is just one thing.

Now, amazingly, I'm going to talk about this one thing for hours, using different pointers, also perhaps, as you might have noticed, I haven't prepared anything, so I say perhaps because I don't know exactly what I'm going to speak about, but I assume I will also be speaking about the obstacles to this realization. This is very helpful to address the obstacles that may and probably will arise in you to the realization of that transcendent dimension of consciousness, which is the most important thing, this realization, the most important thing that can happen in your life. It's not even, happen is the wrong word.

The most important thing in your life is to connect with that depth dimension. Because without that, even if you don't fully awaken, whatever that is, but to have an inner connectedness with something that transcends the personality of the historical person, the very historical person that you are has its place. It's fine.

I mean, you have to live with yourself on that level, and it's problematic. Every person is problematic. Every person's life is problematic.

Although you might not know this if you read people's Facebook posts, because they're all doing great. And they're all looking so happy, and they're all eating their wonderful meals, and you have to fake it. Oh.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. Oh. Oh.

Oh. And they look all so beautiful because the pictures are so overexposed, like the photo on the front cover of that magazine. The photos are so overexposed that everybody looks so ethereal and beautiful.

All that's left is you see the eyes and just a little bit of blurry outline of the face, but that's all. You don't know whether they're 20 years old or 60. You wouldn't know.

So that's... But life, people have a mental construct of what their life is. One is that project into the world through modern technology.

And then you have another mental construct that you live with in your life that you call me and my life. Me and my life. That's the person talking.

That's the personality talking. So, and when you start questioning people or you'll listen to people or listen to your own, the voice in your own head talking about me and my life. It's not the greatest story.

It's a problematic story. It's not easy being me. In fact, I don't think anybody is having a more difficult time than me.

And I need to think about that a bit more. How can I solve this dilemma of me, this conundrum, this... I am, it's amazing that many people consider themselves without verbalizing it in that way.

They consider themselves to be a problem to be solved. There's something, and this is very interesting. There's something in the human psyche, if you're not awakening at all yet, so in the normal state of consciousness or unconsciousness, there's something there.

There's always either in the background or in the foreground. If it's in the background, there's a sense of unease, a sense of something is missing, something is lacking. And what it is that's missing, perhaps the mind will figure out, okay, what I need to be fulfilled is this, that, that, that.

Or the mind might not even know because whenever you achieve something that you think will liberate you from this permanent sense of insufficiency, then whenever you think you found it, it doesn't take long. And then you say, oh no, because there's something else goes wrong there too. There's a new relationship.

There's a new work situation. There's a new living situation. So there's often you deceive yourself.

You say, no, I found the answer to the dilemma of me. I'm liberated now because I have found the partner that I've been looking for, the one. I have found the one.

And this delusion lasts for a little while. We don't know how long it could last for a year, probably less. You can see when you look to anything for, let's use this almost spiritual term, salvation, because you're really looking to something out there for salvation, salvation through a deeply satisfying relationship, permanently satisfying, salvation through some kind of acquisition of something adding to your life, salvation through moving to a totally different country or place, salvation through recognition from other people. Once people recognize me as when I become famous, oh, then I'll be fully myself.

Then I will have found salvation. But all these people, when they find those things, it doesn't take long, they take relationships. You go out, you go dating.

I don't know if they still do it these days, dating. Maybe dating is old fashioned because everything happens on the phone. Tinder, swiping.

Then you have a date. When you go to a restaurant, you can see, you can immediately see with a couple sitting, whether a couple has been together already for quite a while, or whether they're only meeting for the first, second, or third time. We're dating.

The others are not dating. They're already living together. Totally different energy field.

Because the ones who are dating, they still are under the delusion that they found salvation through the other person. And you can, when you observe people, you can see it, the way they look at each other. They're both in a state of hypnosis because they go.

So wonderful. And you don't even know that you're playing a role unconsciously, and the other person's playing their role. And these two roles interact.

And you think, well, this is the reality. And then you see another couple. They obviously have been together for a while.

And they kind of, they sit there. And most likely these days, they are on their phones. So they're already living together.

And so when the dating goes to the next stage, you start moving in together. Then, these days, it often happens before the wedding, if there even is a wedding. But, so you move in together, and you quickly notice that this person is not the same person that you dated.

Soon after a few days or weeks, sometimes months, but that's maximum, you find, who is this person? There are suddenly aspects of the personality that you find deeply irritating, if not disturbing. And then you question yourself, say, I must have made a mistake.

But it could also be that your partner feels the same thing about you. What happened? Well, so you're experiencing a conditioned personality.

You're no longer experiencing a part that somebody is playing. You experience the conditioning of the person. And every person is, if you live with them for a little while, everybody, you will display behavior that is not that pleasant.

They also have a pain body. If you've read my books and talks, you know what a pain body is. And we may talk about it later.

It's an accumulation of past emotional pain that lives in you, but it's dormant. And then, after a while, it becomes active because it needs to feed on some kind of drama. And when you start living with somebody, and for the first time, you experience this person's pain body when suddenly there's a shift in the entire energy field of that person.

It's no longer the same person at all. It's a dreadful thing. And you don't know what it is.

You say, well, and that's how somebody wrote an article a while ago in the paper that says why you married the wrong person. So in that sense, it's not pessimistic, but it sounds pessimistic. You always marry the wrong person.

Unless, unless you awaken to a deeper dimension in yourself that transcends the conditioned personality, then you have something more, something genuine, something that is not part of the conditioned entity that we call the person or the personality. Without that, the state of insufficiency, of lack, of not enough, of something missing, but you don't know what, or you think you know what, but that's not it, you can never get rid of it. So if you remain trapped in the mental conditional, the conditioned energy field of the personality, then you are condemned to perpetual dissatisfaction, to put it mildly, or to use an even more generic term, unhappiness, that's a translation of a generic term that the Buddha used when he used the term dukkha, which can be translated, it's usually translated as suffering, but in more generic terms, it basically means unhappiness, misery, unease, let's stay with unhappiness in whatever form. So you're condemned to, that every situation turns into, eventually something turns up to mar the situation in some way, whether it's a person, or a place, or an activity, or something that you add to your life, that you obtain, there's always something, and that's in the nature of things, but it only happens, and that's the positive part of the Buddha's teaching is never really spoken of because he doesn't want you to believe in something. So whatever you, whatever happens, there's always something that goes wrong, so to speak, but that's not a pessimistic statement, that only applies if you are dependent for your sense of well-being, your sense of who you are, if you are dependent on all those external factors for your sense of who you truly are, your sense of identity, your sense of well-being, because nothing can satisfy you for long, and if you leave it at that, it sounds a little pessimistic or nihilistic. Okay, so what's the point in anything, says the person who superficially studies Buddhism, or other teachings? So if nothing can satisfy, what's the point in anything?

I might as well get drunk and then experience briefly that, and then the next hangover, and then get drunk again, and then eventually I'll kill myself. But that is only the first part. He says, if you seek yourself in all those things that you think will bring you salvation, if you seek yourself in those things of the world, that the world offers, then you will be unhappy.

But now, the unspoken part is, but if you find yourself in the formless realm of transcendent consciousness, then the world is actually no longer such a bad place, because you don't look to the world, which means other people, achievements, situations, and places, and acquisitions. You don't look to the world for completion of your sense of identity, you don't seek yourself anymore in the things of this world. Then the things of the world are no longer as frustrating as they were before.

And you can allow things to be, you can participate in the play of form, in manifesting, you can even enjoy relationships, because you're no longer looking for completion of your sense of self through those things. Why are you no longer looking for completion of your sense of self through those things? Because you have found yourself not in the realm of object consciousness, not in the realm of thought or sensory perception, you have found a deeper dimension within yourself, which we call temporarily space consciousness.

I also sometimes call it the deep I, by that I don't mean this I, it's a pronoun, first I, I am. The deep I, as opposed to the surface I. Now, there's the two of you exist, well, the deep I doesn't really exist, it's a prior to existence, that you have both in you, but most humans are only aware of the surface I, and that's a terrible deprivation that really is a non-fulfillment, permanent sense of non-fulfillment with brief interludes of deluded fulfillment.

Like you can have a sensory gratification, you have a wonderful meal, and then you feel, okay, I'm really fulfilled now. Well, okay, the body is full for a moment, or you can drink, you can take in some substances, and you have brief moments of, ah, a substance, whatever, can free you of yourself, briefly, too, but I don't recommend it. But I can see why people, and millions all over the world are longing, and many cannot live without some substance.

There's an enormous pull, an enormous longing. What is it that they experience when they take this substance, whether it's alcohol or other things? They experience briefly, never lasts, a sense of self-transcendence.

So the substance can briefly free you of yourself. This mind-made thing that you live with this problematic sense of I, this problematic me and my life. Oh, dear, how am I going to solve this problem?

Well, you can't. So alcohol can briefly free you because you take a few drinks and you feel lighter for a while. Ah, because it slows down your mind.

You can't think that much anymore. And because you can't think that much anymore, life becomes somewhat less problematic. Because if you don't remember your problems, they're gone.

All you're left with is immediate situations that you either deal with or you don't deal with. But the place where your problems live is in your mind, and they only exist if you think about them. Of course, they refer to situations that is true.

But every situation can only be experienced or faced or solved or simply accepted in the present moment. Nothing ever arises in your life that's not in the present moment. So the rest and the present moment you can deal with.

It's just here and now. Either you take action or you don't. But this is the present moment.

But then you have a whole superstructure of the problematic, my problematic life that lives in your mind. And that's an incredible burden to live with. And everybody lives with this burden if they have not awakened to the deeper dimension of the deep eye.

They are trapped in their surface eye. It's a terrible prison. I can sometimes watch people, how they are trapped in their personality.

And everything they say and the way they perceive things is totally colored by the conditioning of their mind. And they're identified with every thought that comes into their head. If you just question something, an opinion, they express an opinion.

And you say, no, I don't think that's right. And you give, they immediately get defensive or aggressive or angry or, sometimes people get violent when you doubt their opinions. They know you're wrong.

Wrong. People sometimes kill each other because they can't agree on a subject. Why?

Why? Because you derive your sense of identity from thought. An opinion is a thought or a group of thoughts in your mind that you identify with.

When you identify with it, it becomes part of the ego. So we're talking here, of course, I haven't used the word so far. We are talking about egoic consciousness.

When you're identified with thought completely, you are in egoic consciousness. The ego is operating in you and it pretends to be you. And so you are, spiritually speaking, asleep.

You are a totally conditioned entity. And so every opinion that you have, anybody should question it, that this person is questioning your very sense of identity. And that's how you react.

You feel threatened in your sense of identity. It's an absurd delusion, but millions live like that. So the identification with mental positions is a very important part of the egoic consciousness.

Now, does this mean as you awaken to the deeper levels, the transcendent dimension, does that mean you no longer have any opinions? No, it doesn't. You continue to have opinions and of course, thoughts also, but you do not derive your sense of who you are from those thoughts or opinions.

Why do you no longer derive your sense of who you are from those thoughts? Because you have found something much more real, much more fundamental than any thought that tells you who you are. A thought is, by the analogy I often use, is a ripple on the surface of the ocean.

You, as a personality, and the personality consists of the conditioning of your mind, you're like a ripple on the surface of the ocean. And you exist as this ripple. So some ripples are bigger than others, but it doesn't make that much difference.

Some ripples are even waves. They might have a private jet, so there's a wave, I'm a wave, I'm not a ripple on the surface of the ocean. And so the ripple considers, it looks at other ripples and feels uneasy and it's never complete.

And deep down it knows that its existence is short-lived. So it hopes to become a little bigger ripple by looking to the future, because if I get this, that or that, I'll be a bigger ripple. But it also knows deep down that the future that it looks to for fulfillment will eventually kill it too.

So the future is a two-edged sword. It promises fulfillment, but it really will kill you. That's time.

Well, we are all suffering as a physical entity. We are all suffering, of course, from that disease. The prognosis is not good because we all have this virus called time and it's already consuming our bodies.

And you don't have to wait long and finally it kills you. They haven't found a remedy yet against time. So the ripple lives an uneasy existence on the surface of the ocean, looking for some kind of completion and fearing other ripples or wanting to use other ripples.

Come, let's join the two together. We can become a bigger ripple, but it probably won't work. And then let's say the ripple in a moment of complete dissatisfaction with life, when it says nothing makes sense anymore, it finally comes to a stop in its incessant search for fulfillment.

And it comes to a stop in its incessant doing and looking to the next moment for some kind of fulfillment and the ripple for a moment stops. But it doesn't stop because it has taken... I don't know if this analogy still works if I continue with the ripple, but I talked about transcending a sense of self through taking in a substance.

It frees you from a moment from this sense of insufficiency. The ripple feels a little bit better in just taking something and it doesn't think about its problems anymore. Ah, it doesn't always work because sometimes it can awaken the pain body.

Certain substances like alcohol can awaken your pain body, in which case, because it lowers your level of consciousness to an even lower level than your normal level. I'm not talking to you personally. It lowers your level when you drink, lowers your level of consciousness to an even lower than the normal level.

And then this gives the pain body an opportunity to completely take you over. But with other people, they become temporarily quite happy when they drink or take other substances. You can smoke.

It slows down your mind. It goes, ah, and it feels so good. Your problem, the whole superstructure of problems begins to subside because you're not thinking about the problems.

Therefore, they disappear. So you have glimpses of self-transcendence and that's why people feel drawn to it because without knowing it, people are longing to become free of themselves. They don't know it, but there is a longing and this is built into the evolution of the human being.

This longing for self-transcendence is built into the evolution of human consciousness. Every human experiences it, but they look for a solution to this longing in the wrong ways, completely wrong places. Time is ultimately not helpful as far as your awakenings is concerned.

Time is not helpful. In fact, it's a hindrance in your awakening. Okay, so no time is required for awakening.

Okay, now let me, the mind says, let me try to figure this out. That doesn't make sense. That doesn't make sense.

Meaning I've been meditating for nothing all these years. Meditation, if it works as it should, ultimately the purpose is, the aim is to be present while you meditate, not to seek some future condition. This is a fundamental mistake that meditators make is they imagine a future condition that they want to arrive at or achieve.

And they think, if I just practice more and harder, I will eventually achieve that awakened state. And that belief is actually a hindrance. So, because then you are doing a meditation.

And if you're doing a meditation, you miss the one thing that is the awakened state and we could call that being. The realization of being. There needs to be a cessation of doing, an end of doing in order to realize being.

You have the two dimensions in your life. Doing, it requires time and being, that requires no time. Now, most humans are unaware of being.

They are lost in doing. And the primordial doing is thinking. And then you miss the now, which is inseparable from being.

So, I invite you as we speak, or I speak, all the speaking happens. I don't know who is speaking, something is speaking. And invite you here and now to become aware of being here and now.

Now, how does, some of you may just, as I say these words, which are only pointers, like signposts, as I say these words, some of you may be able to sense their own beingness. You sense that you are. And if you cannot, if you have no idea what I'm talking about yet, you're still trying to understand it mentally.

Let me take you then gradually into being. Let's become aware of this moment. And the first thing you become aware of in this moment is sense perceptions, visual, auditory.

And then some of the others do tactile and so on, but the most predominant sense perceptions are the visual and the auditory. You hear and you see. So this is the, you're becoming aware of the present moment, which taken the form of sensory perception here and now.

And you look around the room, or you see this person, so-called person sitting on a chair. And you can take in the totality of the room. The question that arises is, are you able to take in the totality of your sense perceptions at this moment without any mental commentary?

Just be like a, maybe like a one-year-old child hasn't learned the language yet and just looks in wonder and amazement at the world. And you don't have to look like that, I'm just... So you look around at the innocent perception without, is it possible for you, only you can answer that for yourself, but not through words, through just knowing.

Are you able to be here in this moment, allow your sense perceptions to be there? Being aware of all these things without commenting mentally, without interpretation. Just let it be, like the Beatles song, let it be.

Now that's, there's a shift in consciousness that's already happened, because when you interpret your sense perceptions, that's the conditioning of your mind. It's a person perceiving things. But when you don't interpret, there's still a knowing there, but not conceptual.

There's a deeper knowing, but the person isn't there really at that moment when you're not commenting, not interpreting, not imposing some kind of interpretation on the world. Then the person that was there before when you were commenting has been replaced by awareness or presence. So there was a person, but then the person comes to an end temporarily.

And they simply, who or what is perceiving this room when you're not commenting according to the conditioning of your past? Who or what is perceiving this? Awareness itself.

So something has, something has receded, the person, and something else has arisen to replace it, so to speak, awareness. That awareness is very still. Stillness is sometimes, in spiritual discourse, stillness is another important term.

It's just another pointer. It's stillness. And that stillness is not a sleepy stillness.

It's an alert stillness. And so a shift has taken place from being a conditioned entity, conditioned by the past, and now the shift has happened, and suddenly just, you are that space of awareness. And so the next step in presence, you're not just, yes, you are aware of your sense perceptions, and you're not labeling, but you're also aware of the awareness itself, through which you are able to be aware of sense perceptions.

You're aware of your, let's say, words are very limited, but we have to use them. You're aware of the being of yourself, the presence that makes sense perceptions possible, the presence of consciousness that makes sense perceptions possible, and you can sense that, not as a subject-object relationship, although when we talk about it, it sounds like a subject-object relationship because language operates in that way. Language has a subject and an object, so as you use language, you say, I am aware of awareness.

That creates a duality that's not really there. When you talk about it, there's an I that is aware of awareness, so there's two of you, but there isn't. It's only when you start talking about it, it's you become aware of yourself as awareness itself.

Awareness becomes self-aware, whatever you want to call it, but that is an amazing thing that you are able to enter that, even if it's just for brief moments. For brief moments, you can become free of the person. Oh, my God, that heaviness, that burden that people carry around that they are so identified with, that they are that heaviness, and that's why many, many persons, their identity is intimately bound up with this burden of problems.

That they have to figure out how to solve my life problems. So for many people, their identity is, I am a problem to be solved, that's seeking a solution, and then you go to a therapist. Come on.

Come on. Come on. However, if the therapist is present, that makes a huge difference, and I don't know.

I'm sure there are some therapists here, and some of you are probably doing fantastic work because you are able to, even though your client or patient is talking, perhaps you are able to be present while you listen instead of interpreting everything, but be the consciousness. Oh. And then perhaps some awakening can happen if you embody presence.

So the little, the big secret, it's not a secret, but it seems to be a secret, to be aware that you're conscious, to be aware of yourself as consciousness, as awareness, as presence, to sense the beingness of you, which is not the you, the limited you. It's actually the beingness of the universe in you. Only presence can dissolve the past.

Do you accept this is what you feel? This is what they do or say?

[Speaker 11] (2:24:59 - 2:25:37)
My question deals with parents, with practice and presence. I felt love for them after many years, not feeling love and feeling guilty for that, but I still have huge problems to meet them. When I meet them, if they are in the same room, even if I try to be aware of my breath and my inner body, after a while, I have huge pain body attacks.

[Speaker 1] (2:25:39 - 2:25:42)
Is that triggered by something they say or?

[Speaker 11] (2:25:42 - 2:26:02)
I can't even say that. Sometimes it's the way I manage to go through the meeting quite fine, and my mother leaves the room and I break down. And yeah, I don't know what it is.

[Speaker 1] (2:26:04 - 2:51:04)
German parents can be difficult. I know. American parents too.

So on one level, there's already an acceptance of them on a mental level, the acceptance of who they are, the acceptance of their limitations, they behave the way they behave, is the pain body is still there inside you, of course, and the pain body reacts. It may also be that the mental level, the mental acceptance is not yet complete either. To see that they act the way they act, speak the way they speak, not because of who they are, but because of their past conditioning, which is their mental emotional conditioning is speaking through them.

They can't help that. If there's not enough presence, everybody is controlled by their mental emotional conditioning. They can't help it.

They are afflicted by that disease, which is identification with unconscious conditioning. I'm not the only one who calls that disease. Even in the ancient teachings of Zen, they sometimes call it the disease of the mind.

And there are some Zen teachers who have said they are here to cure that mental illness. I've said that's what Zen is about. It's curing that mental illness.

So you need to, on the mental level, as you sit with them, you need to know that continuously that what you are observing is not who they are. You're observing a form of mental conditioning underneath that there is the being. And you may sometimes get a glimpse of it.

My mother was very much identified also with her mind. And occasionally I looked into her eyes and suddenly there was a light shining through when she stopped talking for a little while. In other words, the mind catching a breath after talking for 10 minutes incessantly.

And then for a moment I could see, oh, there's their being. Her being was shining through. And I have one or two photos where her being shines through.

And then of course it gets obscured again. And then you get the same, get the suspicions, the complaints, the accusations, all the stuff associated with unconscious thinking. So on the mental level, you need to know that, be present enough so that you don't forget that what you're observing is not who they are, but you're observing the past in them, the conditioning.

And then comes the emotions that you feel. Of course, there's your past, the past, the living past in you from your childhood, all the things they did or failed to do because they couldn't help it. There wasn't enough presence to change it.

So that's something for you to find acceptance as you accept them. And then you accept what you feel at that moment. Whether you can even label it, we don't know.

Is it sadness? Is it anger? Is it heaviness or mixture of all of that?

A feeling of wanting to run away, a contraction, whatever it is, that's all there. You don't need to even analyze it because you just need to feel the entire energy field of that, and it doesn't feel pleasant. And it's the past in you.

So there you're observing the past in them, acting out, and you experience the past in you. And so what do you do with two pasts? You have the past out there and the past in here.

Only presence can dissolve the past. So you need to access the power of presence in yourself and how do you do that? A quick way in a situation like this is the acceptance of whatever arises inside or outside at this moment.

You accept, this is what you feel. This is what they do or say. There's the acceptance of the inner and the outer.

Because it is already happening. Why? You have to accept or you suffer.

In a way, if you don't accept, you suffer more. If you don't want to feel what you feel, that's more suffering because you're resisting. Acceptance does something that I could describe as, let's say, here's the emotional field and it doesn't feel good.

And acceptance means just to say, okay, that is, I can feel that. I'm verbalizing, acceptance doesn't even require after a little while, you don't need words anymore. You can just see what is, be with it.

And at that moment, a little bit of space opens up around that emotion. A little bit of space. That space comes from your acceptance.

The acceptance gives it space. And that's already a tiny bit of freedom. You've given it a little bit of space inside yourself.

When you say, yes, this is what is. And that's a beauty. You have given both them space externally to be and you've given yourself space internally.

And then as you notice that actually, it feels already a little bit better than before because there's space around the emotion. And then you go into it more deeply and you accept even more, you continue to accept. And that space grows a little bit around it.

And then you encounter the strange phenomenon of an emotion that is not pleasant existing in a spacious field, so to speak, that's around it. And then you realize that who you are is you are that field. And you can allow the emotion to be in that field and you can allow your parents to be there and say what they say and do what they do.

They're repeating the past, space comes in. So acceptance brings space and space is the transcendence of conditioning. Space is the transcendence of the past, the transcendence, transcendence of the personality and the person and it's freedom, space.

That's the practice. And so the best place to practice is with your parents. There are many other places where you can practice, but the ultimate mastery you will achieve when you can practice with your parents, that's the graduation, you graduate.

It's the PhD in presence. With, don't jump into it too much. Don't, if you say, okay, I'm going to spend a week with our parents now, it's too much, too much.

You should give yourself short time periods at first. Say, I'm going to come for coffee and cake. That's what they like to do.

At least my mother did. I'll come for coffee and cake and I'll stay for an hour or you know, if you can, I don't know how that works practically, but, and then you practice, you give yourself one hour to practice. So that's a little, and you know, it's only an hour.

I have to be present for an hour and it's your spiritual practice. So the, as you know, I've written the quote in a book. Ram Dass said, if you think you're so enlightened, spend two weeks with your parents, two weeks.

The ultimate test. So happy practice. It is madness to argue with is.

It is. Intelligent action arises if the starting point is alignment with what is internally. The nature and function of challenges and difficulties in the evolutionary process.

We can use the term challenge, which is already has a positive spin to it. Something happens and you call it, it's a big challenge. But without the positive spin, you would say it's really bad.

It's, oh, it's so bad what has happened. Then you become more spiritual and say, I'm faced with a challenge. Okay.

Now, challenges come in many forms. There's no human life that is not profoundly challenged in one way or another. Some humans are challenged by physical challenges, difficulties.

Other humans are usually challenged by dreadful psychological challenges and their own minds. The personal challenges in your personal life, collective challenges that affect millions of people at the same time, all in various ways. We've just had one.

So it seems that many things are almost designed in one's life to stop you from evolving or becoming more conscious. And many people say, if I only had surroundings, if I lived in a place that was peaceful and calm, and my needs are met, my basic needs are met, I got pure food and everything else, so I don't have to worry about things anymore. If I could only live in this perfect environment, I could really make spiritual progress.

If I only had that, but I don't. And no matter what stage you're at, always obstacles arise continuously. Sometimes things go well and then another obstacle goes and then they go well again.

Oh, obstacles come in many, many forms, physical, relationship, financial, home situation, all kinds of things. Pandemic is a collective one and other collective ones most likely coming soon. The strange thing is evolution happens only when faced with obstacles.

That happens on every level, physical level, every level. It's only when an obstacle is encountered that there's a call for more energy and then more energy flows in and whatever frequency of energy could even be physical. For example, if you want to have a stronger body, it's not going to happen if you lie on your sofa every day, drinking beer and watching Netflix.

You can say, I want a stronger body. Yeah, well, it's not happening. Now, what do you have to do to have a stronger body?

To put it in strange terms, you have to, at first, you have to make life difficult for your body. For example, you go jogging and you think, I wish I was watching Netflix on my sofa, but the body doesn't like it, but you say, and then you lift a weight. Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh.

You're making life difficult for your body, very difficult, but only then it happens, your body then demands more energy and an influx of energy comes that eventually is translated into muscle growth and so on. And then a point comes when actually more energy has come, then you suddenly enjoy that. But the enjoyment is preceded by experiencing difficulty and obstacle.

On every level, humans evolve. Many, many people here, I know that from what people have told me, it's always the case, many of you would not be here if you had not encountered very difficult life situations. Either through loss or breakdown of relationships, loss of loved ones, physical, serious physical illness, accident.

Many people have told me, I would never have come realize what this is about if I hadn't gone through this difficult period in my life. It's then, there's an influx of energy that comes and at the highest level, it is an increase in consciousness. As you're faced with difficulties, some difficulties can be removed on a practical level.

Many other difficulties require an increase in consciousness for you to overcome them or transcend them. I've had correspondents from people in prison, for many, some are in prison for life. And they've said, I have awakened through coming into contact with this teaching.

I have awakened and I am free in a prison cell. So they have, it is, in your comfort zone, it is very unlikely that the awakening will happen to any human being, as long as they remain in their comfort zone. Perhaps if they had, this is the last incarnation as they've already gone through an enormous amount of evolution in previous lifetimes.

And then perhaps at a very early age, they can already awaken. But most humans, they do not awaken as long as they're in their comfort zones. Oh, it's good enough.

I mean, comfort zone is not all that happy mostly, but at least it's not too bad. But when you're taken out of your comfort zone, that's where evolution happens, the evolution of consciousness. So in other words, you need the bad to evolve.

Sorry. And life doesn't leave you alone. Even after awakening, you've got challenges come.

Oh my God. But what changes is, and this is important, that you no longer demand that the world should leave you alone and should make you happy. It can't.

As long as you think it should, and there's always something wrong when you're being challenged by this or that. You think there's something deeply wrong with my life. I'm being challenged.

Or in other words, I'm experiencing all these difficulties. And then you realize, you drop the demands that the world should make you happy because the world isn't here for that. It's here to make you conscious, to awaken you.

And it does that by confronting you with difficulties. One after another. Now, some difficulties are so bad that they kill you.

That's true. They could happen. And then you get another chance after that.

It was perhaps a philosopher Nietzsche who said, what doesn't kill me makes me stronger. There's some truth to that. And so the, when challenges happen, important thing is, how do I meet this challenge?

With what state of consciousness do I meet this challenge? And that determines the further development of that particular situation also. If you're able to meet a challenge consciously instead of reactively, then quickly it becomes transformed also externally as a challenge.

To meet it consciously means, in the first instance, to accept this moment as it is, no matter what it presents you with, no matter what this moment, what form this moment takes. You accept this moment as it is, because you might as well, because it already is. It is madness to argue with is.

It is. Of course, then you, what can you do about it? If you need to take action or can take action.

Action, intelligent action arises if the starting point is alignment with what is internally. This is what is, and then if action is needed, right action will arise. But when, if you immediately, you go into reactivity, you make the situation worse than it is.

It, you often amplify something bad and becomes even worse and worse through reactivity. You can verify this when dealing with an unconscious human. If you react to their unconsciousness, then you yourself become more unconscious and you make them more unconscious and you get huge drama.

So, and again, collectively too, when faced with a difficulty, how aware can you be when you are prior to taking action? Are you just reacting or are you able to be aware? Which means, is wisdom present?

That's, we haven't mentioned this word before, but it's inseparable from what we're talking about. Wisdom is the higher intelligence that operates through you when you're in touch with the vertical dimension. All you have when you're not in touch with the vertical dimension, you might have the clever human mind that can work things out in a very limited way.

But wisdom is not there. Wisdom can seize the totality of the situation and in taking action, it considers immediately other possible consequences of the action and the totality. And you do not through breaking things down, but there is the same way in which you, you remember we talked about the two modalities of knowing, conceptual and direct knowing through awareness.

And that applies here too, when you look at a problem that needs solving. You look at, is there wisdom in what you do or just mental cleverness? And anything you do when you react to a problem, then if you will make it worse, or you solve one problem and curate four or five others in the process of solving one.

So the world drama gets amplified through the egoic reactivity that always says, this should not be happening, not aligned with the present moment. So wisdom is what the world needs and wisdom can only come through awareness. And that is the deeper modality of knowing.

Intelligence is not enough. The world is full of intelligent people, so-called. I mean, really, if you really look, is that intelligence?

And they're creating that, what are they doing? They got their university degree. So I suppose in conventional terms, we have to call it intelligence.

And then they're creating havoc on the planet. No wisdom. An increase in intelligence will not save us.

On increasing knowledge, what's most, wisdom, only wisdom can, and wisdom is inseparable from awareness, the arising of awareness. It comes, it's from the dimension of the vertical dimension of depth, not through thinking. So when you look at a situation and you are able to be alert and still, you look.

And then the realization of what action is, the right action, comes.

[Speaker 9] (2:51:25 - 2:51:58)
Welcome to the second part of this special video series on Conscious Manifestation 2020. In this second part, Eckhart Tolle addresses how once we've developed a level of presence and awareness of thoughts and emotions, how do we work with anxiety or fear that keeps erupting, that we keep feeling in our felt experience? Here's part two of Conscious Manifestation 2020 with Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (2:51:59 - 3:48:57)
Now, what about the fear? What about the anxiety, the anxiety that has been in you? For many people, it's in the background, most of their lives, some fear, some anxiety.

And when they're being challenged as now, the anxiety that is a kind of background, distant background noise for some people is almost always there, but sometimes obscured by the second, that suddenly becomes very pronounced, this anxiety in the face of a challenge, the anxiety that had already been there in the background, the fear, that now comes out fully and you are in the grip of it. And now you become aware of the link between your thought processes and your emotions. And you realize that your unconscious thought process, such as boring, actually fuel the emotion that we call fear or anxiety continuously.

So a vicious circle arises, and then the emotion that you feel, which you feel it, tend to feel it in your stomach, in this area here, you feel it, a contraction, almost a painful thing dwelling in your stomach or solar plexus area. But it can affect the whole body, the whole body can be tense, it interferes with the harmonious functioning of your body. So it's very, this anxiety lowers your immune system on the physical level, even mainstream medicine recognizes the fact that what they call stress, which stress is mostly fear and anxiety, makes you much more, lowers your immune system and you're much more susceptible to illness.

It doesn't mean if you're not anxious, you will never catch an illness, but you're much more susceptible to being sick when you are in an almost continuous state of stress or anxiety. So then the fear, of course, rise this up back into your mind and creates more emotionally charged fearful thinking, which is not just fearful thinking, it's now emotionally charged fearful thinking. And that creates even more of that emotion.

This is why it's called a vicious circle. The fearful thinking feeds the fearfully emotion with energy, one could say the fearful thinking vibrates at the same frequency as the fearful emotion. So it is food that the emotion loves.

So it wants more of it. Once you're on the grip of worrying, anxious thinking, you don't want to stop. Well, you might want to stop, but you are not even there when you're completely identified.

It does not want to stop. So you are trapped in this fearful vicious circle of emotion, fearful thinking, creating the emotion of fear and the emotion of fear rising back up into your mind and creating emotionally charged fearful thinking. And when you are in that state, you cannot think clearly, whatever thought that arises, what do I have to do now?

What can I do now? It's very unlikely that you will have a creative and useful thought. Whatever your action you take on the basis of fearful thinking is likely to be not wise, not effective and probably wrong and leads to more suffering.

Whatever, in whatever way you interpret the world through the veil of fearful thinking, in whatever way you interpret the world when you're in the grip of fearful thinking is going to be a complete misinterpretation. But to you, when you identify with it, it's the reality. So the first thing is to become aware of thoughts and emotions.

And then, so that means the awareness has arisen. It's there. Then once you recognize the futility and destructive nature of certain types of thinking, you're able to increasingly let go of it and replace it, not immediately necessarily with positive thoughts, but it's better to, because you still have a negative emotion there.

So if you immediately replace the unconscious fearful thinking with positive thoughts, there's a conflict between the emotion that is still there, which is the fear and the thoughts that are floating on top there. And so, and you will feel that there's something not right because the emotion says you're in a critical state and your mind has a thought that all is well, life is good, I'm going to be abundant. It's unlikely that this will be effective.

So again, realize what kind of thoughts go through your mind, recognize the futility and destructive nature of these types of thought, and then replace these thoughts, not immediately with positive thoughts, but with awareness. Replace, instead of engaged in negative thinking, be more present as much as you can, be more in the present moment, because after all, that's all there ever is. Mind doesn't seem to know that.

All there ever is, is the present moment. There's nothing else ever in your life. So you might as well give it some attention.

You might as well make it the focus of your life because that is, it unfolds in this now moment, everything. Future never comes, it's always now. When the future comes, it's the now.

When the past happened, it was the now. When you remember the past, you remember it now. When you think about future, you think about it now.

There is only now. So you might as well give it your fullest attention, make it the focal point of your life, and then see what you can do with the so-called future. But first you need to come into a relationship with the now that is helpful, sane, and that is friendly.

Become friendly with them. When you enter the now, you see the now is not really that, is not a threatening place most of the time, except when there's an emergency happening and you have to do something, an immediate life-threatening or whatever it is. But the now is actually a much more benign place than the mind would be able to recognize.

But you need to have your awareness there. You need to be aware. You need to be present in the now in order to recognize that the now can actually be your friend and it's not your enemy.

The now is your friend. You become friendly with the present moment. And that's, however, so you begin to recognize and begin to cut the link between your thought processes and the emotion because you let go of these fearful thoughts.

You recognize their futility. Instead, you're much more present. Thoughts will occasionally still come in and then you recognize them, let go, be more present.

However, in that presence, the emotion of fear may not and probably will not immediately disappear because it's been there for a long time. So even if you no longer feel the emotion with your thinking, you become present and you may notice, yes, I'm aware of, more aware of sense perceptions, the aliveness of this moment. You can see perhaps beauty in things, the things that you didn't give any attention to before.

However, you can also still feel this anxiety or fear living in you, still there. Even when you're no longer feeding it with your thoughts, you can still feel it, there it is. And that becomes part of your experience of the present moment, that anxiety.

Now, what do you do with it? The normal tendency would be to say, I want to get rid of this. I shouldn't be feeling this.

I don't want to feel this. And some people just cannot tolerate the anxiety. So they need to, they might go to their doctor and say, please do something about this anxiety.

The doctor will then give you a prescription. In some extreme cases, those things may be temporarily helpful in some extreme cases, but a lot of the time you would have missed an opportunity. And that is the opportunity of evolving through facing pain or suffering.

If you face the emotional pain that you feel, it's anxiety or fear, and not even, not try to run away from it, or say, I can't stand, become so uncomfortable being in your own skin, can become so unpleasant and uncomfortable that you just want to run away or say, please give me something so that I don't have to feel this anymore. But actually it doesn't help to want to get rid of it. It just creates another layer of anxiety or problems on top of the emotion.

Now, I suggest as an alternative approach is to make the emotion that you feel that still lives in you part of your experience of the present moment and accept it in the way you accept the totality of the present moment. And that's a new way of living, a very powerful way of living, a very powerful way of connecting with a deeper level of consciousness in you, of finding enormous power that dwells in you if you can accept the present moment as it is, internally, externally, and internally. So it's not going to kill you.

The anxiety is there, but it's not going to kill you. It might kill you if you react to it and create further anxiety. And you then allow the anxiety to be there as it is.

Completely. It's almost like saying, it sounds a little strange, it's almost like saying, I don't mind being anxious. Sounds very paradoxical.

But it's a very interesting experiment you can conduct. Any form of unhappiness, of course, some unhappiness is telling you that something is wrong in your life, it's a different story. But habitual unhappiness that arises in you, no matter where you go and what you do, unhappiness arises in you.

No matter where you go and what you do, fear and anxiety are there. And this applies to countless humans on the planet. Now, as an experiment, as I said, what happens when they say, I don't mind being unhappy, I don't mind being anxious.

But of course, you're not fueling the anxiety with your thinking, you're aware of your anxiety. So you've reached that step where you're no longer giving it further fuel or food, and you're becoming aware of the anxiety. And then, as you place your attention on it, which is part of the attention that's in the present moment, you become aware that it's actually, there's very intense energy in that fear.

Almost a burning energy in that fear, but the energy is not a flowing energy, it's trapped energy. It's like being in a, like a boiling kettle, you're holding the lid down, the energy is trapped, but there is enormous life energy in that fear. And if you can completely accept your fear in this moment, without feeding it any longer with your thinking, just being aware of it, that's what it is.

You may find, in a very subtle ways, a change happening. And the change is, it's a transmutation of this energy, fear, when you accept it completely, a transmutation of this energy into intense presence. So the same energy that before was fear, when it's completely accepted, it suddenly goes, and there's enormous power that was in there, trapped.

And suddenly it becomes fuel for your consciousness, becomes transmuted into presence or awareness, when it's completely accepted. And then it's no longer fear, it's just in suddenly intense awareness. And that intense awareness is like a, one could almost say a higher intelligence that suddenly begins to operate in you.

You're no longer just reliant on the conditioning of your mind. There's an intense presence there. And it can, now it doesn't mean it happens once and then it's never fear again.

After that experience, you have to experiment. It may not last very long, the initial transmutation, then you may fall back into fear. And the fear may repeatedly try to rise back up into your mind and make you think fearful thoughts.

And from time to time, it probably will succeed again. And you fall back into the same pattern, but then more and more at shorter and shorter intervals, you wake up again and you realize that this is what's happening. And so, and then again, you come to a place of just acceptance and then notice that the transmutation happens again.

And this is how, it is not just fear, it can be with any kind of suffering in your life. When it's completely accepted, a transmutation begins to happen. And that is how suffering is actually an essential part of the evolution of human consciousness.

Because if you reach a point where suffering can be transmuted into a higher consciousness, awareness or presence, it becomes fuel for presence. So it's bringing your inner self into alignment with the present moment. A very powerful spiritual practice.

Why is it so powerful? Especially when the situation is challenging and you still say it and you mean it. Because everything that sustains the person, the exclusively personal sense of self, in that act of complete surrender to what is, the personal sense of self gives way to a deeper transcendent sense of self, which the Buddhists call no self.

A deeper consciousness suddenly shines through. So really, it's a kind of denying your form identity. Doesn't mean you don't have it anymore, but you are no longer trapped exclusively in your form identity.

The form identity is strengthened the more you can be in opposition to what is, the stronger your form identity, me, the person, the me. The more you are in opposition to what is, the stronger the me becomes, your form identity. And if you can have enemies, lots of enemies, it loves, that gets even stronger.

They're all against me or us, if it's a collective ego. Collective ego loves its enemies, can't actually survive without them. Every collective ego needs the others.

We're not us, this is us, and that's the others. So that's the wonderful thing that the person, the exclusively personal sense of self becomes weakened, subsides, and something else emerges when you are no longer habitually oppose what is, something emerges that is deeper than the personal sense of self, the transcendent dimension, presence, whatever we want to call it. Some people call it your higher self, or you could call it your deeper self.

Words, doesn't matter. But something emerges that is from beyond the person. And that is a place of great power and aliveness and possibility.

That is where you are connected with a vastness and with everybody else too. So it's when you feel, when that transcendent dimension arises, you feel a greater sense of connectedness, no longer the separation with, not only with nature, but also with other humans. You no longer feel the otherness of the other.

It's just yourself in another disguise that's really becomes your experience. Whoever you meet, there's yourself in another disguise. Isn't that a wonderful way of being with other humans that essentially you can sense not only your connectedness, but you can also sense your inherent oneness.

With others. So that is why this presence practice, honoring the present moment, welcoming the is-ness, that's why that's such a powerful practice. Yes.

I suggest that you bring a certain spiritual practice, if you even want to call it that, it's not really anything separate from normal everyday existence. I suggest you bring that little spiritual practice into your normal life. And that is invite these brief periods of no thought into ordinary human life, into your normal everyday existence.

And this could be a simple thing like, whenever you look up at the sky, the sky is a beautiful thing, I love the sky. I've taken hundreds and hundreds of photos of the sky on my iPhone. Most of the photos I have on my iPhone are of the sky.

And whenever you look at the sky, and you don't need to become a sky gazer, no, just a brief, a few seconds out of the window or outside, and for that moment, are you able to look without the addition of thought, without adding thought to the sense perception? So all you have, not the sky may be completely clear, it may be completely clouded, or there may be clouds floating around, it doesn't matter. You take it in, whatever it is, and there's a moment of looking, three seconds, five seconds, 10 seconds.

In that moment of looking, there's no commentary. It doesn't say, oh, it's going to rain, or not another dreary day, or, oh, I wonder if it's going to stay like that for the rest of the day. None of that.

But this can only happen if there's an alertness there. There needs to be an alertness that keeps thought at bay. And this is not willpower.

It's simply an alert presence. It goes, one could say, a raising of your frequency, and it goes, shh, and then you look, and there's a, the background to the sense perception is no longer you as the person, but you as awareness or consciousness. You are looking as consciousness.

You're not looking as a person. The moment you comment on what you're seeing, you interpret what you're seeing, you become the person. So, and I'm only giving one example.

You can make it a habit several times during the day to look at the sky in that way in which you don't add thought. Another practice I suggest, a tree. And even if you live in London, the lovely thing about London is there are lots of trees around, and not only in the parks, but many streets also have trees.

And so look at a tree every day, or whenever you see a tree, give it five seconds, give it 10 seconds, and see if you can look at that as presence rather than as a person, just that sense perception and presence. And then you can do it here and now. You can either be aware of something specific and aware of awareness.

Those are always the two. You're looking at the sky, and you're aware of who is looking or what is looking, the two dimensions. As you're sitting here, you're aware of the room.

You're aware of the voice. You're aware of the lights. You're not, whatever it is, what in addition can you be aware of in order to be the presence?

You're aware of yourself as the awareness. And you don't need thought for that. Thought would interfere with that.

So take in this, here's the room, here's the person sitting on a chair, there's a screen there, and take in the totality of this room without adding thought to it. And that's beautiful. You don't need to interpret it.

And just, it's still there. You know what it is without calling it anything. And then it deepens.

The strange thing is when you don't add thought when it's not needed, sometimes you need thought. When you don't add thought when it's not needed, there is a depth even to your sense perceptions. So when you look at the sky, it's more than just the sky.

When you look at a tree, you don't reduce this mystery that ultimately the tree is because who knows what the tree is. But by calling it tree, you don't know what it is. You just attach a label to a mystery that applies to virtually anything or to anything.

When you call it something and you say, oh no, that's what it is, you don't know. It's a convenient label, but it covers up the mystery. It covers up the depth of aliveness that is in everything.

As Krishnamurti said once, the moment you teach a child the name of the bird, the child will never see the bird again. No, this does not mean that you should refrain from teaching the child. The child needs the words.

It wants to know the words. It says, what's that? Oh, that's a sparrow.

Sparrow, okay, okay. What's that? But you see how the moment you give the label, it obscures the depth that's there behind the label.

And it's only when you then can relinquish the label, then there is a greater depth to what you see even to sense perceptions. There is an aliveness in the flower that some people can only get a glimpse of this kind of perception when they take something and they go, wow, or they look at the sky and say, wow, isn't that amazing? They took the little substance, but what that little substance did, it momentarily made sense perceptions so strong that there was no room for thought anymore.

So there was just the experiencing of it. And that can be a liberating thing for certain people who are totally in continuously immersed in the voice in the head, but it's not a long-term solution, the little substance. So this is an amazing practice.

It is also when, if you want to get in touch with the level where intuition arises, where a fresh creative idea arises, where any kind of creativity arises and made to do with whatever work you do, any creative contribution, if there's something, a problem to be solved and nobody has the answer, if you are able in all those situations to step out of thought, instead of thinking, they need to think harder to find the solution. And then you go and you can't even sleep at night anymore.

And you go, well, what's going on? Many people look at their own lives as one big problem that they can try to solve somehow. So people seek, for many people, their sense of identity is me the problem that's to be solved.

And if I could only solve this problem of me, I would be okay. And of course, yes, you can't really solve it, but you can step out of it and then it solves itself. I don't know what happened and I don't know why, but I feel this deep peace and I have nothing.

I've suddenly feel, Jesus called it the peace that passes all understanding, which means you cannot explain, well, although I'm trying to explain it, you cannot explain why this person should suddenly be so peaceful. So I believe that no matter whether you are a Christian or whether you are not a Christian, there is a deep truth embodied in the central image of Christianity. And the central image of Christianity is a man who is on the cross, an extremely serious man.

An extreme form of suffering. And ultimately that means every human being, one could say Jesus is the archetype for every human. Every human being is crucified by life.

Every human being goes through the suffering and with the suffering comes the possibility of transcending the ego by entering a state of complete surrender and acceptance. Ultimately, you step out of your thinking mind and what's left when you're no longer thinking about yourself and your life and what went wrong, in fact, thinking subsides. And what's left of you when you're not thinking about yourself or about anything?

Is that even possible? Is that even possible? For example, at this moment, are you able to experience as you sit there being in that space of not needing to add any thought to this moment?

Can you allow this moment to be as it is so completely that you do not add any interpretation to it? Just be it. So what is left of you right now?

You're not remembering your story because you are still completely yourself without the story. Isn't that surprising? Even without remembering all your past suffering, there is a sense of being, in fact, it's stronger.

You don't remember all the things that went wrong in your life. Okay, that's gone. You don't even remember your email address, it's gone.

Or your telephone number, you don't need it right now. When you need it, it'll be there. You don't need it, that's gone.

So instead of I am this and I am that and I am that, what remains is a sense of beingness, which is I am. But nothing is added to the I am. This is what's left of you right now.

What is left, there's a stillness. When thinking subsides, you have not lost consciousness. You have not become, you have not gone down.

You have not fallen below thinking. You have risen above thinking. There are two ways of becoming free of compulsive thinking, which is how the ego arises.

There are two ways of becoming free of compulsive thinking, the compulsive thinking that makes your life miserable, not the thinking that is useful, not the thinking that is a useful tool for creating and manifesting and inventing things and so on. There's a beautiful thing, thinking is an enormous advance for humans, evolution of human consciousness, but the way it has developed now, humans are possessed by thinking. They do not think, the language you use, you say, I think, you don't think, thinking happens to you.

And the thoughts that happen to you are thoughts that you absorb from the surrounding culture. You watch the media, the mainstream media, and you take that in and then you regurgitate, this is what I think, or you're against it, this is what I think. Thinking happens to you, you don't think unless you are aware.

And awareness or presence is a dimension of consciousness that is deeper, or we could say higher, than thinking. Awareness is when thinking stops and you have not gone to sleep. In fact, you are more alert than before and you can look around wherever you are, for example, here and now in this room, you can look around this room and perceive everything, visually and listen to everything without adding any thought to it, just be still and perceive.

There's still a knowing there, but it's not conceptual knowing. There's a deeper knowing there. Become familiar with the state of being free of thinking and just aware, but that requires a certain alertness.

Without the alertness, you drift back into thinking. So what the true spiritual teaching shows you the way of rising above thinking so that you can begin to use thinking, not you as the ego, but you as the higher consciousness that you are, can use thinking as a tool instead of being used by thinking, by thought. So there are two ways of being free of thinking.

One is rising above, which is why we're here. The other is falling below. If you want to fall below, you have to walk out of here, go to the bar next door and order a few whiskeys.

And then you can experience becoming free of thinking also gradually, but you're falling below thinking. Oh, it feels so good. I can't even remember my problems anymore.

It feels good. You start singing. And there's a joy of life.

No need to think, just be. I have another one. And then, of course, you're moving towards unconsciousness.

And this is not the way we are going. It is not the destiny of humanity to regress to a pre-thinking stage just because you want to be as happy as your dog. You say, well, the dog isn't thinking, and so I'm going to go there too.

The dog hasn't arrived at the, the dog is a beautiful manifestation of consciousness, but it's not a thinking consciousness. So you need to discover in yourself the ability to be free of thinking initially for brief moments. And this is a good moment.

When you perceive the world around you without mental labels, just an alert presence in the background of your sense perceptions. The conditioned thought processes never stop. They go continuously.

There's a voice talking to you, or you're talking to yourself, or you're having a monologue, or you're having a dialogue. Some people argue with themselves. It's all the voice in the head, never stops for most people.

And that is, spiritually speaking, that is a state of unconsciousness, completely identified with the conditioned mental-emotional patterns, which make up the so-called person, personality, the ego. So if you are completely identified with it, every thought has you in its grasp. Every emotion that arises has you completely in its grasp.

And you're thinking, you think you're thinking, but you're not thinking, thinking happens to you. You don't have a choice if you're unconscious. There's no choice.

All your thought processes happen to you. You're at the mercy of the conditioned thoughts in your head. And all the reactions that come with it, every situation you encounter, there comes a conditioned reaction to the situation.

It's the person or the personality that reacts. And you don't even have a choice. Why don't you have a choice?

Because you're asleep, spiritually speaking. This thing, it's taken you over. It's a dream-like state also.

And you can see, often people are completely up there. They're never really, they're not really here. You can see sometimes the complete absence in a person's eyes.

They're not really here, they're asleep. But they're thinking very hard. And even at night, when there's nobody around to talk to, you're still, the voice is going on.

And it's telling you, I have these problems. Oh, what's going to happen next? Oh, awful, sick, my God.

I can't take any more of this. What's my life come to? I imagined something different when I was 20 years old.

I imagined something very, very different. Why did it all go so wrong? Well, that's a, well, many people actually have that feeling that something, it has gone drastically wrong in my life.

And with others, it's a mixed bag. Some things went okay, and others didn't. It depends what their mind, and your mind tends to focus more on the negative than the positive, much more memorable, the negative than the positive.

If you go on vacation and everything goes perfectly fine, okay, you'll remember some nice moments and sunsets. But if something went drastically wrong, you'll remember that for the rest of your life, and you talk about it continuously. You tell the story of what went wrong.

If everything went fine, you don't talk about it, you'll be at a wonderful holiday. Oh yeah, okay, so that's the end of it. But you know what happened?

We went into our room, and there was these cockroaches crawling on the floor, and then the water was coming through the ceiling, and then they stole all my bags. Oh my God. It's so interesting.

And then you know what he said to me? He said, how dare you? And I said, how dare I?

What about you? You are the one with the biggest ego, I said. And then he started hitting me.

And whatever. And the stories go on and on. And so a lot of things, the negative things are much more memorable, that the ego focuses on that.

It loves its enemies, and every negative situation is the ego's enemy. And then it can claim, it can enhance its fictitious identity. The more enemies you have, the stronger your fictitious sense of self becomes.

Entire nations do that too. They need their enemies. Except Sweden, it's so peaceful.

Oh. All the non-peace-loving people have left Sweden a long time ago. They were called the Vikings.

And they occupied other lands. So, then we have, in Indian spiritual philosophy of psychology, there's a word that's been around for a long time. It's called Turiya.

Turiya means the force. First, second, third, fourth. Turiya is the force.

It's the force is, it refers to a state of consciousness. They divided the human consciousness into these four parts. There is dreamless sleep.

There is the dream state in sleep. There is the state of wakefulness, which is ordinary human consciousness. And Turiya is the awakened state of consciousness.

That's the fourth state of consciousness. They've been talking about that for hundreds of years, thousands of years. The possibility of this dimension of consciousness arising in humans, the fourth state.

This is what this is all about. And it is not some distant possibility that you may achieve in some future lifetime. As many people still believe that.

Many Buddhists, I've met Buddhists who say, I think I'll need another 15 lifetimes. And then, in fact, my teacher told me, they say, he told me 15 more lifetimes and then I'll be enlightened. Oh, wow.

Okay, that's right. Well, you have plenty of time so you can stay unconscious now. It's okay.

But the strange thing is, the awakened state of consciousness is already there within you. It's just covered up, hidden. Are you able to give your fullest attention to the doing or are you so consumed by the desired outcome that you create continuous stress in the doing of it?

And here we come to a new word that we need to, okay. It is a shameful matter to be poor and humble when the way prevails in the state. Equally, it is a shameful matter to be rich and noble when the way falls into disuse in the state.

Here, Confucius uses the term the way, which in Chinese, of course, is the Tao, the Tao. Now, the Tao doesn't, Confucius doesn't mention it very often. The Tao, of course, is the, that which cannot be named or explained.

And yet I'm attempting to do it right now. The Tao is that, that which the organizing intelligence, the intelligence that underlies all physical or other phenomena that underlies the entire world, something that is transcendent to the appearances, that is beyond appearances, but is that which always brings things back into balance and harmony. It's an underlying vast intelligence, the Tao, which emanates, as I said, it emanates from God, and God is the ultimate source of everything.

So the Tao emanates, the Tao underlies everything, the entire, it's the intelligence behind phenomena. It exists in many, in many, it's called different things in different traditions. One could say, you could, in Christianity, it could be the Holy Spirit that is there.

You have it in Egypt, in ancient Egypt, that's where they have a beautiful personification, a visual, pictorial personification of that very thing, the underlying principle behind things. It's the, and that's, it's a good, the goddess called Mart, M-A-R-T, Mart in ancient Egypt. And I've shown you here, I think it might still be on my iPad, the pictorial representation of it.

Oops. Oh, technology is very difficult.

[Speaker 1] (3:49:33 - 3:56:11)
This is a, this is Mart, the wings, vast wings that enfold the entire world. This is what protects the entire world from destruction and collapsing. So this is the organizing intelligence, the intelligence, it limits it when you call it intelligence.

You can say it's the love behind it all that holds it together. That's the, that's Mart, the wings represent that power, that's the Tao. And now he is talking about a country or a state.

It is a shameful matter to be poor and humble when the way prevails in the state. The way is the Tao. When the, when in a state, humans are relatively speaking in alignment with the underlying harmony of it all, then things go well.

And then he says it's to be poor and humble when there's connected, when you are in an environment where the Tao is recognized and humans live in accordance as much as possible in accordance with that underlying harmony, then why be poor? Then you should thrive. But it is a shameful matter if you are rich and noble when the way falls into disuse in the state.

In other words, when there's corruption and all kinds of destructiveness in the state that you live in, if you are then, if you are rich and, if you are rich and noble in a state that is corrupt, that is shameful. So if you get very successful in a corrupt environment, then it must mean you are corrupt too. If you're, but you should be successful in a state where there is, that is more aligned with the Tao, then there's no reason to be poor.

Again, there's nothing wrong with being poor, but you can, basically he's saying, if you're well, if you're well-off, wealthy and powerful in a corrupt country, then that's shameful. If you still remain poor in a country where the collective is aligned, which is very rare, the collective is aligned with the underlying Tao, then you might as well do well. If you're not, I wouldn't totally agree with him.

It's shameful not to do well, because it may be your choice not to participate too much in the country and just live in your little hut with rice and water. That's fine too. So very often spiritual teachings seem to stress different points according to who is speaking to at any particular time.

So who was asking him this question and who is he speaking to? So often you need to take that into account when sometimes certain teachings may seem to be contradictory. Who is the teacher speaking to at that point?

We don't know that because all the disciples was, they wrote down what he said. And again, the teachings of Confucius are very much to do with using your life here as a spiritual practice. He's not very much in favor of totally withdrawing from society and living, just being in meditation.

And becoming a hermit. You learn more, interacting with other humans is the most important element of your spiritual practice. And basically the teaching is to use your interaction in society with other humans, with your next of kin and et cetera, everybody as spiritual practice.

That's, and beyond that, he does not talk about metaphysical things. He does not talk about, as I said, doesn't talk about God. And here, when somebody asked him, Zilu asked how the spirits of the dead and the gods should be served.

The master said, you are not able even to serve man. How can you serve the spirits? And then somebody asked him, may I ask about death?

And the master says, you do not understand even life. How can you understand death? So he doesn't get into how to serve the spirits or the gods, serve man.

You learn by, through your interaction with other humans, not some other worldly thing. And think that if you practice sacrifices to the gods, you're a superior human being and nothing changes in your interaction with your fellow human beings. So what the criterion for inner change is your interaction with other human beings.

That's the ground for practice, that's Confucius. It's not other worldly at all. It's using this world in order to become more conscious, a fully developed human being.

[Speaker 14] (3:56:25 - 3:56:35)
Oh, here, again, this looks a bit complicated, but.

[Speaker 1] (3:57:48 - 4:00:45)
Somebody asks him about benevolence again. What is benevolence? The master said, love your fellow man.

And what about wisdom? What is wisdom? Master said, know your fellow man.

Love your fellow man, that's benevolence. Know your fellow man is wisdom. I wouldn't use wisdom, it's practical intelligence again.

So you love the other, the human, because if you recognize that in them, that is beyond the merely human, the being beyond the human, as I put it, because you recognize the being beyond the human that you are as consciousness right now. But you also, you know the other on the level of their personality also. You can see, for example, the conditioning of their personality.

You recognize, for example, that perhaps maybe this person is dishonored and dishonest and wants to cheat you. And you recognize the conditioning in the other, you see it, that you know him as a person, but you still love him as a being beyond the person. You can have the two levels.

You don't become totally naive when you're in a state of loving kindness to other human beings. And then you get taken in by everybody who wants to manipulate you or use you for their own egoic purposes. Say, oh, yes, yes.

You're not naive when you love you. You know the difference between the conditioning that operates in the other as the person and that which is beyond the person, which is maybe latent. The other doesn't know it in him or herself, but you can sense it in the other.

That's the loving kind. In that sense, even if somebody wants to defraud you, you can still be in that state of benevolence towards that person. But you recognize, you see the conditioning of the personality, which may be quite obnoxious.

Many personalities are really obnoxious and toxic, but don't confuse that with the essence of the other, the so-called other.

[Speaker 14] (4:00:49 - 4:01:00)
And here we have, this looks complicated, but I'll read it.

[Speaker 1] (4:01:00 - 4:39:03)
It's not really. Somebody asked him, may I ask about the exaltation of virtue, the reformation of the depraved and the recognition of misguided judgment? That seems to be a difficult question.

So you're asking about three things. The record, he's asking, first of all, the exaltation of virtue. The master said, what a splendid question.

To put service before the reward you get for it, is that not exaltation of virtue? He often phrases his teachings as questions, but he means, yes, it is. So to put service before the reward you get for it, is that not exaltation of virtue?

So you are virtuous as a human, if you put the service before the reward you get for it. Now that's an important principle that is also part of the perennial philosophy. This does not just apply to a particular service you give to another or that includes that.

It means whatever action you perform, not place excessive emphasis on the result that you want to achieve through your action. As it's called in the Bhagavad Gita, the fruit of the action. You do not, you perform an action without excessive attachment to the expected outcome.

That is what he calls the reward. And that is a conscious action, which implies that you give your fullest attention to the action itself. You give it, you do it fully.

You focus your attention fully. You are not distracted by what you want to get or achieve through the action. Yes, of course, the action has a purpose.

Anything you do has a purpose and the purpose necessarily is in the future. You want to achieve this or that through what you do. But if there's an excessive emphasis in your mind on the future thing that you want to arrive at or attain, then the action is no longer given fullest attention.

In fact, that's where stress and anxiety arises because your mental focus is on where you want to be already or the reward you want to achieve through what you're doing. This is the point in the future. This takes attention away from the doing.

It diminishes the quality of your action. That's very important when you interact with human beings and let's say you're a salesperson and you want to sign the deal with other. Now how, if that, if you're in your mind, you give undue importance to the result, which is to sign the deal so that you get your commission through the sale, maybe you're a realtor or whatever, or you're a car salesman or whatever.

Then the quality of your interaction with a human diminishes and the other human actually can feel that unconsciously or consciously that you are only interested in them as a means to an end. And the end is getting the reward for what we're doing. And because the quality of your interaction diminishes, the quality means you're not giving your fullest attention to the other as a human being.

The other is only a means towards an end. And the other can sense that he or she is only a means to you. It's only a means towards an end.

And you are actually much less likely to get the deal signed because the other does not feel fully recognized. He feels you're only interested in using him or her to arrive at the reward, the fruit of your action. But if the reward is very much secondary, yes, you know you want to, you would like to, let's say you're a car salesman, you would like to sell this car, it would be nice, but you give your fullest attention to the interaction as you talk to the human being.

The fruit is secondary. That means that's the more conscious way of dealing with things. And it doesn't even necessarily imply other human beings.

It could just be you're engaged in creating something with your hands or intellectually. Are you able to give your fullest attention to the doing or are you so consumed by the desired outcome that you create continuous stress in the doing of it? So as you know, here we are mainly concerned with entering the realm of being, of presence.

There hasn't been a lot for you to do, just little doings, walking from here to there, eating your food, some talking, some thinking, which is a doing. But mostly this has been and still is about connecting with being, the dimension of stillness beyond thinking out of which all thinking arises. Now, when you leave here, many of you, if not most of you, are going back into more doing again.

So your challenge will be not to lose the rootedness in that deeper dimension while you're engaged in whatever you do. And the world will do all it can to challenge you, to pull you out of that rootedness. And it will tell you, not in so many words, but it will in the form of events and people and happenings and things not working.

And so it will tell you, this is all important. Give me your fullest attention. This really matters.

It may matter, but as I put it, although things matter relatively, they may be relatively important, whether or not you miss your plane, whether you're not, you find that great job or you lose that great job, or whatever happens, it's all relatively important. But only one thing is of absolute importance, and that is your connectedness with being so that that dimension is with you, as you in your daily life. That's the challenge.

A few things will be helpful in this. One is letting go of the unconscious assumption that there should be no problems and difficulties. And if they are, that they are undesirable obstacles that really shouldn't be there in the form of events or people or situations.

But if you look back on your life and I look back on my life, it's always been challenging. There are brief moments when it's not challenging, and that's great, but you know very well that life won't leave you alone. It'll challenge you one way or another.

If you look at the world situation, it's the same. There's all kinds of challenges in the news. First there were the communists, there was a Cold War, and then there are suddenly other huge challenges arising, and it goes on and on.

So in the words of the first sentence in the book called The Road Less Traveled, which I never read because the first few sentences were so good I didn't need to read the rest of it. And the first sentence is, now this might go against certain new age beliefs, and it might at first sound negative because the first sentence is, life is difficult. That doesn't sound very inspiring.

And then the next sentence, although I don't remember, it literally says, and if you know that, you're completely okay with the fact that life is difficult, then it's no longer difficult. So that's all I read. Because that says it all already.

How does that work? How is life, when you know that life is difficult, it's no longer difficult? You try to work that out.

Well, here's the explanation. It's really only difficult if you think that it shouldn't be difficult because then you're in continuous resistance to things and people and events. But once you accept it's an essential part of life of being difficult, then whenever the next difficulty rises, you say, oh, there's life again, being difficult.

In other words, what does that do? It creates an acceptance of what is. If you carry around the assumption in your head, it shouldn't be difficult.

There should be no difficult people and obstacles and problems, and things should not get canceled, and plans should not be interrupted, and nobody should fall ill, and then people shouldn't die, certainly. That's a travesty. These things should not, they're all dreadful.

This is an underlying assumption. Things should go smoothly. And of course, sometimes they do go smoothly.

But the irony or the paradox is that once you recognize the fact that life is difficult, that life is not meant to make you happy, it's not meant to make you unhappy, but it makes you unhappy if you have a wrong attitude towards life. Happiness comes with accepting the fact that challenges are an essential part of the evolutionary process for all life forms. So challenges for you, even if you don't call them challenges, challenge is a nice term because something positive is already implied within it.

If you call it problems or bad stuff happening, then it doesn't sound so good. Challenges are here to awaken you. And even if you're awakening, continuous life continues to give you challenges, and then the awakening accelerates and deepens.

And at whatever stage you're at, you won't be free as long as you're here of challenges. So if you recognize that, you no longer need to be in a hostile, confrontational relationship with life. I don't, sorry about the term.

You're not pissed off all the time with another thing happening. I'm so pissed off with life. Just can't go on.

And people just can't take anymore, just. Then you can, there's a kind of accepting, not necessarily welcoming, but sometimes welcoming every situation that arises. That is, so if you welcome it, there's a book by Byron Katie called Loving What Is.

That means you are in an accepting relationship with whatever arises. Of course, it all arises in the present moment. Anything else that arises is in your mind.

So you need to differentiate between challenges, problems, difficulties that are actual, in the form of people, events, or situations, and challenges, problems, and difficulties that are fictitious, that are purely created by your mind, creating pseudo problems. For example, when you worry in the middle of the night, huge problems. Are those the real challenges of life?

No, these are fictitious problems created in your mind, dwelling on things, things that happened but should not have happened. Those are not the real challenges of life. Those are the challenges of your mind, the mind-created problems.

So you need to very clearly differentiate in your life between actual difficulties, challenges, or problems. There is a person who is shouting at you, that's an actual. Or there is the thing, you just missed your flight, and you can't get on the next one, or the next one.

Or financial challenges, relationship challenges, family situations, work situations, actual things that happen that need to deal with. But then there's a huge amount of suffering that is generated not by the actual challenges of life, but by the fictitious problems that the mind creates, sometimes around the actual challenges of life, and sometimes out of, no, out of thin air, things that could go wrong. So, on the one hand, you have your mind creating a lot of useful, useless suffering through unconscious thinking, and then you have the actual situations in your life.

So, you don't have to endure your mind, but when it says life is difficult, that shouldn't really include your mind, because that's something you can do something about immediately, you don't have to live with a dysfunctional mind, millions still do. That is something that can be transcended, and this is, of course, what we are doing here, what you are doing as part of the awakening, is a huge amount of the life is difficult, a huge percentage of that difficulty is created by the mind. That we can deal with, that can change, that does not have to be.

Once, when you do that, then the next part is actual situations will still occur. Once you know that, then you can come to a more surrendered approach to life and actually, almost or actually welcome the difficult people in your life, the difficult situations in your life, loss, and so on. Without demanding unconsciously, not in so many words, perhaps, that demanding this should not be happening and there's something dreadfully wrong when things go wrong in your life.

And that makes life really difficult. This is what the man means at the beginning of the book, the author, when he says, life is difficult, but when you know that life is difficult and you fully come to terms with the fact that life is difficult, it's not difficult anymore because the greatest difficulty is the mental resistance to things that arise and the underlying assumption that they should not. So once you have then a surrendered relationship with the present moment, because everything arises in the present moment, then it's not really that difficult anymore and you can, even in the midst of turmoil, still be connected with the realm of being within yourself.

So there's always a core of stillness, if only in the background. And no matter what happens, that core of stillness is there, if you want to call it stillness. It's also, as we saw, and as you know, it's also the source of satisfaction, where true satisfaction or a true sense of wellbeing that goes beyond physical wellbeing, a true sense of wellbeing comes from.

It's the transcendent dimension. So life will challenge you with its difficulties, the small and big. Small happen probably every day in some form.

So you don't get upset anymore when things don't go according to plan. You don't get upset and complain or irritated or angry when people don't behave the way they should behave. And that makes it so much easier when you no longer demand that these things should not be the way they are.

Nobody should, they shouldn't cancel flights. Weather shouldn't be in such a way that they can't fly anymore. And the body shouldn't get old.

Nobody should have catch an illness. Now, a lot of illnesses are produced, or you're much more prone to have an illness if your mind is very dysfunctional because it lowers the physical resistance. It affects the body.

What the mind does obviously affects the body. Even mainstream medicine is beginning to recognize your mental emotional state affects your physical state. So if your mental emotional state is very dysfunctional, your body's resistance to illness decreases.

The likelihood increases that you catch something. There are other causes of illness. So nobody can be totally free and say, I'm never going to be ill.

The body is a physical vehicle with a certain lifespan. And as it approaches the later stages of its lifespan, it's just like an old car. Things start to go wrong with it.

It's another form. And the older your car gets, the more things need to be replaced. And the time comes when it's just not working anymore.

So welcome or welcome back. And there's a chair here, which, as you may know, means it's time for one of our dialogues. And it's time for me to briefly incarnate as a talk show host.

And I always, I have to resist the temptation when people, when I have dialogue partners, when they come on stage, say, welcome to the show. I have not had many scientists as dialogue partners. I had Peter Russell, who is not a scientist, but who has a good scientific background.

But otherwise, I don't recall having, well, I had a conversation with Deepak Chopra, who also has, of course, a scientific background, but is not a scientist as such. And the reason may be that my science IQ is very low. It could be due to an undeveloped left brain, who knows?

Not only that, I know that I never do well, well, I only tried it once, to be honest. I never, I don't do well in IQ tests. But my consolation is that IQ tests do not measure the whole spectrum of intelligence, but only a very small segment of intelligence.

And basically, IQ tests are not how intelligent you are, but how good you are at IQ tests. So I have some books here. My guest today is a scientist, Lothar Schaefer, who was born in Germany, but has taught for, I believe, 40 years at the University of Arkansas as professor of physical chemistry.

And about maybe a year ago or so, I received this book that he wrote, not long ago, with a foreword by Deepak Chopra. And the title of the book is, "'Infinite Potential,' "'Infinite Potential.'" The subtitle is very interesting. It says, "'What Quantum Physics Reveals About How We Should Live.'" That's very intriguing, because nobody had thought of quantum physics as being able to reveal to us how we should live. So I get so many books sent, every month, manuscripts, books, and it's not even possible to read them all or even a few pages sometimes. So, and then when I travel, the books accumulate. And when I get back home, it's a huge pile.

And my intention is always that eventually I will get to it. And of course, then they pile up more and more. And that's one of my challenges.

But for some reason, I don't know whether it was Deepak Chopra having written a foreword, I opened it and immediately responded. Something within responded. And as I read, continued reading a few more pages, then I didn't start from the very beginning at first, but now, of course, I have read the whole book, even almost the whole book twice.

But when I first looked at it, I didn't start from the very beginning, but somewhere a little bit into the book, and I came across a passage that I want to read to you in a minute that sounded so similar to what I often say in talks. And I know that that's not where he got it. So I didn't get it from him and he didn't get it from me because when he wrote the book, he had never even heard of me.

So then obviously it was something that is produced like everything by the one universal consciousness that came to a realization and expressed it in a similar way. And I'll read that to you in a minute, but before that, just one brief look at another book he wrote a few years ago. It has a very interesting title, In Search of Divine Reality, Science as a Source of Inspiration.

Now, before you read this book, I think he would agree, I would highly recommend that you start with this book because this is more challenging. It's a very erudite and scholarly examination. It's wonderful.

My intention is to get my teeth into it this summer when I have plenty of spare time. So I'll be reading it, but I have opened it here and there and it's wonderfully fascinating. And for those who are familiar with the German language, there's a German version of it.

It's not exactly a translation. It's a reworking, it seems. And the title is somewhat different from the English title, Versteckte Wirklichkeit, which translates as hidden reality.

And the subtitle is How Quantum Physics Can Lead Us to Transcendence. Now I'll read that. This was one of the first things that jumped out of this book when I first opened it.

So this is a little passage that I will read to you. And then I will invite Lothar up on stage. He addresses here the interconnectedness of seemingly separate things.

You can think about this in the following way. If you've ever flown over an ocean or a large body of water, sometimes when the weather is right, you can see some white patches on the water below. Tiny white dots that suddenly appear like out of nothing, move around, one this way, one that way, and fade out of existence again.

It is really a beautiful sight and a fascinating play of forms, and it is easily understood. The white patches are the crests of waves in the agitated ocean. Now, here's the interesting thing.

You can't see these waves because you're too far up. You can only see the crests, but you have no doubt that the waves are there. You may even say that you know it.

And if anybody tried to tell you that the white spots on the water were some sort of big white fish, you would not believe it. Furthermore, when you see how each of the patches is going its own way and couldn't care less about what the others are doing, you can't be fooled into thinking that the waves are isolated, independent appearances, because you just know that the waves in an ocean are not independent, but conjoined in one giant movement of the whole. This is a useful experience because now when you look out into the world and see the things and people around you, you will not be fooled into thinking they are separate and independent appearances because you know that they are the patches on the surface of an agitated ocean, the ocean of potentiality.

In this non-material ocean, which seems alive and more mind-like than thing-like, the waves constantly build up to new empirical possibilities and perhaps even to new forms of thinking that may find consciousness in a human mind. After each transition from the possible to the factual, as one of the great pioneers of quantum physics, Werner Heisenberg, described it, the evolution of tendencies or possibilities for future actual events starts anew, but now from a different starting point than before, so that the universe is evolving. Physicist Hans-Peter Dürr, longtime coworker of Heisenberg's, has called this a learning process.

With the experiences that it makes through us, the cosmic potentiality is learning. It constantly manifests and reabsorbs. There is a continuous flux from the evolution of tendencies to their actualizations, empirical events, and from empirical events to new tendencies.

Each new state of potentiality carries in it, like a stigma, the memory of the last state. You are a white crest on the surface of this ocean. So the one manifesting through you, thinking through you, perceiving through you, then going back within and then re-emerging.

Wonderful image. Now, the interesting thing is that Lothar Schaeffer, our guest, did not arrive at this realization through going within, but going, examining matter and going so deep into matter where matter wasn't matter anymore. And so going, and he came to the same conclusion that mystics, or I myself, arrived at by going within.

Very interesting. Now, I'm going to ask him in a minute how that happened, the process by which he arrived at that conclusion. So I'd like to welcome Lothar Schaeffer.

He will come up here in a minute. We don't have any music to play while he comes up to the stage. And...

[Speaker 15] (4:39:04 - 4:39:09)
And... And... And...

[Speaker 1] (4:39:09 - 4:39:15)
And... And... And...

And... And...

[Speaker 4] (4:39:16 - 4:39:18)
Is it on?

[Speaker 1] (4:39:18 - 4:39:53)
Yes. Okay. So thank you for this wonderful book.

And you told me that, or you wrote to me, sometime after this book came out, somebody mentioned my name to you. And then you said, who is that? I guess I never heard of him.

But then you looked at a book and you saw certain similarities and you were surprised. And then I think you sent the book to me or the publisher sent it, but with a letter written by you.

[Speaker 4] (4:39:53 - 4:41:00)
Well, you know, it doesn't sound likely, but I didn't know of you. Well, you know, you hear names and so on, but I didn't know of you. And now I've nearly read all of your books and I'm thinking, how does it happen?

I mean, you have written things, and I can say before me that I've written, but I didn't copy them. You get the strong feeling of a connectedness. Yes.

And none that is under our control, but there is a mental background, spiritual background. And if you open your mind, you have to open your mind, then you can be connected. And then also you can be connected with different minds and so on.

This is in a way not classical science, because classical science was materialism.

[Speaker 1] (4:41:01 - 4:41:04)
And still is, this is materialism, right?

[Speaker 4] (4:41:04 - 4:41:15)
Yeah, the classical science. Classical science, in a way, has been found to be insufficient, but most scientists still are classical. They don't like the change.

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (4:41:17 - 4:41:29)
So despite all these discoveries in quantum physics, the mainstream science is really still, the philosophical foundation is the classical science.

[Speaker 4] (4:41:30 - 4:43:46)
Yes, the business is still. So, you see, in the beginning, Newton, he said, God in the beginning formed matter in solid, massive, hard, impenetrable particles. So very hard as never to wear or break in pieces.

Nature is lasting. It's materialism. The early French scientists, they said, there are two kinds of stuff, extended stuff and thinking stuff, but it had to be stuff.

And it was, of course, a progress compared to the terrible things that happened in the spiritual world before that. It was a liberation. Mm-hmm.

And it also led to development, led to technology, all the things we have. I mean, they developed within this framework up to 1900. And then was the beginning of quantum physics.

And quantum physics is a kind of idealism. It says that there is a part of the world that we cannot see, but it is real. But before that happened, physics became so successful then it entered biology.

And in the theory of evolution, having or not having stuff is the essence of life. If you don't get it, somebody else gets it. If he gets it, he eats you.

No, you get it, you eat him. And it has often been said, but I think it is wrong, science has nothing to do with ethics. No, if this is what the world is like, then having or not having stuff and being aggressive is what you should be.

That's a virtue. Somebody is a kind person, forget about him. He'll already be toast before he knows.

[Speaker 1] (4:43:46 - 4:43:50)
Yes, survival of the fittest.

[Speaker 4] (4:43:51 - 4:43:51)
Survival of the fittest.

[Speaker 1] (4:43:51 - 4:44:16)
And that becomes an underlying assumption, philosophical assumption that spreads. And even people who know very little about Darwin or his theory, it seeps into everybody's mind and as a substratum of their minds, there is that mindset, that philosophy.

[Speaker 4] (4:44:20 - 4:48:59)
And that in a way is still prevalent now. And it is what we teach our children. It is what we teach in schools.

Quantum physics says it is wrong. Why do we not teach quantum physics in high school? I don't know that it is conscious, but unconsciously, we don't want our children to know this.

We want them to become good consumers, not spiritual minds. It's bad for business. But quantum physics, quantum theory, also the extension to chemistry, quantum chemistry, is a sort of idealism because it says that the basis of the world is not things, but its forms, non-material forms.

If you, as science has done, pursue the nature of things of matter to the foundation, then all of a sudden you end up with elementary particles, molecules, electrons, and so on. And then all of a sudden something happens. When such, these things are particles, they have a certain mass and so on, it is constant.

But when they are on their own, like in a vacuum, they're never completely alone, but in a vacuum there are much fewer interactions. When they do not interact, when you have an electron and it doesn't interact, it vanishes, it becomes a wave. That wave is extended in space.

You can't see it. The thing leaves the empirical world. The wave doesn't have units of matter or energy.

It's just a form. It's a pattern of information. Out of this form, the particle can jump out again.

I'm not sure physicists know exactly where it gets the mass, maybe a Higgs field, and it doesn't matter. We can think that all material particles, all things are made of particles, all these particles came into existence like this. So the entire visible world is an emanation out of a realm of forms, ultimately.

The forms have no units of mass or energy. They're just information. We don't see them.

They appear to us as waves. So maybe we can think it's like an ocean, they're wave-like, but we don't really see, and that is also important because it says there is a part of the world that is non-empirical. We cannot see it.

Science cannot say anything about it. You don't know how mad scientists can get when I say something like that. That guy, it's like a traitor.

Because what does it say? It says there is a part of reality where science cannot enter. Science can deal with the empirical world, and yes, it deals with this very well.

You make experiments, you observe, you learn a lot. Then there is a part, the visible comes out of the non-visible. We can only guess or have like, blessed person like you have an inspiration.

We can say it probably consists of something that we have to call forms. Maybe there are waves, and when there are waves, we think they're hanging together like waves in an ocean. It means the hidden reality is a wholeness.

The forms are patterns of information, so you can think if there is information. Normally, information is meant for a mind. Does it mean there's a cosmic mind?

[Speaker 1] (4:49:02 - 4:49:12)
Would you compare what you call the forms to what in the human beings, also something that you cannot see, thoughts?

[Speaker 4] (4:49:13 - 4:50:01)
Are those the thoughts of the universe, those forms? Now you can start thinking. I've sometimes said this way.

In 1900, before the beginning of quantum physics, the age of classical physics, you could not believe in science, have a religious faith, and be logically consistent. At that age, it was stupid to believe in something. Now, I don't want to say it is not reasonable not to have a spiritual faith, but you can believe in science, in the order of the world, and have a spiritual conviction, and it is logically consistent.

Nobody can tell you what you have to think. I mean, that's up to you.

[Speaker 1] (4:50:20 - 4:50:34)
The love in the dog, that which has no form, their consciousness, and that can connect you with your own consciousness. That the consciousness is indestructible. The essence of the dog remains.

[Speaker 13] (4:50:38 - 4:51:06)
Hi, Eckhart. Hi, Eckhart. I wanted to ask you a question about my dog that we just had to put to sleep.

And I know we're talking a lot about the human, and dying, and being already dead, but we just can't reconcile with taking her life, you know? And I wonder if you could talk a little bit about that.

[Speaker 1] (4:51:13 - 4:51:22)
So you were present when the dog- Yeah, when she took her very last breath, and- And how was your state of consciousness while you were with the dog?

[Speaker 13] (4:51:22 - 4:51:54)
Really present, but... It just, her form just went so fast, and she wouldn't have never died. I mean, her will was so strong.

I mean, she was just tremendous, and we were being encouraged to do that. Just to not let her keep suffering. And I just, I mean, I think it's one thing to have your own life, but to take her life is just- Yes.

[Speaker 1] (4:51:55 - 5:08:52)
Well, you wanted to spare her this further suffering. That's the death, a body dissolving, a form dissolving, is painful, whether it's a human or an animal, because there's love there. Now, the love is, on the one hand, yes, there's a form.

Of course, you love to touch the dog. You love to hold the dog, to feel the dog's aliveness, the softness of it. But what you really love in the dog you can't see.

And I'm just, we're talking about dogs now, but we could talk about any life form, including humans, but let's talk about dog. What is it when you look into the eyes of the dog, and there is an inner response, an inner response, which is love? And this is why people, it's easier for many people to look into the eyes of a dog and feel love than it is to look into the eyes of a human and feel love.

There are millions of people who find it easier to feel love looking into the eyes of a dog. And that is because there's less in the way, when they look at the dog, there's less that obstructs the dog's connectedness with the source, which is the one. In humans, there's the mind in the way.

So many people find it harder to feel love when they look at a human being, perhaps they may have one or two with whom they do feel it, but many don't even have that. Why? Because in the other human, there is a screen of concepts and that activates your own screen of judgments and concepts.

And that prevents the flow and the realization of oneness from happening. The moment you look at a human, most humans are, we'll come back to dogs in a minute, but don't worry. Most humans are trapped in mental noise, continuous judgments in the mind, stories, judgments.

So if you could free yourself from that, it requires enormous presence for your own soul structures, not to become activated when you're looking into the eyes of a human being whose mind is very, very active. So that requires great presence and not many people have that yet. So they love, there are millions of people in this world whose only, the only being for whom they can feel love is their dog.

That's, you could say, oh, that's tragic, isn't it? Well, it's not tragic. At least they can feel love there.

At least, of course, it would be wonderful if you could feel love for humans also. A little bit more difficult, possible and necessary ultimately, but we know now what the barriers are. Once we know why we can't feel the love for humans, then we can do something, which is relinquish our judgments.

But it remains for the time being that dogs provide an access for many humans into feeling the connectedness with being. That is why I call them sometimes guardians of being, dogs, because they, when you look into the eyes of a dog, you feel that the dog's connectedness with the source. In a way, then, you could say the dog, or any animal really, is closer to the source than humans, closer to God.

Humans have gone further out into further differentiation and complexity. And there you have the dog, but there's enough consciousness in the dog to meet the human. The dog's already quite close to the human consciousness without having suffered yet the influx of conceptualization.

So that's the beauty of it. So what you love in the dog is not ultimately the external form. The love in the dog, that which has no form, their consciousness.

And that can connect you with your own consciousness. The consciousness is indestructible. The essence of the dog remains.

Where exactly it goes, I don't know. But it may go into the universal dog essence that underlies the divine idea of dog, Plato would have said something like that, or Socrates. It goes back to the source, the dog source.

We know that the formless essence of life is indestructible. And so you can sense as you are with that, what all the tears may be there, sadness may be there, you experience the dissolution of a life form. And the dissolution of a life form leaves, especially in the moment of death and a little bit after, leaves behind an open space in you.

And that open space is the formless. I sometimes describe it as, let's say here's the texture or the tapestry of your life with all its ingredients, people that you know, where you live. Let's imagine your life as a tapestry, intricate.

And one aspect, important aspect of the tapestry is the dog. There it is. And there the tapestry shows you petting the dog and feeling love for the dog.

And suddenly you're looking at this tapestry and suddenly the dog begins to dissolve in the tapestry. What's happening to it? It's dissolving.

There you were petting it and suddenly there's a little empty space in that tapestry. That's very painful. It's that the empty space is left to the body as the form has dissolved.

But what was the ultimate, what was it or what is it that gives life to this whole tapestry? What is it that makes it alive? What is it?

And that is behind it, there's a light and that shines through all the forms. In fact, it gets obstructed by the forms but it still can shine through somehow. And because the light shines through all the forms, it's alive.

I'm using the, continuing to use the analogy of tapestry. It feels it has an aliveness for the simple reason that the aliveness is given to all the forms by a light that shines through it, through the forms. Gets somehow obstructed by the forms but the obstruction of the forms creates a diversity.

So ultimately every life form obstructs the universal light but that gives it individuality. But some of the universal light still shines through. For a moment, let's use another analogy related to it which is the cinema film in the cinema projector.

When you put a film is put in the projector, I don't know whether they still do it but there's a film, there's a light behind the film and the film runs through the projector and that creates the images on the screen. Now, all the reality that these images on the screen ultimately have is the light behind the film. Without the light behind the film, there would be nothing happening there.

Now imagine a character in that, just we're taking this analogy a little bit further, almost too far, but let's do it. Let's imagine the characters in the film who are acting out their drama and conditioning with maybe a tragedy or a comedy or a mixture but the characters are all acting out their script, talking, let's say one of the characters suddenly becomes aware that what is my reality? There's a moment of cessation and he or she is not acting out the script.

He stops for a moment and can feel, he can suddenly feel that light shining through. Oh, I'm really that light. I'm not ultimately that character.

The light gives it, and so all the figures in the movie are ways of obscuring to a greater or lesser extent the light that comes through but their likeness is the light. Without the light, it's nothing. Okay, let's go back to the tapestry.

There we have a form has dissolved. Now at first, if you concentrate on the lack of what was there that was so lovely, then you get stuck on that level where you equate the loveliness and the love with the form that has dissolved. But if you go look more deeply, then you see that where that form was, there's actually now more light shining through.

And that happens when you completely surrender to the fact of death, whether it's a human or a dog, any form of life. When you completely surrender to the fact of death, then you're not just sad because the form has dissolved, that may still be there, but you also sense a deepening in yourself because you sense that where the form was, the light now shines through more fully. So the empty space that's left behind, this is why death is ultimately potentially always sacred.

There are remnants of this in ancient cultures when people see a dead body. In our culture, of course you don't because we hide them. When they see a dead body, they make a sign of respect, even if they disliked the person that just died.

But when the coffin comes past and it's open, there's a dead body, they show respect because there's some obscure recognition of the sacredness of death. Why is death considered sacred? Because when the form dissolves, the formless can shine through more strongly and then it can be transformative in you, but it requires surrender to the fact of death.

And so it can be a transformative thing, which doesn't mean you're not sad anymore. You're still sad because the form has dissolved. But if you go into complete acceptance of the fact of death, which is going to happen to you, this form, to this form, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this, each form is going to pop sooner or later.

Some sooner, some later, and leave behind. If you saw that in a speeded up version of life over the next 70 years, as we sit here, let's say we have a film camera that compresses. Let's see, we're not moving from here.

Another strange analogy. I'm trying to get some, to see something. That's why I'm doing all this.

Just hang on. Now, if we had a camera here, let's say we're staying here and instead of going about our lives, we just dream our lives over the next 70 years. Let's say the camera stays here for 70 years.

And instead of going about our daily life, we just dream that we are going about our daily life. It's basically the same thing, by the way. Because in the end you die and say, okay, what was all that?

So if you had that camera here, you would be amazed. Let's say it runs, it compresses 70 years into three minutes or five minutes. And you would then see the film.

Then you would see bodies dissolving one after the other. One here, one there. Gone.

All gone. It happens to all life forms. So we need to see that and face that fact of death.

To some it comes sooner than later. To some it seems premature. Sometimes it seems it's too soon.

The dog was not ready. I'm sure the dog was ready, but you were not. You were not ready for the dog's death.

For the animal, death is easier. The animal can surrender into it, although there is a will to live, yes. But the animal can surrender.

Surrender is the key. Death is universal. It's all around you, continuously.

Everything is dying around you and being born. Dying and being born. We don't seem to see that very clearly.

You may have to travel to India to get a true view of the fact of death because they burn the bodies out in the open. And anybody can just sit there and meditate. And you would just go, wow, wow.

First you'll cry and then you'll cry a bit more. But then after a while you come to, because we're talking about the realization of something in you that's beyond death. And that is what you loved in the dog and still love.

And that cannot go away. So let it become this meditation for you and a transformative experience. And let the tears still flow if they flow.

There's nothing wrong with that. But surrender to the fact of death and realize that only the form dies. That which gives life to the form is not subject to decay or death.

You can sense that in yourself. And then you can sense it in the dog. And then the death of the dog is not as heavy as it would be if you were only identified, if you equate the essence of the dog with the form of the dog.

So what you love in the dog is the dog's consciousness, which ultimately is one with your consciousness. It's life itself, an expression, a beautiful expression, temporary, of course, of the one life. And then you honor that and are grateful for that.

You also are that.

[Speaker 13] (5:08:53 - 5:08:57)
So it's best to honor the process of taking her life as well?

[Speaker 1] (5:08:58 - 5:57:15)
I mean, I think that's what bothers us the most. That was a compassionate thing to do. We feel so guilty.

Yes, but that's, again, that requires surrender and see that it came out of love for the dog, not any other reason. And it's therefore compassionate. Now, the mind will construct further thought processes out of that, but you don't need that.

People who are unaware of the true self within do not recognize this soul in them that is using the senses. As the senses are limited to the mind level, they are incapable of comprehending atma, which is above the mind. Now, Krishna, the personification of God here, explains a little bit more about human life, human existence, and says, I will now explain more about the individual soul, which is called jiva in Sanskrit.

I'm now using for one or two sentences, which I scribbled in here, this translation, which I thought was slightly better in this case. A spark of my eternal spirit becomes in this world a living soul, and it draws around its center the five senses and the mind. So this is, again, the divine God, the one consciousness talking.

A spark of my eternal spirit becomes in this world a living soul, and it draws around its center the five senses and the mind. A body comes into existence. The atma, which is a part of divinity, atma, a part of this God within, enters into a body in the womb before birth.

Thus, it enters the world of matter. And in this translation, it says, it draws around itself the five senses with the mind as the sixth sense. Now comes a very poetic way of looking what happens.

Like a breeze wafting the scent of perfume, the atma, when it migrates from one body to the next, carries with it the mind and the senses. So the atma is the consciousness, and it carries with it this scent of fragrance of previous existence. That means it brings along the intellect, the ego, the sense of being a separate identity, and the lower mind, thought mind, transferring thoughts and tendencies from previous lifetimes.

The individual soul, because it has drawn the senses around itself, experiences the pleasures, desires, and pains of the world. Now, important part comes now. People who are unaware of the true self within, the underlying atma, the underlying timeless consciousness, do not recognize this soul in them that is using the senses.

As the senses are limited to the mind level, they are incapable of comprehending atma, which is above the mind. The yogi, however, the yogi is the person engaged in spiritual practice or spiritual living. The yogi, however, possessing the eye of wisdom, the yogis, however, possessing the eye of wisdom, do see me, their atmic self, within.

The eye of wisdom. The translator here put in brackets, intuitive faculty. Now, this is according to the Bhagavad Gita, the faculty of becoming aware within oneself of that which is deeper than the person, it calls the eye of wisdom.

And the translator, to explain a little bit, as I said, put in brackets, the intuitive faculty. And really, this is what my teaching, it's not my teaching, it's just what it's all about, is of course, becoming aware of yourself as consciousness, so that there is the dimension, the timeless dimension suddenly is realized within you. And you do it at any moment by becoming aware that you are aware, like right now.

Can you become aware at this moment that there is a presence there, that you are awake, that there is an underlying presence, even when you're not thinking, without which you couldn't exist? There's an underlying aliveness, a presence, whatever you want to call it. You don't have to think to know that, in fact, it's only when there is a gap between two thoughts, you become aware that you haven't disappeared, or that you don't remember your personal history.

You don't even, at this moment, you don't even remember your name, you don't need it. But there is an essential aliveness or presence there. And that is the eye of wisdom that suddenly arises, knowing yourself as that.

You could also say, what's left of you when you stop thinking? Now, you can't think about that. The usual tendency when I ask a question like that, that seems difficult to comprehend is you start thinking about it.

So when I ask what's left when you stop thinking, then you might say, oh, I have to think about that. But that's never the answer. So there is that which has assumed form in you, which is the person with its history.

And there is that which is timeless and formless that underlies it all, that is actually the essence of your sense of identity, atman, and that is self-realization. It says here, to obtain this eye of wisdom, you must do two things, surrender your ego and purify your mind. And that is done, I would say, by realizing that you are not your mind.

Because if you're identified with every thought that comes into your head, as many humans still are, then basically you are your mind. And beyond the thoughts that go through your head, there is nothing else. That's all you know.

And the thoughts that go through your head are conditioned by your upbringing, by your past, by your environment, the country you live in, the time period you live in, your family background. All those things determine what kind of thoughts go through your head. And all those thoughts that go through your head habitually make up who you consider yourself to be.

That's a certain story arises in the mind, and that becomes the mind-made self. And that is the reality for most humans. And it's also a fact that for most humans, that is a very limited reality.

They don't realize how limited their worldview is, how limited all their opinions are. They don't realize that they're inhabiting these little presents in their minds. That's their reality.

And when you're totally trapped in your mind, then you create a lot of conflict because then you, all the other minds become like enemies to you. And then you can become an extremist, whether political or religious, or you just have a lot of conflict in your personal life. You're just totally stuck in your little, in your head.

Cannot recognize your connectedness with nature, your connectedness with other human beings. You're cut off by concepts, by thoughts. And so that's most people's reality.

And spiritual awakening is realizing that there is a dimension in you that is far deeper than that. And that here, according to the ancient teachings, it's Atma, which is the God within, the divine within, whatever you want to call it. And that's a liberation.

That's, even just having glimpses of that is liberating, that there's more to you than the little person that before was running your life. And with that, an intelligence comes into your life that is greater than the intelligence of your conditioned mind. And that's what all spiritual teachings are about.

I was putting away some clothes this morning, hanging up some clothes and folding something. And we talked yesterday about somebody asking a question about repetitive things. You get up in the morning, you do your repetitive tasks every day.

And most of one's life consists of little tasks. There's rarely anything big. And if there is, it doesn't last long.

What would be big? A wedding, a funeral, or in North America, Thanksgiving, turkey dinner, Christmas, a promotion, or suddenly they write about you in People Magazine, hopefully something good, or some big thing, you're going to talk or give a talk to a few hundred people. But even a seemingly big thing consists of just one little thing at a time.

Now, if you had the idea, this is just a little example. I'm coming back to the clothes in a little while. One could say that folding up clothes and hanging up shirts is an insignificant thing that one would only do in order to get somewhere else.

And in this case, if I thought, okay, I have to get this done because this really big thing is waiting for me there. All these people are waiting for me to talk, give a big talk. Then in the meantime, all the little things leading up to it would be regarded as something that you have to get out of the way or pay little attention to because I have this big thing coming up.

And then this big thing coming up is a mind form, would become a mind form, a big thing called, big people wanting me to say something significant, but who knows if I can say something significant. That would have led to not only not paying much attention to the little things, but also most probably to a sense of anxiety because the mind has created a big thing. Now, if I had that, then it would not be enjoyable to do what I do because if every time I got anxious before a talk, that would be dreadful.

I'd rather not do it. So why is there no anxiety? Because I realized that even a so-called big talk is consists of little things.

You approach it, you take, they pick me up in a buggy and then drive. And then I step out and then it's one step at a time. And then I sit in a little room for a few minutes and look around and breathe.

And then I come here, it's still one little step at a time. And then I sit here and then one word comes out and then another word comes out. It's just, that too is just small.

It's only the mind that creates differences and says, I'm waiting for the next big thing. And for other people, a big thing could be the next vacation they look forward to. In the meantime, they're just trying to get to that future moment or the next or getting married, looking for someone to get married, finding the right relationship.

That would be the big thing, wouldn't it? If I could find that, the partner, the ideal partner for me. And then you're looking towards that.

And in the meantime, little attention is paid to the intervening periods. But the strange thing is most of your life is the intervening periods. 95%, no 99% is something that happens while you wait for something else to happen.

And it's an unconscious way to live. So as I was folding up my clothes and I realized how extremely pleasurable the activity is and not because of the simple movements of putting it away, but there's an underlying stillness with it that goes with that. And so as you notice that, as you do little things, in other words, 90 something percent of your life, if you're aware, not only of what you are doing, of course, yes, that's part of present moment awareness is to give attention to what you're doing so that the doing is not just the me.

It's a means to an end. The greatest fallacy and big dysfunction in people's lives is that almost all they're doing is a means to an end. That implies future, of course, is a means to an end.

And unconsciously the end is regarded as more important than the means. But of course, the end, which is in the future, is always in the future. The moment it comes, it's the present moment.

But the mind pattern that has lodged itself firmly in people's minds is always that the next thing, and it's a thing that I really need to get to. So the moment the so-called future comes, it appears as the present moment. Something else almost simultaneously or very quickly afterwards, something else appears looming up in the so-called future.

Oh, I need to get there. Of course, there are things that you need to achieve and go towards and that involves time and so on. But if that absorbs almost 100% of your attention, or even if it absorbs 80% of your attention, that's you're out of balance.

Because if future absorbs 80% of your attention, you only have 20% of your attention left for the one thing that is ever real in your life, which is the present moment. So the present moment is just okay. That's why many, many people don't actually, very rarely feel really comfortable with the present moment.

It's rare for people to regard the present moment even in a friendly way. Many people live continuously in some kind of almost confrontational or denying relationship with the present moment. And then their entire life is then not aligned with the present moment, which is life itself.

Because the only place where life can appear to you is in the present moment. There is nothing else ever. And so your life is not aligned.

Your life with a small L is not aligned with life with a capital L. And that out of alignment creates an unhappy existence. And millions of people leading such an unhappy existence create an entire culture or civilization, every aspect of which reflects back to you that unhappy, basically unhappy state that all those millions are in.

So all the things that the culture produces, the civilization produces, the structures, the economic structures, political structures, educational and so on, they will contain these elements of that state of consciousness that created them. So that's the dysfunctional element in politics, in economics, in educational system, and so on. Which all that, all those things that you can see are not working very well because they are products of a certain collective state of consciousness.

And the collective state of consciousness is made up of millions of individuals that produces the collective state of consciousness. So if you try to tackle exclusively the products of that collective consciousness in the form of the economic structures, the political educational system, and so on, then you're working only on one end of the spectrum and it's not the causal, you're working on effect. And what you can do is limited.

There are, yes, you can initiate changes, but what is the state of consciousness in the individuals and in you as you try to initiate changes? So the causal is the individual so that the individual no longer lives in a way that produces unhappiness and is dysfunctional. This mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive.

To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. In the old consciousness, the predominant state is one of waiting for the next thing. And in the new consciousness, even when you're waiting somewhere, you're not really waiting, you're just being where you are.

And you can use every opportunity when there is an external waiting, you're waiting at the airline counter or bus, at the traffic light, at the supermarket, to meet somebody, you have an appointment, somebody to arrive, so much waiting. I read somewhere that the average person who learns, who starts driving at the age of 20 and drives a car every day throughout their lives, how they worked it out, I don't know, they spend, I believe, it was four or five days of their life waiting at the red light. If you sum it, add it all up, it's four or five days of your life, you spend waiting at the red traffic light.

And most people are not happy unless it's just one instance of waiting and so much, so many other occasions when you are waiting and mostly people are not comfortable with waiting. They get restless, uneasy, complain, they shouldn't be waiting. Well, maybe not, but you are waiting.

Things should be different if people only were more efficient and punctual and did their job properly and were aware of the time, but they're not. So whenever you're waiting, see if you can, your state of conscious can be one of just being present, enjoy being where you are. Start with a supermarket.

And if you once, if you notice the shift from the restlessness and discontent and complaining, the anger, even irritation with having to wait at the supermarket and then say, okay, is that a pleasant state? Do I really want, am I, is it possible to be here in a different way? Do I choose to be in that unpleasant state?

Am I forced to be in that unpleasant state? Is somebody forcing me to be irritated? No, I'm just irritated.

I can't help it. Well, that's just a thought that may not be true. I can't help it.

And then you realize that you can help it and you simply drop your irritation and come into the present moment. Irritation is just a thought. This should not be happening.

Or I'd rather be out of here than in here, but you're in here. And this is just a tiny thing, of course, but as we mentioned before, life is made up of tiny things. And if one tiny irritation is followed by another tiny irritation somewhere else and followed by another tiny irritation somewhere else, and every tiny irritation leaves behind something, an energy, and that gradually it builds up.

And then you get more prone to irritation and not just irritation, then add up 100 little irritations and then you become a potentially angry person. Who's just waiting for the next thing to be angry about. Hopefully you can find something to be angry about.

So you can just drop it. You drop it by realizing it's futile. You're actually creating it yourself.

It serves no purpose. There's an underlying assumption, and this is a childlike way of looking at the world or a childish way of looking at the world, an immature childish world that says, if I get really irritated, things are going to change. In the same way, a child might think if I cry hard enough, something will happen.

And of course, in the case of the child, often it is the case, and then the parents come running. But if you're an adult and you cry hard enough, not necessarily cry as such, but metaphorically speaking, unhappy, you believe the same thing is going to happen, but it's not. In fact, people run away from you.

They don't come and say, oh, you have that energy of get away from me. So it's practiced with those little things, so you can not only be free of irritation, you can also actually use those opportunities to be present. Then you're welcome every time you're waiting.

And if you don't succeed, that's okay occasionally, but you're welcome every time you go, oh. One very small anecdote happened to me recently. I was at a supermarket waiting, and the cashier was the slowest that I've ever seen, perhaps in my entire life.

And not only did she not know what she was doing, she also engaged every customer in a long conversation. And even I, who, is usually okay with these things, could feel a small amount of irritation creeping up. And then immediately I let it out and it went away, and then another one came.

But by the time I finally reached her, the irritation fortunately was gone, and I was present again. And when she saw me, she said, oh, I've been waiting to meet you all my life. And I was so glad that the irritation wasn't there anymore.

And she said also that she hadn't been there for very long, not worked there for a long time yet, so she's still learning. And she had recently moved back to Canada from after spending 10 years in Maui, Hawaii, where time is not so important, of course. People have a loose relationship with time, island time.

So that was an interesting encounter. So it can happen, irritation can still arise. If you don't catch it.

So you have to be alert so that you catch it before it takes you over. And then realize you don't want it. What for?

And it's gone. Related to that is unhappiness. A lot of so-called unhappiness is also a childish way of trying to change things.

By being as unhappy as you can about them. And the underlying unconscious or semi-conscious assumption is if I'm really unhappy, somebody, perhaps God, is going to do something about it, or I'm going to prove him wrong. I'm going to show him how dreadful it is.

And then finally, this is an unconscious assumption behind the unhappiness, because you believe if you're habitually and frequently unhappy, you believe that it has a purpose. It's an underlying assumption. Perhaps you wouldn't verbalize it in that way, but you believe that it works for you.

Of course, it doesn't, but things are going to change. But just need to be really unhappy so that God finally, even if you don't believe in God, this can still be the mechanism, the underlying unconscious assumption behind it. It's something that's going to happen.

And of course, the opposite is true, because the more unhappy you are with something, the more you are stuck in the situation. There are some patterns in the mind that everybody inherits that even for advanced presence practitioners like yourselves can still reassert themselves because they are so normal. Well, by the way, my definition of normal is insane, as you probably know.

And you may be able to catch yourself many times during the day when this normal, one of these normal patterns reasserts itself and of course, one of the most prevalent patterns is reducing the present moment to a means to an end. It could be a simple thing like you get up in the morning and you're getting ready to go to work. What, how, what is the quality of your doing during that time of getting ready to go out?

Or here, you got up this morning, getting ready to go to breakfast and then come here. Here, how do you experience that time? Are you able to be present in what you're doing or is the doing no more than a means to an end?

And that's a huge difference, whether you, this, will you fold your pajama after, and put it on your bed? Is that, do you give it attention? Is it a pleasant thing to do?

Do you acknowledge the being of this pajama and feel the texture and give it some loving attention and then you put it away? Or is it, what's the next thing? And the next and the next, because I need to get, I need to, if you're not, you may, if you don't, this habit is always there.

The present moment is a stepping stone that not much more than a stepping stone to the next moment, which is always a mental projection because it never comes. The next moment never comes. Does it?

No, I don't think it does, because when the next moment comes, it's the present moment. So the next moment doesn't come, it can never arrive. There's only this moment.

But if your habit is to treat this moment most of the time as a means of getting to the next moment, so not being fully in it, but mentally being somewhere else, and then I just need, so the basic attitude is, I just need to get this moment out of the way. Then I will get to a better one. And that is a very deep-seated pattern that prevents you from being present.

But it's only when I voice it like this that it becomes apparent to you, because otherwise you won't even see it because it's so normal to live in such a way that unconsciously, it's not, you don't tell yourself in your mind that I just need to get this moment out of the way because the next one will be better. That is an unspoken and unconscious assumption behind what you do. And it's not only, people also treat entire life periods in that way.

Then it's not only, of course, most fundamentally the present moment, but they also treat entire chunks of their life in that way. For example, you're waiting for the weekend. So it's only two more days of having to go to work.

And then there comes, or you're waiting for something else. Getting a better job. Finding the person who is going to make me happy.

And in the meantime, I'm just ticking over. It's just, I'm just waiting for, well, what's the expression? I'm waiting for the big break or whatever.

I'm waiting for the big thing to happen. And finally I can start living when that happens. Whatever form that takes, when that happens, then my life will really start.

And that's another way, another manifestation of the same dysfunction. Reducing an entire chunk of your life to a waiting room. And so for many people, they're almost their entire life with very brief episodes, often connected to falling below, thinking with brief episodes of little bit of relief.

They live in a waiting room and this somehow, I don't know if anybody remembers, it's probably not popular anymore. There used to be a genre in theater that was called the theater of the absurd. Samuel Beckett and other authors.

And often they showed, there was a famous play called Waiting for Godot. And there are two men waiting for this guy to arrive with a, nobody knows who Godot is, but they spent the entire play, it's a theater play, the entire play, they're waiting. Godot, who knows some critics say, well, Godot, God, Godot, they're waiting for God, but it's not set.

But the entire period is spent waiting. And I don't think Godot ever arrives. And they're similar.

And this is just to show the absurdity of ultimately everyday life. So you have to be really vigilant to see whether, either as concerning the present moment, reducing the present moment to a means to an end. And if you do that habitually, chances are that you also reduce huge chunks of your life to a means to an end or a waiting room.

And of course, sometimes life does get better. Of course, it doesn't, if you are now living in unpleasant surroundings, perhaps it's noisy or it's cold, too cold or too warm or cramped or whatever it is, you have might have a job that's repetitive. You're waiting to get out of that, feel lonely.

One relationship has come to an end. The other, another one hasn't started yet. I'm just waiting.

And so you're hoping that things will get better. And sometimes they do get better, but the habit pattern is deeply ingrained. And even if the situation gets better, then you'll be waiting for something else because no situation can ever completely satisfy you.

No person, no condition, no situation. Waiting for retirement. I can maybe take early retirement.

And then what? Play golf. Lie on the beach.

And many people are very disappointed when they retire and don't know what to do with themselves. And they lose their sense of identity that they, it was always a false sense of identity, because it is derived from their function, but at least they had a false sense of identity. And now they don't, I won't have any.

And then to happen, they can't, they don't know the possibilities of human life. So be vigilant. If you feel that an improvement is highly desirable in your life situation, that's okay, but it's much more likely to happen if you give more attention to the present moment rather than trying to get away from the present moment or denying it, always making it into a means to an end.

If you give more, your fullest attention to this moment, the so-called future is much more likely to improve the so-called future, because there is no future. When it comes, it's the present moment, a little strange paradox different.

[Speaker 6] (5:57:47 - 6:00:37)
I want to welcome you to the first ever Google Plus Hangout with Eckhart Tolle. He will spend the next hour answering questions on awakening and living with greater presence and purpose in modern life. Before we begin, we're going to take a short period of silence.

So I'm going to invite you to sit comfortably. You can either close your eyes or keep your eyes open and focus your attention on the breath as it comes in and out of your body, or simply focus your attention on the feeling of presence and aliveness. We'll take about one to two minutes now, and then we'll begin.

Welcome again to the first ever Google Plus Hangout with Eckhart Tolle. Eckhart Tolle is a spiritual teacher who is the author of numerous books, including The Power of Now and A New Earth. He's one of the great spiritual teachers of our time who is currently offering his teachings through Eckhart Tolle TV, an online community dedicated to putting into practice the teachings and exploring what it means to live and embody a new earth.

We are also joined today by people from around the world who will be asking questions and engaging with Eckhart, and we're very happy for you to join us. So I'm particularly happy, Eckhart, that you have taken the time to be here with us today for this unique experiment.

[Speaker 1] (6:00:38 - 6:00:41)
Nice to be here. Welcome, everybody.

[Speaker 6] (6:00:44 - 6:00:59)
Before we begin with questions, I'd like to introduce the group of speakers that we have from, again, all over the world. So we will begin with Angelica. Angelica, would you please introduce yourself?

[Speaker 9] (6:01:00 - 6:01:15)

Hi, my name is Angelica. I live here in Germany, in Freiburg. I come originally from the Dominican Republic in the Caribbean.

That's why the name Angelica is a Spanish name. Very nice to be here.

[Speaker 6] (6:01:15 - 6:01:16)
Thank you.

[Speaker 7] (6:01:23 - 6:02:18)
Dale? Hi, everybody. Welcome to this Hangout.

Isn't this fantastic that we can all be here together? Many thousands of you, I'm sure, watching. I'm in South Australia, as you can see from the flag behind, right across the other side of the world from Vancouver, where Eckhart is at the moment.

I first discovered Eckhart's teachings when I was riding a hand cycle because I'm in a wheelchair and I can't move my legs. I was riding a hand cycle all the way across Australia, from Melbourne to Darwin. And Eckhart's audio book, The Power of Now, popped up on my iPod somehow and I synced it to my computer.

So I started hearing this wonderful man speak and here I am today. That was about four years ago or so. So yeah, I'm very happy to be here and it's great to meet everyone.

[Speaker 6] (6:02:19 - 6:02:24)
Thank you, Dale. Jan, would you introduce yourself, please?

[Speaker 10] (6:02:25 - 6:04:12)
Yes, my name is Jan. I live in Phoenix, Arizona. Was born in Columbus, Ohio and moved here when I was two years old.

So I've lived in Phoenix most of my life. The way I was, the universe brought me Eckhart's work after going through quite a lengthy time of emotional difficulties. I went to the Health Institute in San Diego just for survival.

And while there, I went to their bookstore and picked up a book off the shelf called The Power of Now. And during one of my classes at the Health Institute, they asked, what is the most important book in your life? And I said, well, The Power of Now.

And I still say that. However, when I first picked it up and took it back to my room to read it, I had to lay it down and say, I have no idea what this man was talking about. However, what I did is I went and I bought the audios, brought them home with me, and I left them play in the background over and over and over until there was space in me to receive what I was hearing.

Then I experienced the changes in my being and discovered that there was another way to live. And I was so happy. So I'm still with Eckhart after six years.

His work and his contribution to this planet, I am so grateful for. And he doesn't know it, but he even assisted me in helping me care for my mother for six years who had Alzheimer's. To that, I'm all so grateful.

Thank you, Eckhart. Thank you. Thank you.

Thank you. Pam.

[Speaker 8] (6:04:13 - 6:05:36)
Hi, my name is Pamela Peterson, and I'm one of the lucky people that, for some strange reason, Eckhart thought we had a good question. I've been a fan of Eckhart since about nine years ago when my mother, who passed away last year, introduced me to his book. She was a very metaphysical and spiritual person, and I've been involved in that.

That's interested me since my 20s. And so it was at a difficult time in my life, and Eckhart, thank you. You helped me get through that very, very well.

And I needed you again this year, and pulled out my old copy, and also found the CDs. And I agree with Jan, the tapes are great. The audio books are wonderful.

That really brought it home to me in a better way. And it was this January, when I was listening to the tapes, I decided to see if you had a website, because it's been a long time. And I found Eckhart Tolle TV, and it said, ask a question.

And I thought, wow, I've had this question about, to ask Eckhart, and so I did submit the question. Quickly, I live in Florida. I am from Chile originally, and I've been in the United States since 1979.

I knew Angelica was Spanish when she said Angelica. So that was cute. But I'm now living in Florida, and thank you for having us.

And thank you, I hope some of my family and friends are watching. So hello to everybody.

[Speaker 15] (6:05:37 - 6:05:38)
Wafa?

[Speaker 5] (6:05:39 - 6:06:43)
Hello everyone, hello Eckhart. My name is Wafa. I come originally from Jordan.

However, I moved 12 years ago to the United States. So right now I'm sitting here in Indiana. I began observing the mind and becoming conscious of thoughts several, many years ago.

A business mentor suggested that to me. In 2008, I became acquainted and I started to know about Eckhart through Oprah's web class, which I became, I'm very, very grateful for. That took me and took my practice of awareness to a total new level.

And I have to say, this is what happens when you begin observing and watching your thoughts and feeling your body. Eckhart comes and visits you at home or something as wonderful. So I am very grateful for everything.

I'm very grateful for this occasion. And I'm very happy that Eckhart continues to be open to accommodate new technologies such as Google Plus and Google Hangout. So thank you everyone for having me and I'm looking forward to our conversation today.

[Speaker 6] (6:06:46 - 6:07:24)
And my name is Soren Gordhammer and I host something called the Wisdom 2.0 Conference, which looks at how do we use, live wisely and purposefully in an increasingly digital age. And I think this is a good example, I hope Eckhart, of technology and wisdom coming together and using technology to serve awakening versus using technology to limit consciousness and increase the pain body. So I'm happy to be here as well.

I think we'll start out with Dale from Australia since I believe you're the furthest away. Your question for Eckhart, please.

[Speaker 7] (6:07:25 - 6:07:40)

Thanks Soren. Eckhart, my question is from presence, I have been helping my young son to recognize his thoughts. And do you think he can truly identify his egoic thoughts at this age?

He is four years old, Eckhart.

[Speaker 1] (6:07:42 - 6:07:54)
Okay, can you give an example of how you do that to help your son become aware of his thoughts? Can you give us a practical example of what that looks like in practice?

[Speaker 7] (6:07:55 - 6:09:59)
Certainly, at any time he may be playing, he may be grumpy, he may be really happy. So at various times, I ask him, what are you thinking at the moment? What's in your mind?

And he says, ah, there's not much in my mind at the moment, daddy. Sometimes he draws me a picture and I say to him, what was in your mind when you drew that picture? And he says, nothing.

He says, when he's grumpy, grizzly, frustrated, bored, and he's moaning, I say, what is in your mind now? And he says, ah, lots of things are in my mind. And so there seems to be some direct correlation that when he's content and peaceful, that there is some smaller amount of noise, and he can identify that at the moment.

And in fact, Eckhart, I've been able to see a direct correlation with when, particularly when he's unhappy and really frustrated, and he's angry at me, really angry, I will say, just watch, where is that coming from? Is it coming from here or is it coming from here? And I have a picture of a face with some eyes looking upwards to a space above the eyes, and I say, what's in here?

And he says, I'm not doing that, daddy. No, I don't care, I don't like you. You're not my friend.

But he goes away, or I leave him there at that place, and I retreat out of it carefully, and I just say, that's okay, that's okay. And then 30 seconds to one minute later, he comes back and he says, it's all gone now, daddy. So it's really quite, I see the difference in him, and I was just wondering what might be happening there.

What do you think? Well, that's wonderful that you're able to do that, and it's working, obviously. He doesn't, your child does not need to differentiate between egoic or non-egoic.

The main thing is that awareness is arising by asking him the question, by making him aware of what kind of thoughts are going through his mind, and he's already beginning to do it for himself. So this is a great example for everybody, because it happens so quickly these days that children get completely taken over by the mind. So you're doing wonderful work.

Don't, as you probably know, you don't need to bring in the word ego at all. What really matters is that awareness is arising, and awareness is a space of consciousness that is deeper than thought. Thought arises within the space of awareness.

Now, most people don't know that. They are not in touch with that dimension. It is as if that dimension didn't exist for them.

All they know is the thoughts that they are continuously identified with, and what you are doing, I hope soon will become one of the main things that children learn at an early age at school. It would be, I would say, the most important subject to learn at school before anything else. And of course, together with everything else, it's to learn what awareness is and to experience awareness in oneself.

So it's just, you're doing wonderful work here. Just one more question to you. The pain body, which is what I call the pain body, is an accumulation of emotion that builds up in humans.

And I would say humans already come into this world with a greater or lesser degree of pain body. So that is closely linked to the thought activity in the head. So does your son have pain body episodes?

Perhaps a little bit of that you mentioned when you said, I don't want to, I don't like you right now. And of course, at that moment, who is it that is speaking? It is the pain body, which is the emotional aspect of ego.

So I sometimes recommend that parents also find a way for children to observe that deeply negative emotion that can arise in them. Sometimes it could be a temper tantrum or whatever. And when it has subsided, you ask the child, what was that that came into you then?

What did it feel like? What would it look like? How would you draw an image of that so that an awareness arises there also?

So what is your experience with the pain body with your child?

[Speaker 7] (6:13:22 - 6:14:44)
Yes, when he hurts someone unintentionally, so when he makes a mistake and he might poke someone in the eye, or he might tread on the dog's tail and the dog might yelp, he takes that incredibly personally. He's a very caring little boy. And when he hurts someone like that, it's like he can't handle that.

It's like this embarrassment, like there is immense pain that comes immediately to the surface, and he can't deal with that. He then gets very angry at the whole environment that he's in. And I really feel for him compassionately.

And that brings me to immense presence. If I'm off with the pixies somewhere else, it makes me, hey, it's okay. And I just put my hand out and I say, it's okay, it's okay.

And he said, no, I don't want anything, anything. I said, it's fine. No one is hurt.

No one is angry. Just watch, just watch. It's okay.

And I calm it right down. And he goes through that pain. You can see him go through it.

You can see his energy change. And then he bursts out of it. You can see it within three seconds.

He comes out of it like he's surrendering, like that pain body has been identified and it disappears.

[Speaker 1] (6:14:45 - 6:15:16)
It just fizzles away. So yes, that's a good question. He does have that happen.

Yes, wonderful. So it's a great blessing for the child to have a conscious parent. I didn't have that benefit.

My parents did the best they could according to their level of consciousness and I'm grateful to them, but they were not conscious parents. And I think many people, especially my generation can say that, that they probably did not have conscious parents. It's a wonderful blessing.

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you, Eckhart.

Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (6:15:20 - 6:15:24)
Pamela from Florida. Pamela Peterson, would you like to be next?

Sure. As I was saying earlier, I had my first encounter with Eckhart nine years ago and it helped me greatly. I was reading the book, The Power of Now, which I think was your first book that explained your experience that you had a very painful experience that brought you this awakening and enlightenment and an understanding of life the way I see it that is just incredible.

And so I had forgotten about it a little bit through the years and again picked it up this year when I felt I needed it again and got into it more deeply with the tapes and again went to the website. And as I was listening to the tapes and was thinking about you and about how you came to all this knowledge and real quickly, the book talks about the power of now in essence for anybody that hasn't read it, the power of now has to do with living in this moment right now, not in the past or in the present or in the future, in the present. So it occurred to me that what does Eckhart, if he felt the guru of living in the moment, what goes through Eckhart's mind every second of the day when the key is, the secret of this enlightenment is to just really live in this minute and not think about the future of the past.

So what's going through your mind every second of the day? Are you, you're human also, are you able to control the mind chatter better than most of us or is it a battle for you every day too?

Well, it's not a battle anymore. I'm glad to say a lot of the time I walk around and do things and in the background, there's just a spacious presence and some thoughts of course arise, sometimes thoughts that are not particularly interesting. The thoughts no longer draw me in, thoughts that come like clouds, that you have a blue sky and then clouds come drifting past.

I'm mostly, I feel that I am the sky rather than the cloud. So people who are not yet disidentified from thought, they are every cloud that goes past that draws in their attention completely and then they follow it where it wants to take them and that leads to more clouds, so to speak. So I don't have that anymore, fortunately.

Sometimes, of course, you have to use your mind when certain practical matters need your attention and there's no problem with that. You apply the mind to a specific area and see what is it that needs to be done now. But it's amazing how much one can actually do without too much mental interference that you can start, I recommend that by the way as a spiritual practice, one of the main spiritual practices, one is the developing the ability to perceive things that are around you without unnecessary mental labeling.

Everybody can practice that and it's actually not that difficult. You just look around and feel rather than you as a person immediately interpreting things and having a mental commentary about what it is that you're perceiving, instead of that, you are simply a conscious presence and as conscious presence, you perceive the world without needing to interpret it and yet you are not totally ignorant in that state. There is actually a deeper intelligence that comes in and that then operates in your life and one aspect of that deeper intelligence is it appreciates deeply what it is perceiving and listening to and looking at.

So as the deeper intelligence comes in, with that comes a deep appreciation of the aliveness of life that is all around you, including other human beings. And so to know these things, there is a knowing there and this is how I experience it on a daily basis and how many people also are beginning to experience their daily life. There is a knowing there that is non-conceptual.

So when you look at another human being, you can know that human being without having any concepts in your mind. There's a deep connectedness that comes with everything that you're perceiving when you're not continuously compulsively labeling it mentally, which is I call it the voice in the head that comments on all your life experiences, which of course is the conditioned mind. And very often for many people, the commentary is negative.

It's the conditioned mind dwells more in the negative than the positive because when something really positive arises, the mind subsides and you go, oh wow, isn't that beautiful or that's lovely or you feel love or you feel joy. And you observe when you feel joy, there isn't much thinking at that moment. So thinking is fine when you need it.

So I walk around a lot of the time in just being present with what is and accepting, this is part of it of course, accepting the present moment as it arises. It is always not really problematic. If a challenge comes, it's addressed.

So it's a very kind of childlike way of perceiving things with an added dimension to it, an added dimension of depth and knowing. A very lovely way of being. The first time that happened to me, of course, as I describe it in the introduction to the power of now, is that night when I disidentified from the mind and I woke up in the morning and I looked around.

That was the first time when I had a real experience of that. I looked around the room and I suddenly saw everything is so alive and beautiful. But there was very little thinking anymore.

And so there was a peace in the background. And that kind of has stayed with me since then, although the intensity of it can vary, but it's always there somehow. And it's lovely for most people, this is a gradual realization that one can live in that way.

May I just ask you, what is your experience of your mind on a daily basis?

[Speaker 8] (6:22:05 - 6:22:30)
I'm definitely not where you are, and I would love to be there someday. I always say that I would love to be Zen-like. I've been saying that for years, which means that things just come by and go and I just perceive them, but they don't affect me, and that would be wonderful.

But I'm still stuck a little bit in the mind chatter, but I'm more aware of it today. I'm more at peace because I don't give it as much importance.

Yes, thought loses the ability to draw you in totally, so it no longer has that gravitational pull or the seductive power that it usually has, and there's a little bit of spaciousness that arises. And this is really the most important thing. So I'm glad, with a little help by the way, to anchor you in that state of presence, as I point out in The Power of Now and other places, to anchor you in the state of presence.

It is helpful to feel the aliveness inside your body as you are going around and perceiving things and even doing things. And even as we sit here right now, everybody can experience it for themselves as we sit here right now. We can be aware of what's going on there.

You can see me or whoever is there on the screen. You can hear the words. You're peripherally aware of the room that you're sitting in.

And at the same time, you can actually feel the aliveness that pervades your entire body, that your hands are alive inside, your legs, your feet. The entire body feels alive. So some of your attention moves from thinking into the sensing of that global field of aliveness inside you, which you cannot see, but you can sense it.

That is the life that which animates the body and that can serve as an anchor. And so from there, you can then perceive things without unwanted, unnecessary interference of old conditioned thinking. So it's always a great help to inhabit the body that keeps you present.

[Speaker 8] (6:24:22 - 6:24:40)
I will just say quickly that it really is a moment to moment awareness and knowing what you have to do. It's homework. And eventually, hopefully it becomes more of a natural thing like it is for you, but it's something that it's an everyday, every moment we have to be focusing on living quietly in this moment.

[Speaker 1] (6:24:40 - 6:25:21)
That's right. Yes, it becomes a practice. Once you've had your first glimpses, then you're able to, by choice, invite that presence into your life.

And by choice, you can then take attention when you don't need to think particularly, and especially when you notice thinking is becoming negative or dysfunctional, in other words, creating unhappiness inside you, when the moment you notice that, your choice can be to take attention into the present moment by becoming aware of your inner energy field, and then becoming aware of sense perceptions around you. And immediately you've stepped out of the old conditioned thinking.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (6:25:23 - 6:25:24)
Thank you, Eckhart.

[Speaker 6] (6:25:25 - 6:25:33)
Jan, I think this might be a good time for your question. Jan from Arizona, would you like to ask that now?

[Speaker 10] (6:25:34 - 6:25:55)
Okay. Yes, I'm Jan in Phoenix. And my question for you today, Eckhart, would be this.

I'm separated from my husband, and I live alone, and I can't stop myself from crying at times. What can I do to stay in the present moment and avoid these feelings?

[Speaker 1] (6:25:56 - 6:26:00)
How long have you been separated from your husband?

[Speaker 10] (6:26:00 - 6:26:01)
38 years.

[Speaker 1] (6:26:02 - 6:26:03)
Sorry, how many?

[Speaker 10] (6:26:03 - 6:26:03)

Okay. Now, once a feeling is there, then instead of attempting to avoid it, it's better to simply allow it to be there so that you'll become the space for whatever feeling happens to be there. But it's important to observe whether there is a link between those emotions that arise in you and certain thought processes in your head.

And it's only you can be the observer of your mind. Perhaps, in some cases, people don't even know that many emotions that they experience are actually caused by certain thoughts in their head. Let me ask you, do you know whether certain thoughts tend to bring up those emotions and the weeping that you periodically experience?

What kind of thoughts tend to be associated with that in your mind? Okay, a little bit.

[Speaker 6] (6:27:24 - 6:27:26)
Jan, did you hear the question?

[Speaker 1] (6:27:26 - 6:30:15)
I think Jan is frozen at the moment. But let me just, until she comes back, let me just talk a little bit about that because it's something that applies to many, many people. What tends to happen is that certain thoughts come into your head that tell you a story about yourself.

And, for example, the thoughts that you are lonely now, that you are alone, that you have, I have nobody. Let's just, let me be the thoughts for a moment. I have nobody in my life.

These people are all happy with their partners. No, I'm alone. He has left me or I left him, and now I probably won't find anybody anymore.

And why do I have to be so alone? And you begin to feel self-pity, and you begin to feel really lonely because you are creating a story in your head about yourself and that story is what makes you unhappy. And there's nothing wrong really with being alone as long as you don't have a story around it because being alone can also be a great opportunity for becoming present in the moment.

So that's the difference of being lonely and experiencing solitude. Lonely is a state that nobody would want to experience. That means lonely means I am lonely, usually means I'm alone and I don't like it because I have a story in my head around it that tells me that that's a negative thing.

So a self, this is of course egoic thinking, a self, an image is created in one's mind. That's me. And this me image is reinforced by continuous further thinking.

And in many cases, that me image in the mind, which is the egoic self image, in many cases, it's an unhappy one. It's an unhappy story. And that was my case, my identity.

I lived with an unhappy sense of self for many years that made me anxious and depressed, a deeply unhappy self, but I was so identified with those thoughts that made up that unhappy sense of self. I didn't know that there was a deeper dimension in you that had far deeper than any thoughts going through my head until that night. So is Dan back now?

Can you hear me?

[Speaker 15] (6:30:15 - 6:30:15)
Yes.

[Speaker 1] (6:30:16 - 6:30:40)
Okay, you disappeared for a moment. And I wanted to ask you, are there certain thoughts in your head that tend to occur as these emotions arise in you, the sadness and so on? Do you know whether there are certain thoughts that tend to be associated with those feelings and emotions?

[Speaker 10] (6:30:41 - 6:30:43)
Yes, and they're extremely subtle.

[Speaker 1] (6:30:44 - 6:33:12)
Yes, yes. And I'm very aware to... So you recognize they're very subtle.

This means you need to be very alert to catch those thoughts and identify them as not the truth, but a story about your life and about who you are and about what has happened to you. So those thoughts tend to, you construct a little story about me, the lonely one, self-pity perhaps arises as part of that. And if you're not very alert, then the thoughts take you over.

In other words, you believe in every thought that arises, you become the thought, this is called self-identification with thinking, and then you become an unhappy me, an unhappy self, and the emotions then come. And so if you catch those thoughts, and as you say, they're very subtle, as they arise, you say, oh, there goes another one of those thoughts. And then you realize it is not a helpful thought and it's not even the truth.

The truth is simply that you are here, there's nobody else around, and there's no problem with that. Actually, it's a wonderful opportunity. As I said earlier, you might not have heard it.

It's a wonderful opportunity for being just totally present in the moment. You're not, aren't you lucky, you're not being distracted by some husband who wants this or that, and has his demands. So life has given you an opportunity to be free of that, and use that opportunity to inhabit more deeply, not only the inner body, but the present moment, so that you experience the aliveness of life that happens around you every moment, instead of identifying with some old thoughts in your head and becoming a story in your head.

So it's a, use the opportunity of being alone for your presence practice. There are millions of people who wish they were alone. And of course, when they are alone, they wish they were with somebody else.

So half of the people are unhappy in their relationship, and the others are unhappy because they're not in a relationship.

[Speaker 6] (6:33:13 - 6:33:23)
So I think we might've lost her, but we'll see if she comes back. But Eckhart, this is a little bit different than trying to re-fame a good story around the experience. Would you say that?

[Speaker 1] (6:33:24 - 6:34:24)
Yes, that's a good point. There's nothing wrong with improving a story and saying my life is actually quite good compared to other people. Look at those people, they're far worse off than I am.

That's another story that kind of makes it feel, feels a little bit better. But I would say that's fine as a transitional step if you want to do that. But I'm here pointing to the possibility of actually going beyond any story so that you don't exchange a happy story for a good one.

Are you able to just step out of any story and just be the conscious presence in your life, the conscious presence that is your life, be there as a conscious presence, then some thoughts may still arise out of that, but they tend to be happy thoughts. But it's not that your happiness is not caused by the happy thoughts. The happy thoughts are caused as they come out of the state of presence.

Yeah, yeah.

[Speaker 6] (6:34:25 - 6:34:34)
And so even if the external world is reinforcing a certain story, good or bad, you don't necessarily have to have your being identified with that.

[Speaker 1] (6:34:35 - 6:34:38)
That's right, yes, yes, yes, absolutely, yeah.

[Speaker 6] (6:34:39 - 6:34:55)
So we'll see if she's able to come back, but I think we should probably move on to Wafa Lababina, and she can probably pronounce her name better than I can, who is in Indiana. Welcome, Wafa.

[Speaker 5] (6:34:56 - 6:38:24)
Thank you, welcome again, sir, and thank you. And I forgot to mention, thank you for your work, for bridging technology with consciousness and reminding us that we can put it at the service of consciousness versus only at the service of ego, as we might have seen in the past. So thanks, I greatly appreciate your work.

I already checked it out, and it's fabulous. And my last name is Lababne. You said it right the first time.

Eckhart, as I mentioned, I began deliberately to become aware of my thoughts many, many years ago at the suggestion of a business mentor who said, who would just say, just become aware of your thoughts, watch your thoughts, and that's what's it. There was nothing more. So for many years, I became aware of my thoughts, the process, I'm pretty sure you are well aware of the process, that was fascinating, scary at the beginning, confusing at times, but as I began to become aware, many realizations occurred, realizations.

Naturally, I started writing, because I'm a writer since I was a child, I always write, and I document, and I have a scientific nature, so I tend to write everything. Years later, I decided to write a book about conscious consciousness, because, and I like to call it that and not say presence, just to make sure that I am precise, I am aware of my awareness, which are moments that don't come yet so often in my life, but they come at least once or twice a day, which is a great achievement. As I began to write the book and collect my thoughts or the observations through the years, friends, family members, at some point an author and a person, a CEO of a publishing house, suggested that I write my story.

They all had the same thought patterns, the same rationalization or logic behind it, which is so that people can relate, so it can reach a wider audience, and it gives us credibility. I'm relatively young, and people always kind of like, well, what am I gonna learn from a young person? I had great resistance for that initially.

I see their logic, I agree with it, I understand it, but every once in a while, and I started to write, put memories and start to do the work to integrate the realizations with the life story, but every once in a while, a thought would come and say, but do you really have to tell the story? Eckhart didn't tell his life story. So my question to you is twofold.

Number one, do I really have to tell the story so that people can relate? And number two, if I do, how can I tell the story without energizing the ego and triggering the pain body? The story is filled, since age two, the story was filled with trauma, violence, many things.

Of course, there were always doses of love, as I call them, and joy, and glimpses of joy here and there kept me alive. However, the numerous stories of trauma are there. So if you're going to tell the story, you have to say what happened.

So how can I tell the story? If you think it's necessary so people can relate, how can I say it without energizing the ego and most importantly, triggering the pain body? Some people may have trauma, and I want to contextualize it in a way that it doesn't just provoke the pain body and then good luck.

[Speaker 1] (6:38:25 - 6:42:29)
Yes. Thank you. Yes, thank you.

I do believe that it is helpful to connect with the reader. It is helpful to actually tell the story. I often, of course, I get many books and manuscripts sent to me, far more than I can read and sometimes even look at.

But I do often, when I do look at manuscripts, often people write things like, I had dreadful child experiences and so on. Some of the substance is not there. The reader wants to know, what is it actually that happened to you?

And it's only when you talk about your own suffering, then you begin to connect with the reader because the reader has his own suffering also. And so you then resonate. The important thing, of course, is there are two different ways in which one can tell a story.

One, you can tell a story in an unconscious way where you put blame and you accuse and blame those people who perpetrated those things, who perpetrated the abuse. You can tell it in an unconscious way where you create an identity for those people out of their unconsciousness, what they did unconsciously. Or you can tell a story in a conscious way where there's already an awareness underlying the telling of the story, which means you still tell exactly what happened, but you are also present as you write.

You are also present already as the aware consciousness that wasn't there when those things happened to you, but is there now. So you can bring in two dimensions as you write. There's the dimension of the present where you're telling the story, which includes your own presence, your state of consciousness, the awareness that you are now.

And from that level, you can tell the story and then the story becomes infused with awareness. And then it does not trigger the pain body in the reader. And it would also probably be a more pleasant way of writing.

So I would then recommend that you do tell your story, but be careful that you have the two dimensions, not just totally from the dimension of who you were then, just absolute suffering. Suffering is there and the reader needs to know that and to some extent experience it with you because the power of a book is that the reader can identify with the narrator. And that identification can be powerful.

And if the narrator has also awareness as he or she tells the story, then the reader can identify also with the level of awareness and not just with those negative things that happened, the suffering that happened. And so as you are a writer, so I'm sure you know how to do that. So my main advice then to just briefly summarize is as you write, write from awareness and bring in awareness as you write.

So you have the two levels existing at the same time. And then I think what you write will be very helpful to others. So does that make sense?

It makes sense, but can I just reiterate to make sure that I understand it correctly. The previous idea I had in my mind was to chronologically mention everything as it happened so that people can relate. However, it gets to a point where I became aware of awareness and aware consciously and all that.

However, that's where I thought it was weak or it could be danger and triggering. However, what your suggestion as I understood it is that as I'm writing all that, it's kind of like I write the life story, but I also add that it's like two tracks, two sound tracks at the same time. When that happened, this is what had happened.

However, I'm right now here and I can see how simultaneously bring the presence that I am right now along with the story. That will protect the reader from only just going through the drama and the ride.

That's right. It's a little bit like when you're in certain movies, there is a background commentary. Sometimes it's a voice.

Sometimes it's a character that appears in the movie at a later stage where one of the protagonists in the movie is there not only as the protagonist, but also as a background voice that comments on the action from a much later perspective. So in a similar way, you can write that book that gives it, when that happens in a movie, it gives it a certain depth. And the same thing, again, happens as you use it in your writing.

There will be a depth to it when you have the two levels, you now, which is the awareness, and you then the suffering entity coming together.

[Speaker 5] (6:44:21 - 6:44:41)
Yes. So it's basically what the ego does. However, the ego is always the soundtrack that's negatively commenting and narrating.

So right now here, instead of ego, we learn from ego and we consciously, I consciously narrate the presence that I have right now. That's wonderful.

[Speaker 1] (6:44:41 - 6:45:11)
And also, of course, if you had not gone, I may suggest, I know it from my own life and from many other people's lives, if you had not gone through those so-called negative experiences, the suffering, you would not be at the level of awareness that you are now. So there comes even a gratitude comes in, even as concerns one's suffering.

[Speaker 5] (6:45:12 - 6:45:51)
Yes. I am immensely grateful that it came. People look at me when I talk to people.

I'm relatively young and I talk to people who are always like sometimes double my age. And I feel very grateful. It's like, you know, I had to take this course, but it came to me compact.

And I'm so happy. I'm done with it. I continue to grow and learn and become more aware and deepen my awareness.

But however, I am very grateful. Hey, I'd rather have it early on when I was much younger and many tools that are powerful. And I'm here right now to integrate it with consciousness.

I am truly, truly grateful for everything.

[Speaker 1] (6:45:51 - 6:45:58)
Thank you. One last question. What does the writing behind you say, the writing of yourself there?

[Speaker 5] (6:45:59 - 6:46:01)
Well, I was going to ask you if you could read that.

[Speaker 15] (6:46:01 - 6:46:02)
No.

[Speaker 5] (6:46:02 - 6:46:34)
That's actually, it says it's a prayer. It says it's as you wake up, you say, we awaken and everything belongs to God and much gratitude to the one that is to the one and to him we return. So it's a very weak translation right on the spot.

I should have thought of that. But it's a prayer that I put there. My friend, actually, my sister wrote, actually, and I put there.

[Speaker 1] (6:46:34 - 6:46:35)
Oh, thank you.

[Speaker 5] (6:46:35 - 6:46:39)
Oh, thank you. Thank you. Thank you, Eckhart.

I greatly appreciate your help.

[Speaker 1] (6:46:39 - 6:46:39)
Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (6:46:40 - 6:46:49)
So, Eckhart, we have Angelica Mischendahl from Germany who also has a question now. Angelica?

[Speaker 9] (6:46:52 - 6:46:54)
Hi, very nice to be here.

[Speaker 1] (6:46:55 - 6:46:56)
Thank you.

[Speaker 9] (6:46:57 - 6:47:59)
My question is a very simple question and I'll tell you how I came to it. I was writing an email one day and, you know, to the dear ones I always write with love. I send you my love or I give you my love.

And I asked myself, you know, I write this, I give you my love. What is that? What happens when I give somebody love?

What happens there? What is that? What does that mean?

How does that feel inside? So this question led me to look a little bit deeper into it. And I saw, I realized that I actually don't give anything when I give love to somebody or when I say it even when I feel it.

I'm just there. And so the question that I have is, what is then the difference between love and presence?

[Speaker 1] (6:48:01 - 6:58:21)
Good. Well, that's a good question. Now, love, of course, can mean many things.

There is the love as the ego sees it and there is the true love which is a transcendent state. Now, I have, I believe in one of, I occasionally post things on Facebook. Well, somebody does it for me, but I write it.

And I had a quote a few months ago. I don't know, can't remember who it is by. It said, in romantic love you want the other person and in true love you want what's good for the other person.

So the pseudo love is always wanting something. And if the wanting is not met or no longer works, then it can very quickly turn into its opposite. So true love is very different from that grasping, clinging or wanting that we normally associate with love.

That's the egoic state. Oh, there is a word that is, let's explore some alternative pointers to that, to what we call love. There is a word in the English language called benevolence.

Now, benevolence is, of course, a Latin-based word. Bene is good. Volence is willing.

Of course, the English language also has a Germanic-based word, which is goodwill. So there is goodwill towards all beings or all creatures. Now, when you say you don't give anything, there is a kind of, when you look at something in that space or state of goodwill or benevolence, which really you can only do when you are present, when you are not perceiving through the filter of your conditioned thinking and the filter of the emotions and the filter of the ego itself that consists of conditioned thinking.

So when you relate to another human being, not through that filter of the ego, which says, I want you, I need you, you can somehow enhance my sense of self, you can compliment me, I can't live without you, and whatever the ego says, there is another way of relating to a human being. And when you relate no longer through the filter of the egoic mind, then you relate through presence. And when you relate through presence, there is, although you say it's not a giving, I do perceive it, however, almost as an outflow of energy that is not your energy, but it's energy that moves through you, and it flows to whatever it is you're perceiving in that state of presence.

And there is a benevolence that comes with that. So there's a deep peace that underlies that perception. And in that deep peace and in that benevolence with which you perceive other human beings or another life form, anything, even an inanimate object, sometimes you can pick it up and appreciate it in its beingness or its beauty or the simple fact that it's there.

So all these words that I'm using, appreciation, an outflow, an outflow of attention that doesn't want anything, a benevolence or a goodwill towards that which you are perceiving, with that the separation that is the sense of separation that is created by the conceptualizing egoic mind is no longer there. And then you can have love towards another human being that you meet for half a minute because you're buying something from him or her, and you are looking at him or her in that state of spacious presence. And out of that state of spacious presence flows this energy.

And often you find it coming back at you also because it can sometimes awaken that same oneness consciousness, as we could call it, in the other, or at least the other no longer feels threatened by you because consciously or unconsciously they realize that they are not being judged in any way whatsoever. They are being completely accepted as they are in the present moment. And in that complete acceptance, which is inseparable from presence, in that complete acceptance, in that spacious presence, there is an energy movement.

And that is what I would call love. And the world is waiting, one could almost say, the world is waiting to be loved in that way by you. I would say that even the flower loves to be recognized in its beauty by you because it cannot recognize its own beauty.

It is beautiful. There's ultimately no separation. Every physicist will agree there's ultimately no separation between you and the flower.

There's just, we perceive this absolute separation. When you perceive a flower in that state of presence, the flower begins to recognize itself. And so that happens when there is this appreciation of things around you.

Another word that is associated with that is gratitude. They really all go together. You then perceive things in a state of gratitude.

Of honoring everything, every human being, not just using things for some end in the next moment. That's the mind projected to the next moment, and it uses every human being and everything in order to get to the next moment, what I want to achieve through this human being. It starts with a simple thing like buying, you're buying a newspaper in a shop.

Now, it's the only way in which you interact with this other person that you're buying the newspaper from. Is that person just a function of receiving the money and giving you the newspaper? Or is there another dimension to the interaction where for a few seconds while you're there, you acknowledge the beingness of that other person?

And that is, of course, you have to be present with him or her. You just, you look at him, for a moment there's no thinking. It's just a spacious presence.

Out of that spacious presence comes goodwill, comes benevolence, comes an appreciation, and comes a deep sensing that ultimately you and this so-called other person are not truly absolutely separate. There comes a sensing, a realization that the essence that you share with the other is consciousness. No matter what form the consciousness takes on the surface, it's a little bit like ripples or waves on the surface of the ocean.

Every ripple looks a little bit different. You are a ripple and the other person is a ripple. It looks different.

But what is the actual nature of the ripple? What is the true nature of rippleness? The true nature of rippleness is the ocean.

Each ripple is an expression, a beautiful temporary expression of the vastness of the ocean of being. And so you no longer take the appearance of the person for who that person is, because there can be no love there. You look through that and you sense there is an essence there that is inseparable from presence.

So presence then and love are very, they go together. You cannot have one ultimately without the other. There is, there are other forms of so-called love that the love of a mother has for a child.

That is fine. That's a natural kind of love that has its place, but is not yet transcendent love, but can, there can be transcendent love also there at the same time. But many people, because you mentioned in your question sending love to your, to relatives and so on, with relatives and family members, you have, you have, you can have two levels.

You can have the emotional bond, which is called love. And in addition, you can have the transcendent dimension, which is the true love. So you don't have to be confined to the emotional bond.

There needs to be something to really deepen it. There needs to be the transcendent dimension also. And that would be the case even with those with whom you don't have no emotional bond.

So for true love to exist, the emotional bond may be there or it may not be there. In many cases, you won't have an emotional bond. And yet there is this outflow of benevolent and gratitude and appreciation.

So that's really how it is.

[Speaker 9] (6:58:22 - 6:58:41)
Um, uh, you know, the question, so you, you, there is a, you, there is, when I, when I looked at this, when I looked at this question, um, and I removed all the emotions are associated with love.

[Speaker 15] (6:58:41 - 6:58:42)
Yes.

[Speaker 9] (6:58:42 - 6:59:00)
So why we, we, yeah. Um, then it felt for me, presence has a neutrality. Yeah.

It has like a neutrality. It's very, you know, it's just there, but there is no, there is no flavor to it. You can, if you, you know, yeah.

[Speaker 15] (6:59:00 - 6:59:00)
Yes.

[Speaker 9] (6:59:01 - 6:59:46)
And, uh, and when I took out of love, all this emotional charge, if there's a way to call it that way, then I couldn't see, it was, I couldn't see any difference almost. That's why I asked you. And, and the way you talk about a flower, the flower is also present.

It's just there. Yeah. It's just there, but there's no, yeah, there is no, there are no flavors to it.

I mean, it's beautiful when one looks at it, but you talked about this outflow. So is it, is there, is this just being there? And then out of this, then a flow, this out, feeling this outflow or this current?

[Speaker 1] (6:59:48 - 7:01:04)
Yes. Yes. Just right now, you can, I can look at you, you can look at me without necessarily thinking anything, and, and you can feel a sense of connect, not just connectedness, but something deeper, a oneness where there's, you don't need concepts in that.

There's a, there's an underlying piece of beingness, of presence. And in that, concepts are not needed. And you don't even need to understand more about it, because one thing that can, the mind can be a help or a hindrance.

The mind never stops asking the next question, what's this really like? So I'm just inviting you right now, instead of asking to elucidate further, why not simply be here in this beautiful moment and appreciate whatever arises in consciousness at this moment, and be there as the underlying presence for it, and appreciate it in that way deeply. And that is love.

So our hour is up. And I want to take a moment first to thank all of the viewers who tuned into this from all over the world. I know there are thousands and thousands of you.

Thank you for taking the time. I also want to thank the members of the Eckhart Tolle community who came here today to ask questions. We really appreciate your efforts.

And to thank you, Eckhart, as well, for having the interest and courage to try out this new form of technology and dialogue. We greatly appreciate you taking the time. And this concludes our first ever Google Plus Hangout with Eckhart Tolle.

And thank you again for attending. And please go out and remember the practice of presence and awakening.

[Speaker 1] (7:01:59 - 7:02:01)
Thank you, everybody. Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (7:02:01 - 7:02:04)
Thank you, Eckhart. Thank you, Søren. Thank you, everybody.

[Speaker 1] (7:02:04 - 7:44:18)
Welcome to the present moment. So to start with, let's just become aware of the present moment. And that can have two or three steps.

You can go deeper into the present moment, or you can just begin to be aware of it. Step one is always, well, you could say remembering that the present moment is life itself, and it's all you ever have. And if you forget that, you live in a kind of hypnotic trance, which is how most people live, entranced by their thoughts and emotions, and a sense of self derived from the conditioned thinking and the emotional conditioning.

That's normal existence. And so you're not present. Your attention is absorbed by the conditioning, mental, emotional conditioning, and the egoic self, which arises when you mistake the conditioning for who you are.

So it often starts with remembering, oh, the present moment. And then first your attention goes to sense perceptions. That's usually when you realize you had been lost in the mind, and suddenly your attention comes into the present moment, and first it means an awareness of sense perception.

And suddenly you look around as if you had just arrived in that place, because you have, if you've been absorbed in the usual problem making, anticipating, remembering, regretting, that kind of mind activity. When you then first become aware of your surroundings, it's like as if you were arriving here after a prolonged absence. It could be your familiar room, but you never really looked at it anymore, just peripherally.

And suddenly you become aware of each thing, the table, the chair, the plants, the walls, without having to name them. I'm naming them because I'm directing your attention to them. You become aware of whatever is there, and there's the silent presence of each thing.

That's already an enormous shift in consciousness. It's already the beginning of a shift in consciousness. Become aware of the silent presence of things.

And the whole problem making activity of the mind subsides, and you realize that at this moment, there is no problem. You don't have a problem at this moment. But if you do, then you go and deal with it.

But usually you don't, unless the mind manufactures it. So it's quite a wonderful thing to become aware of. Let's say you're in your room, in a room, become aware of the presence of each thing and briefly acknowledge it.

It's presence without any mental activity. You just become comfortable with those things. And there's almost a kind of appreciation of everything.

And then you take in the totality of the place where you are. You might not be in a room, you might be outside. It doesn't matter if you're outside, then your attention goes out to whatever is there.

Whether they are man-made objects or natural objects, doesn't really matter. Of course, natural things are more conducive to taking you into that presence because there's no thought associated with a tree or flower. Or the grass or the sky or the clouds.

But even looking at a car or a house or traffic flowing, you just acknowledge the is-ness of all things that you are perceiving around you. And that is comforting. And it already frees you to some extent from the heavy burden of being a person, a personality, a me.

There's a heaviness to that. If that's all you know about you, then it's heavy. You carry around the baggage of me and my problems.

And already just allowing your attention to dwell on each thing that surrounds you. Already, to some extent, frees you from the heaviness of the conditioned person. And then you become aware also not just of each thing.

You become aware also of the totality of that place where you happen to be. If it's a room, you become aware of the totality of the room without focusing specifically on one thing. Just take in the wholeness of it.

And if you're outside, the same. Become aware of the totality of your surroundings as a single whole. So there's two ways of being aware.

You can place attention on individual things and as much as you can without needing to label it, just attention, just taking it in, just noticing it. Appreciation sometimes comes with it naturally. Oh.

So this is the first step in becoming present. That's already, for some people, that's all, they might not go any deeper and that already is a liberation. When they remember, they can go to that place where there's the non-problematic present moment.

Then you also become aware of sounds, of course. It becomes part of your experience of the present moment. It's not only what you see, it's also what you hear.

So there may be sounds, little sounds, big sounds. And again, you become aware and in the same way that you give attention to a table or a chair or a tree, you give your attention to the sounds that arise. And most sounds come and go.

They suddenly come up out of nothingness and then they disappear. Whatever it may be, a child screaming or shouting or dog barking or human voice or car passing by or motorbike or bird or gust of wind or raindrops, whatever. Most sounds come and go, so they arise and they subside.

And again, there's an attention there. And again, natural sounds, yes, they can take you more easily into presence than man-made sounds because man-made sounds can more easily stimulate thought. But that's fine.

So there's visual, there's... So you're becoming free of the heavy me and something arises that is just an aware presence. And that aware presence is aware of these things around you that you perceive with your senses.

And the next thing is you become aware of the fact that you're breathing, very calming in itself. So if you're sitting in a room like here and now, you become aware of the things in the room, the totality of the room, any sounds that may be there and the fact that you're breathing. It's a kind of peace descends because the problem-making entity has temporarily gone away and something else has taken its place, we could say.

So that possibility is always there when life becomes heavy or you feel there's a heaviness to life, a burden, or it's, I'm close to a nervous breakdown, I don't know what to do anymore, I just can't cope anymore. Okay, so then look around where you are. Oh, where's the nervous breakdown now?

You're breathing, you're listening, you're seeing everything. So it's liberating, you can see how liberating the present moment is and how it's the entry point into something else. And as I said, for some people, that's already enough, developing the ability to step out of, especially out of excessive and unnecessary problem-making mind activity and becoming comfortable with, appreciative of whatever is here now.

And then you realize why some artists choose as their subject matter, not the extraordinary things of life, but some artists choose very ordinary things and paint them, an ordinary chair, an ordinary table, an ordinary landscape. Or just a normal, just ordinary tree, because the artist looked at that and gave it his or her fullest attention. And then he saw or she saw that there is something in the most ordinary thing, even the most ordinary table or chair or landscape, there's something there that you cannot name or define.

One could almost say there is more there than meets the eye. And the artist realized that, and that's why he then, or she, picked up a brush and painted this thing that, he wants to show on the canvas his or her perception of it, that added dimension that you cannot define or name. There's something to it that's more than meets the eye, even the most simple thing.

And then if the artist is successful, some are, some are not, some become successful after they're dead, but at some point, the painting may be in a gallery, and then the people come and look at the painting of that old chair. Oh, look at that, so powerful. But they would never look at an old chair in real life, in the old chair itself, they don't look at it, but they look at the painting of the old chair.

Yeah. But the real purpose of art, or if not purpose, how art can be, contemplation of art can be helpful and beneficial, is it shows you what is possible, a perception that is possible, a deeper perception of things. So if you look at an ordinary landscape in a painting and you realize there is a depth there, then perhaps next time you find yourself in an ordinary landscape, you look at it with new eyes, not labeling it, but giving it your fullest attention.

And that's the present moment, of course, it's an aspect of the present moment. And that's really what your life consists of, there is nothing else but all the things that arise around you as you go through life. And the miraculous nature of it, and the mysterious nature of it.

If you miss all that, you miss the entire thing. You might as well not have come here. But, the aliveness of it all, and then to go a little deeper if you want, you're not only aware of all those things that you perceive with your senses, you become aware also of an aliveness in your body that's not really a sense perception anymore, because you don't see it, you don't hear it, you don't smell it, taste it, touch it.

You become aware of it in some other way. The simple fact that the body is alive. Your main goal is in your relationships, in your work situation, in your home situation, your main goal is being present wherever you are and whatever you do.

Then your life becomes empowered, and you will do a lot of good without necessarily feeling that I am doing it. It flows through you. And those of you who are still looking for something to do, the question often people ask me, what am I meant to do?

Where am I meant to be? Who am I meant to be with? And of course, the first answer is the foundation for it all, to find out where you're meant to be, what you're meant to do, who you're meant to be with.

The first answer is you're meant to be here, you're meant to be doing what you're doing right now, and you're meant to be with whoever you are with right now at this moment. That's foundation. I'm not talking about for the rest of your life, but right now, so you come to a full acceptance of whatever is in the present moment.

Now, most people who are trying to figure out what they're supposed to do in their lives, they don't give their fullest attention and they're not fully aligned with the present moment, where they are, who they are with. They are rejecting it in some way. And that obstructs the power and obstructs the arising of presence.

So you become accepting and comfortable with where you are right now. So you're meant to be here right now. That's why you're here.

I'm meant to be here. And in the movie of your life, also there must be things that go wrong and they do all the time. Otherwise it's not interesting.

And then there is another dimension that is accessible in human consciousness.

There's a potential of realizing the vertical dimension as opposed to the horizontal dimension and the vertical dimension is realized. You enter it as you become present.

And as you become present, the stream of thinking subsides, is replaced with a space of awareness. Awareness arises. And then when I ask you, who or what are you without reference to any thought?

What does it feel like to be you without reference to a narrative in your mind that you call my life? So for example, in this moment, you don't need to remember anything about your life. But when you don't remember anything about your life, are you still there?

And what does that mean? I am still there without reference to a narrative. What is that I am that's still there that doesn't seem to have any content anymore?

Without the narrative, there's an I am without content. This is why it's so hard to describe it or to talk about it. What is left is a presence.

It's all you can say about it. It's an absence of thought, but there's a presence there. Can't define it.

And there, you have no age. It doesn't matter whether you're 20 years old or 100. There's a presence.

A beingness. Being. One could say, you know that you exist.

Well, exist is the wrong word. You know that you are in that realization in the vertical dimension. You know that you are, but that's all you know and all you need to know.

Nothing needs to be or should be added to it. The beingness itself. In ancient Greece, the Temple of Apollo at Delphi had inscriptions.

One inscription on the enormous wisdom arising in ancient Greece. One of the inscriptions was, it goes back to Socrates or Pythagoras, know yourself. Know thyself inscribed.

And then on another side of the temple, there was a strange inscription. You are. And people didn't know later on when they looked at it, hundreds of years later, thousands of years later.

What does that mean? Maybe there's something missing. Let's look more closely.

You are. Maybe it got eroded by time. There must be something else.

But they couldn't find anything else. And a few people later realized the deeper meaning of it. And they actually go together with know thyself and you are go together.

Know thyself does not refer to the personality. It does not refer to knowing the story of you in great detail. Exploring perhaps hidden things that you hadn't known about yourself.

There's a place for that too, but it's not meant by the ancient know thyself. It's not the self that you get to know through going through psychoanalysis for 10 years. Because there's always new layers of memories.

Oh, I hadn't realized that. That's so interesting. My life is becoming so complex.

Interesting. The longer I have psychoanalysis, the more interesting it gets. That has its place.

It's fine. It's interesting. It's like a movie.

That's an interesting movie. And people like to see movies that are not only interesting, but interesting must mean there must be things that go wrong in the movie. Otherwise, it's not interesting.

And in the movie of your life, also there must be things that go wrong and they do all the time. Otherwise, it's not interesting. So know thyself doesn't refer to all the details of your life, hidden motivations, all those things, repressed desires.

Know thyself doesn't refer to that. That's a different knowing and a different self. A different knowing and a different self.

The knowing, the verb to know here, is not used with reference to conceptual knowing, analytical knowing, knowing through thought structures, thoughts, words, concepts. There is a deeper knowing that is non-conceptual. And there is a deeper self than the conceptual entity that is the egoic entity.

The self that the Buddha described as an illusion, that is the conceptual entity. There is a deeper self that in Buddhism is described as the no-self, and in Hindu teachings is described as the transcendent self. The Atman.

So the inscription on the Temple of Delphi refers to that. First of all, the knowing is not the conceptual knowing. There is another way of knowing, and there is another self other than the self that you are familiar with, that you call your life, me and my life.

So that's important to know. And the key is given in these two words, you are, that is the key to knowing yourself. And you are is the realization of being, which is the transcendent self.

I am trying to understand why a person would attract others who ultimately betray them. Assuming that we create our relationships consciously or unconsciously, why is there the experience of betrayal? Assuming also that I know and love myself profoundly, what is to be learned from being betrayed?

The question sounds a little abstract, but the questioner is not here. I assume that the questioner feels betrayed. By someone.

And since the questioner is a woman, perhaps she feels betrayed by a man. Perhaps, maybe it's by a woman. Now, of course, betray already is a word that is quite heavy.

He betrayed me. She betrayed me. There's already a huge amount of heaviness and story in that.

If you put it slightly differently, it loses some of its heaviness and putting it slightly differently could sound like this. He is a human being and he manifested behavior that corresponded to his level of consciousness at that particular time when he did it. Perhaps at other times when I met him, he seemed to be at a better, higher level of consciousness, but then he fell back to a more unconscious state and then his behavior manifested that.

Where's the betrayal? It suddenly disappeared. So that makes it easier on you to deal with it than to impose a huge narrative or judgment on another person and involve you in this dreadful act of which you become a part, the act of betrayal.

Yes, of course you suffered. We all suffer. We all encounter humans who make us suffer because many humans, most of them are unconscious and they're not always at the same level.

That's an interesting fact that humans can be at enormously varying levels of consciousness according to the situation they find themselves in. There are some humans who have a potential for committing a crime but circumstances never put them in a position where that potential becomes actualized and then it can happen that other humans encounter a situation that is very challenging and brings out all the worst accumulations within them that come up to the surface and suddenly they turn into these monsters. And before you might have known a completely different person, a completely different level of consciousness.

So humans get challenged or encounter situations that bring out certain aspects of their unconsciousness between in sexual encounters, because it's not unlikely that the betrayal has something to do with the man going off with another woman, not unlikely. Now that is an area that that kind of attraction that can make people very quickly, very unconscious. There are expressions for that, but I won't say.

So yes, that's the unfortunate thing with human beings. They're not fully enlightened. And then of course you say, I trusted him.

He promised me when we got married that he would be faithful and I trusted him. And I'm sure when he promised it, he meant it. I don't think when he promised to be faithful, he meant I'm not really going to do that.

When he promised to be faithful, he meant it. But then a few years passed and then one day he had a few drinks and then he looked at that woman there and he was gone. Completely unconscious.

And again, in Jesus' words, forgive them for they know not what they do. Now to forgive them is only something that you do for yourself because you free yourself of the burden of having to live with a narrative or a story of betrayal and be part of that. And then part of your sense of identity, this is very painful, but seductive, part of your ego identity then is, I am the one who has been betrayed.

And that's a dreadful burden to carry in your sense of self. So if you believe in that story that your mind has created, the act of betrayal, he betrayed me. So you're setting up for yourself an enormous amount of suffering because that story will become part of your sense of self.

And if that's the case, then even it will influence and color the way from now on in which you relate to other men or women or whatever it is, can easily color that. So you have to be very careful and see what you're doing to yourself by creating these stories. On the conventional level, they are true.

You can say, he betrayed me. That's conventional way of using language, but it's not the real truth. You might have heard of Byron Katie, the spiritual teacher.

She always questions whatever thoughts the mind produces and that's a wonderful thing because otherwise you might feel tempted to believe in every thought that comes into your head. He betrayed me. And of course, Byron Katie would ask, do you know that for sure?

How do you know that? Yeah, of course I know for sure. And then eventually, if it works, the person is meant to disidentify from the thought that the mind has created and become free of being trapped by this thought, which really means consciousness is trapped by this thought that the mind has created and you are trapped in it.

So be careful with the stories that your mind creates. And sometimes if you rephrase, as I just did for you, rephrase the story, it suddenly does not cling to you anymore and it no longer becomes part of your painful identity or sense of self because you want to be free of that. So, and of course then you, unfortunately you have to forgive him.

Sorry, you have to, that is part of it when you realize, yeah, he was unconscious. Forgiveness comes and that's fine. It doesn't mean you want to start all over again or maybe you will, but probably not.

Because unless a shift has happened in him, the same kind of thing might happen to him again next time he has a drink and sees a woman. So careful with, very careful with stories that the mind creates and then become part of your sense of self.

[Speaker 3] (7:45:25 - 7:55:35)
But there were several questions, a number of them, which I like to kind of lump together and address. And that had to do with pain in the body, that being related to the pain body. And different parts of the body, some people had shoulder problems, some people had it in their face, in their hips, and various other places in their body.

And, as I mentioned, every thought, every emotion, if not processed fully, leaves an imprint in the body. So if there have been any trauma in your life, or any just emotions that come up and that you haven't processed, it leaves an imprint in the body. And usually those imprints of emotions have a story.

And each time you tell the story, either it's out loud or in your head, okay, we know that one, where it goes around, it actually, the energy, because it's every thought and every emotion is energy, the story goes around. And if you believe that story, you believe, I mean, the event may have happened to you, yes. But if you actually sort of feed on that, and then you allow the story to play around in your head, and you tell somebody else, you know what happened to me, or you have this victim role where you just feed on that event, the emotion.

And that's what the pain body does. The first time I realized what Eckhart meant, because Eckhart would sometimes say, you know, we will feed the pain body, or, you know, you connect with somebody else with a pain body, and you feed off of each other. And I didn't really quite understand that.

I kind of understood that intellectually. But there was one day where I was meditating, and I was watching my pain body arise, so there's some old emotion there. Yes, I have a pain body, and it will activate itself.

And I was watching it, because it was something very old. And something very old sometimes takes a long time to process. I mean, if it's been very traumatic, it will take a while in time to process.

And then I had the story come up, the memory of the story. And I was able to witness that. And I saw that as soon as the story came up in my mind, it was like this energy ball that came down and fed right into my gut, where I was holding my pain body, where I could feel the pain.

I was actually feeling the sensation of pain in my body. So, and I went, ah, that's what Eckhart means by feeding the pain body. So if the story goes around in your head, keeps going around, and you play it out, it actually then makes this pain body bigger.

So I went, okay, all right, now I understand. And then you're able then, that awareness is there that you can drop, you make that decision, and you don't follow the thought. But you stay connected to where you are feeling it internally, because that energy now is blocked in your body and it's something very old.

And it has to be felt. You didn't feel it back then, so don't think you're going to get away with not feeling it now, as it becomes active. So, and it's not, you don't have to create it into a problem.

It is not a problem. The mind thinks it's a problem, but it is not a problem. There is enough awareness in you where you are now able to free the pain body.

Hallelujah. So when you feel it, hallelujah, really, truly, because your awareness is there and all you just have to do is just feel it. And sometimes it is so intense, and the reaction, the habit, is to be able to run away from it, because we don't want to deal with it, we don't want to feel it.

We go, oh no, no, no, not this, not this. Or when will this stop? As soon as you have those thoughts, you're not in acceptance mode.

You're in resistance mode. So the only way out is through. Yes, yeah, the only way out is through.

And will that pain last forever? No. It feels like it will, but it won't.

It won't. So we just feel that and allow that, your awareness, shining the light of consciousness on the energy itself within the body, and then it will dissolve or transmute, transform, it'll change. Maybe it'll start to dissipate and the energy then can run freely.

And then your energy body opens up and the life force that is naturally and just always here, flowing within, can then flow. And there's a release. Sometimes it's a big release, sometimes it's a quiet release, but there's just a release.

Now, it doesn't mean that it won't come up again, because it may come up again. Don't go into your head and think that, okay, well, I forget to feel this once and I want it gone. Usually it doesn't work that way.

Life will bring something about to activate that dormant state of pain body so that we can release it and become free human beings. There was one here where somebody had hip replacements, two hip replacements, and with something like that, or changing something that's in the body, inviting a foreign object in the body, it takes time for the body then to be able to coexist with something that is foreign. And it will coexist.

And there might even be a grieving process because it's a loss of something. It's like losing a limb. So there's the experience, the body experience this, oh, jeez, what's going on here?

Something's different is happening. And there could be experience of a loss and a loss also on the emotional level. So pain can actually be our teacher and our alarm clock.

Because when our body's in pain, it's saying, hey, pay attention, pay attention here. Wake up, wake up. Don't go away.

Feel this. Release this. So I invite you to bring that awareness, the acceptance into your practice when the pain body arises.

And then when you think the pain body is completely gone, as Ram Dass says, go home and to your parents for a week. Ultimate test. And not just like, you know, there for a moment and pop out.

Stay with them for a week. But life will show you because we are evolving here and that evolution calls for the release of all things old. So that we can stand new and fresh with this beautiful vessel that we have been given so that life can bring forth a more conscious way of relating and living in this world.

[Speaker 1] (7:56:07 - 8:05:46)
We'll have some questions, but before, just read two or three questions that people have been sending in questions to people who are watching us, who are with us, but elsewhere in time, in space and eventually in time too, except that it's always a present moment. So time ultimately is an illusion, but on a conventional level, we talk about time. So I forgot to say hello to everybody who is not physically present here, but present somewhere else on the planet.

This question has been asked in the past a few times and tends to come up very often. So it is a question that quite a few people have. If we live with a person who is unconscious a lot of the time, is it possible to have a harmonious relationship whether the person totally awakens or not?

That seems to be a recurring problem for many people. Now, if you have brought your unconscious partner here, that means, and he or she actually came along, that means not all is lost. If he or she is still here.

So it depends in what way the unconsciousness of the person that you live with manifests. There are many ways in which it can manifest from being in negative states to misinterpreting what you say or do, anger, and then it goes up on the scale of verbal abuse. And then it goes higher up on the scale of unconsciousness to physical abuse.

So if the unconsciousness is not too high up on that level of intensity, it may be possible to live with a person who may not share, only not share your interest in spiritual evolution, but have no idea what you are practicing or reading or talking about. If you try to point something out, that person may just be uninterested. And then if you go up on the scale of unconsciousness, then another person may be hostile towards what you're doing.

And there's a big difference. But in both cases, there's unconsciousness. Your partner may just have no idea what it is, but say, well, yeah, go listen to that guy again.

I don't know why you go there, but that's okay. I'll be fine. That's fine.

So that should be, you can live with that person. And then another one gets angry. He says, why do you always have to see me?

I can't stand it anymore. Or whatever, criticize. So you might be able to live with that.

What you can live with, only you can know whether you can continue your presence practice and bring surrender into the situation with this person. And miracles are possible. Miracles do happen.

And sometimes the seemingly most unconscious person can suddenly shift. Now, if that person is very unconscious, usually what is required is some blow, not you physically doing it. I'm speaking metaphorically.

Life administers some blow in the form of big loss, accident, illness, and then deeply unconscious people very much trapped in their ego can sometimes suddenly open up. The ego gets cracked. You may sometimes observe that when a person with a big ego is unconscious, it happens not to everybody.

When they become ill, they're lying in bed and they're ill. Sometimes the ego gets even stronger, it seems. But for some people, the ego, there isn't enough energy left to keep the ego going.

Because the illness, it absorbs so much energy, so there's not enough energy. And suddenly, this person who was never a genuine person, that you couldn't talk to heart to heart because there was always egoic posturing and egoic role-playing there. And suddenly, this person is ill, lying in bed, and there just isn't enough energy for posturing and role-playing.

And then for the first time, I've observed it a few times, people have told me and I've personally observed, for the first time, you can communicate with that person in a deeper level of presence. This can also happen when people who had a huge ego all throughout their lives, when they're approaching death. Sometimes miracles of transformation can happen in the last moments, in the last days, or in the last weeks of a person's life.

When resentments that had been building up over a lifetime and other narratives of an extremely negative nature are let go of, can happen. It can also happen when a person is ill, that when this person recovers, that shift that you observed doesn't last. And the moment strength returns to that person, the old egoic patterns are back.

And it's like, oh my God, you're your old self again. You were so nice when you were ill, loving and present and open. Well, just wait.

Things will happen again. So if there's abuse, and these are more pronounced manifestations of unconsciousness, if there's verbal abuse, can you live with such a person? Only you can know whether you're prepared to do that, whether you can sustain your presence practice, perhaps not physical abuse.

If you stay with physical abuse in the hope that this person will become transformed, that is probably a delusion. But I cannot tell you what to do. But if you are alert and vigilant and observe yourself in the presence of that person, you will know what to do.

You just have to see that the right course of action is not being sabotaged by certain patterns that remain in your mind, mental, emotional patterns, such as fear of being alone, fear, loss of security, perhaps the acuity of being with another person, even if it's fear of the unknown, stepping into the unknown. So you may be held back by certain patterns in your mind. And if you are present enough, you can recognize that and then go beyond it.

Hello. My question raises the issue of trauma. People having survived earthquakes, crimes, car accidents.

What would you recommend for their practice? I'm a crime survivor and sometimes dealing with heavy pain, body attacks or difficult emotions during meditations. I have a question Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (8:06:34 - 9:30:35)
Thank you. Do you want to sit again? Because we never know how long the quest, the answer is going to be.

It could be a minute, could be 30 minutes. It may well be that for humans who have suffered trauma, catastrophic events, anything of that kind, deep suffering. It may well be that, not necessarily, but it may be that during this lifetime, they will not become entirely free of the remnants or the energy left behind by the trauma.

But the important thing is the realization that there is in you a dimension that is beyond anything that could ever suffer. And you have to get in touch with that in you that has always been and will always be and always is the transcendent, the formless dimension within you, the formless essence of who you are. And of course, this is our entire reason for being here is to go deep enough within where you encounter that presence or that spaciousness.

Within that presence or spaciousness, it can still happen that the old pain from time to time arises, or it could happen that the presence gradually consumes, burns up the accumulated pain from the past, the pain body. Either way is fine, even if the presence does not completely burn up the accumulated pain or suffering and which therefore then occasionally resurfaces. At least you know your essential being to be the spaciousness.

So from the difference from not having access to the transcendent dimension within yourself and having access is when you don't have access to it, you're completely in the grip of the pain. It occupies you completely. You become it.

It may also use your mind to renew itself because then you remember what happened. And then by using those thoughts, you feed the old pain through the memory of what happened. And so you are trapped in it.

It has a grip on you. Now, when you have access to the transcendent dimension, you realize that you, the pain is there, but you are there. So here's the pain and you are the space.

And the more you practice, the more you realize you are the space around it. Another useful practice is to, when you feel it, to accept what you feel at any given moment, the present moment, accept when it arises, but know that it is the old pain and the acceptance itself creates the space. And so you, more and more, who you are is not lodged in, identified with the pain, but who you are.

So what I'm saying is the sense of self begins to move out of the pain or the pain may still be there. The sense of self shifts from being identified with the pain and the suffering me to being the space behind or around it. And it's a very subtle thing.

You have to practice. The important thing is practice being the space when you are not, at times when you are not in the grip of the pain, because then you need to see if you can be the space in ordinary circumstances and surroundings. And especially here, of course, a great opportunity for dis-identifying from all the mental, emotional content that still lives in you some fine, some painful, some extremely painful, but to dis-identify from it so that it no longer has a sense of self in it, including all thoughts.

Thoughts still arise, but without the me in them, emotions still come, painful emotions come, but they become divested of the sense of self. And that's a big difference between feeling that you are, you are the pain. It has taken possession of you completely, and it can easily define your sense of who you are, especially in the case of deep trauma.

The pain can easily define your sense of identity. So I have encountered people, I'm sure it's not the case with you, but I have had sometimes questioners and people who have asked about their deep suffering, and they were so identified with their old pain, when I suggested a way of going beyond it, they got angry because they felt that their sense of self had been threatened. And then in a few cases, when I pointed that out to them, they realized.

In one or two cases, they didn't want to realize. But when I pointed out, can you feel that you are angry now? Because I just made a suggestion that it may be possible to not perhaps to eliminate the pain at once, but to transcend it.

And then, so the egoic sense of self, because here too, whatever you identify with becomes part of ego. And it can happen that people identify with some pain or something they suffered in the past. In fact, it's almost a normal process.

And it needs to be pointed out. You need to realize that is not who you are. And compared to who you are, one could say it's like a bad dream compared to who you really are.

You are beyond that and have always been beyond that. You have to access that in you which cannot be touched by that. And it doesn't mean you cut yourself off.

No, the difference is make sure your sense of identity is not in the old pain. That is very important because if it is, you will always fight any attempt to get rid of it. It's an unconscious attempt of the ego to survive.

Very normal egoic motivation. It wants to survive. So the same thing can happen with deeply held viewpoints or opinions.

If you have certain, whatever it is, political, religious, or whatever thing you might have seen on the internet which suddenly has taken possession of your mind and become a kind of mental virus in your head that has taken over 75% of your thought processes. And then your identity is in it and you don't want to let go or the ego doesn't want to let go. So presence, access the presence when the pain is not obvious at those times so that when it comes, you can continue to be there as the accepting witness or presence behind and around it.

So when it comes, you accept it. It forces you to go beyond identification with form. And a point will come where you are thankful for anything, even though it seemed, at the time seemed terrible, for anything that forced you to disidentify from the egoic sense of self.

That's why retrospectively often people become thankful for their suffering, but then you have to realize you can't just go through the motions. It has to be a true thing and that may happen to you also. That's the the important thing is that the old pain is no longer able to use your thought processes and control your thinking so that you can feel when it comes, it comes in waves.

Occasionally it comes up so that you can be there as the presence and accept it without it moving into your mind and make you think the memories of what happened and so on, all kinds of thoughts associated with the energy of the pain. That keeps it in place and renews it all the time. And then you get into a vicious circle.

So, and for this, this is why it's helpful to be here as you sit here, even if you don't do anything, presence power grows in you so it comes more and more and then that begins to surround, so to speak, that begins to surround the accumulated pain. It may dissolve it, don't know, but even if it doesn't, basically, if you're no longer self-identified with it, you are free already. So it's a, and in, the strange thing is, and you may not realize it until later, so I'm not trying to convince you that what I say is true, that it is often humans who go through intense pain of that kind, and sometimes already children have to go through it, that happens.

It's often those that are, that becomes their opening into the transcendent dimension because the pain is too much and then the crack opens in the ego. The opposite can also happen, that the pain solidifies the ego and then the human being becomes totally enclosed in their painful identity and it goes like, or it could, potentially, it can always be the opening, the crack in the shell of the ego. So there may be quite a few of you, I don't know what the percentage is, who have suffered traumatic events and all of you have had certain forms of pain in your life as a child, as an adult.

My childhood was, there was not one traumatic event, but the whole thing was traumatic. So it wasn't concentrated in one event, it was dispersed, not as intense as one traumatic event would be, but dispersed over a period of whatever, 15 years of my life and especially the first 12 years when my parents divorced at the age when I was 10 and then for two or three years after that, it was still very unpleasant every day. Nobody's fault, every human being acts according to their level of consciousness.

What do you think about Facebook? Is it a healthy format? It seems a bit egoic, not a whole lot of transmission of connection, love, et cetera.

Posting pictures of yourself and quantifying friends, likes, et cetera, seems like enhancing the ego. Are we going down the wrong path with social media? Well, the questioner has a point.

As even before the advent of Facebook and similar things for hundreds of years, or thousands of years, people constructed for themselves an identity in their head. That's me, me and my story as I sometimes call it. And that was partly inherited from what your culture tells you you are or your family and your culture and partly by choice, certain things you choose to identify with and then incorporate into your sense of self, certain possessions, certain achievements, or the lack of certain possessions and achievements can all be cooperated.

They become mind forms or thought forms, which you identify with. So there's a mental image that forms and that's the essence of ego, a mental image that's me. So that's been going on for a long time.

And then people live through that mental image of me. They seek out things or people that can improve the mental image of me and try to keep away things or people that could weaken or threaten the mental image of me. It all means not being in touch with who you are beyond any mental image, which is why we are here to go deep into that.

And now we got the technology of Facebook where you can externalize the image and you can create on the Facebook page, you can create the image of me and show it to the whole world. And so many young people and maybe not so young, I believe the oldest Facebook user, I saw a video clip in the States, the world's oldest Facebook user is 105 years old. And it is often used unconsciously in enhancing the image one has of oneself and the image one wants to show to the world.

And then you read other people's images on their Facebook page and you think that's who they are. And then you try to compete with that image and you try to polish up your image and compete with them. Most people want to show off, it seems, I'm not that familiar with it, but most people want to show the good things.

I'm having this great meal, here's a picture of it. Why would anybody want to see what you're eating right now? But they do, it seems.

Or I just bought this thing, do you want to see it? And then you can connect people to a place where you bought it, it's another thing. And all kinds of things that I don't understand.

So you can, in many cases, it becomes an artificial construct that you add to every day and everybody else has their artificial construct. And it can actually strengthen the delusion of the false self. It doesn't have to, but often it does.

Facebook can also be used in conveying interesting information and to connect with people at a deeper level or bringing about some spiritual knowledge. So that's not impossible. I used to post occasionally things, I don't do it myself, but I would send it to Steve and he would post it.

But I haven't, I must admit, I haven't done it in a while. Although some things do get posted, quotes and so on, that's fine. Twitter is another one that is...

There's a Twitter message coming in. The last time I tweeted was when a few months ago, in February, the Oprah channel in the States, I don't know if you can get it here, it's called the OWN channel, Oprah Winfrey Network. They showed a repeat of our webinar that we did a few years ago that I did with Oprah.

They did a slightly shortened, edited version over a period of 10 weeks, 10 Sundays, the new us was shown again on this time, not on the internet, but well, also on the internet, but on TV. And Oprah sometimes is an active tweeter. And she said, it would be great if we could tweet at the same time while this program is being shown.

And so I said, okay, I'll see what I can do. And so I was on the phone with Steve while the program was running, and then I was watching it, and then people sent in these questions and they have to be answered immediately. So I was attempting to dictate answers to Steve and his assistant to put in the answers.

And my mind was quite... Well, I felt almost dizzy afterwards because I tried to watch the program and at the same time, watch the incoming tweets and think of an answer. But Oprah must have realized it wasn't from me because she said, Twitter is the exact opposite of how you operate.

And before Oprah said it, Kim said exactly the same thing to me. And that's true. So I was glad when it was over, but while it was happening, I was surrendered to it, although I did feel dizzy afterwards.

So if you can avoid constructing some pseudo identity for yourself on Facebook and be more real, then you can avoid that trap of just the Facebook amplifying the human ego, which it does in many, many cases, especially for youngsters who have no idea what they're doing. We're all ultimately invisible and what you see of another person is relatively insignificant and not destined to survive. Every human being is consciousness manifesting as a temporary form, taking form as what we perceive as a human being.

So the human being itself is a manifestation of consciousness and ultimately no other than consciousness. The death experience, when you die, what happens? There's a question here that might as well answer at the same time about death.

I laughed a little when I saw it. Why is it that we need to awaken? We all die anyway.

That seems to make sense. Is it that you are still awakened after death in the next lifetimes in eternity? Now, if you have experienced, I don't know if you have, been with somebody, if you sat with somebody who died, who is dying, I don't know if you have experienced it, then you will have experienced if you're able to surrender to that moment.

It's a very sacred thing, a very sacred moment. And there's the moment when the transition happens between this body being inhabited by this field of consciousness and then suddenly the body is just a body. And there's a huge difference.

And you immediately see this body was never that being. It just looked like that being. So that being, as I said earlier, we're all ultimately invisible.

And what you see of another person is relatively insignificant and not destined to survive. So my intuition is, I'll verify it, I'll come back to you after I've died and let you know whether it's correct. The person does not survive.

The personal sense of self does not survive. But that which is deeper than the person in you as let's call it a spark of consciousness, that form, first you are the physical form, deeper than the physical form, you are the consciousness that inhabits the form. And that consciousness is inseparable from the one consciousness.

There is no separate consciousness. Consciousness does not have a plural. There are no consciousnesses.

Consciousness is a singular. There's only one consciousness that manifests as we could call it a ray of consciousness. You are this ray of consciousness.

As a ray of consciousness, consciousness is not subject to birth and death. So it is timeless. This ray of consciousness that you appear as this particular person does not necessarily immediately dissolve into total anonymity.

It remains in most cases as a particular ray, but it's not the person anymore. What happens then, it returns briefly to the source in the same way that a bee returns, goes to the beehive and deposits what it has collected. And every human is the one consciousness experiencing and learning and evolving in some way.

Even the most insignificant life form is the one consciousness evolving and learning. And what it has learned, not the details, but the essence, it contributes something to the whole. That is an intuition that came to me some time ago.

And I believe it, there's some truth in it, but we can only speak of it in terms of analogies. So your growth in consciousness becomes part of the one consciousness. The one consciousness, which is the consciousness of God, we're talking about things that you can't talk about, I'll do it anyway.

The transcendent of God is totally beyond time and does not evolve because evolution would mean time. It would mean... So the transcendent does not exist in our time, it is in a transcendent dimension.

So you can't even conceive of it or talk of it. And that is God. Then God, the emanation of God shines into our dimension and creates our dimension.

And then God is an evolving being when God enters this dimension. And there's no doubt that there is an evolutionary process of consciousness happening in our universe. The ultimate, I cannot explain the ultimate purpose of it all.

I don't know it. And even if I knew it, I have occasionally an intuitive insight, but it cannot be put into words. How anybody could explain the universe by choosing the vocal chords is beyond me because after all, we only have a few sounds.

And as I often say, putting a few sounds together and attempting to explain the universe is a futile attempt. After all, there are only five vowel sounds. And a few consonants or whatever they're called.

So you put together the vowels, A-I-E-O-U, A-I-E-O-U, plus put them together in a certain combination. And there you have the secret of the universe. It doesn't work.

You cannot actually, and you cannot speak about what happens after death without already having to talk about the ultimate purpose of it all, because we are part of the ultimate purpose of it all. But the ultimate purpose of it all, you can never, you can only have little glimpses of it. You can never fully comprehend it with your limited mind or talk about it.

So who you are in your essence survives, does not, ultimately there is no death. And when you die as an ego in this lifetime, which is called die before you die, then you already know that as a living experience that you in your essence are beyond death. And that's a beautiful thing.

When the ego goes, then you die before you die. And you can sense the essence that you are. So I'm never going to die and you are not either.

But of course, the body dissolves. The body will dissolve. What is your level of consciousness throughout your life?

And as you die, that is an important factor in what happens after that. There are people who tell me that I don't want to reincarnate again. I don't want to come back.

It's so hard. Please don't let me come back. And then there are others who say, I hope I'm going to come back because I don't want to disappear into nothingness.

I really hope I'm going to come back. Reincarnation, is reincarnation a fact? Yes, but I would like to bring reincarnation into something that you can actually experience at firsthand here and now.

The deeper meaning of reincarnation, as I see it, is you identify with form. Then you reincarnate. Reincarnate comes from flesh.

Flesh means form. Carnate, chili con carne, it's flesh. And it's, so you reincarnate, which means you identify with form.

Then you reincarnate into a form. So the Buddhists striving towards the end of reincarnation so that you no longer are compelled. The consciousness that you are is no longer compelled to reincarnate into another form and have to go through another lifetime of problems and suffering.

So the Buddhists are striving, they want to come to the end of this cycle of reincarnation, where perhaps you're conscious enough to choose whether you want to reincarnate or not. You can say, no, I've had enough, thank you. Now, when people tell me that I don't want to, they say, I don't want to reincarnate again.

I often point out, doesn't, what, how do you respond? You react to the, when the things of this world, how serious is it when things go wrong in this world? How are you, how, it shows you your attachment to form.

Is the moment you, something problematic happens, do you immediately get upset about your, that your investments have lost 50% of their value? Does it upset you a lot? Yeah.

So you're saying you're not attached to form and you are not going to reincarnate anymore, but you're attached to many forms in this world. So you do want to reincarnate. Reincarnation is identification with form.

How do I go beyond reincarnation? You can, you have to do that here and now. And that means that is what we are doing here.

Do not identify with thought forms in your head. That is the most basic reincarnation that happens continually to human beings is the complete identification with every thought form that comes into their heads. And then they become it.

That's how it is. Let me tell you. You can see how completely identified they are with thought.

So the consciousness is completely drawn into the form. The consciousness that they are, the consciousness that you are, is completely drawn into form. It does not know itself as consciousness.

It only knows itself as form. And that is the compulsion to reincarnate, which most humans who are not awakened, or at least awakening, still have. And you can extrapolate from there that when you have this compulsion throughout your lifetime, the compulsion to reincarnate will continue after this body dissolves.

But if you have gone beyond the compulsion to reincarnate in this lifetime, which means identify with every thought and every emotion that comes up, when you have recognized the essence of who you are beyond form, that realization does not leave you. When you die, there is a freedom that comes. But a freedom you have already found in this lifetime because you have died to this identification with form.

And for many, the beginning of spiritual awakening is to realize that there is this stream of continuous commentary in their minds. And that is the thing, oh, that's interesting. That's a thought, of course.

But before the thought, that's interesting, there's the recognition. It's the voice in the head. And the recognition is not the voice in the head, although you might say it after the recognition.

But in the moment of recognizing there's a voice in the head, that's not a thought. The recognition of thought is not a thought. The recognition of thought comes through awareness or presence.

And awareness or presence is the higher consciousness, the arising new consciousness. Wow. So that is really the meaning of spiritual awakening.

By the way, in this first half of our gathering, I will be talking more about it. In the second half, we will do more experiential. But even while I talk about it here, I would hope that if it works for you, there's already also an experiential realization of what it is I'm talking about.

So there's the voice, there's the voice in the head. And people say things like, I think, they don't think, because thinking is not a voluntary action for them. So it's a delusion to even say, I think.

You don't think, you are being thought by thought. You are created by thought. That energy field is amazing.

So the master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup? Now that's a huge demand. If I'm full of clutter, mental clutter, how am I going to empty my cup?

I would immediately be enlightened if I could empty my cup. But the teaching points to something. It points to this, the word empty.

And that's interesting. That is an important word in Buddhism. And I don't think it's a good translation.

Who first came up with it? I don't know. With the 19th century, the Europeans started to translate ancient texts from Sanskrit.

And one person came up with a translation, but probably of the Sanskrit terms sunyata and translated it as emptiness. That doesn't sound so nice. It sounds like something missing or something like that.

So I have an alternative translation for the Buddhist term emptiness. So that empty is an important word. So remember the Zen master said, how can I teach you Zen unless you first empty your cup?

Empty. Emptiness, my alternative translation for that is spaciousness. Spaciousness is a dimension of consciousness in you.

And that is what we could call the spiritual dimension of consciousness, the deeper or the higher consciousness, just words, doesn't matter. And that is in every human, it's there. Many don't know that it's there because the clutter is so dense that they have no realization of the underlying spaciousness.

And that is why I say in millions of humans, that is still a dormant faculty, so to speak. So the most important realization in your life, much more important than what you have achieved on the level of the world, whether your life in worldly terms is regarded as a huge success or additional failure, or for most of you, probably something in between. That's normal.

Sometimes you fail, sometimes you succeed. You move from gaining, losing, high, low, up and down. That's the identity for most.

So the clutter of your mind is there, but there are moments in your life when you become aware of something spacious underneath it. But you may not call it like, call it that. You may not call it anything.

It may arise, for example, in, and oh, in many humans who may never have heard of anything spiritual, they're still, they're out there. They don't know that the little bit of that is in them. So, but they don't know it.

There's little glances come occasionally into their lives of that dimension. It's not enough to actually say that the spiritual dimension has awakened in them, but little flashes come up now and then into their lives. And that is enough.

Those little flashes from that dimension come into their lives, and that is enough to keep many people sane. And those flashes can come when they, you might think when you go out into nature and you see something extraordinarily beautiful, like a sunset, for a moment you go, ah. Or the vastness of the ocean or the sky or the elements, the wind, the storm.

And for a moment you go, ah. And it's a moment of intense aliveness, and you feel, ah. And then you may remember that moment a little later.

That was such a beautiful moment. Why was it? Yes, maybe what you perceived was beautiful, but you felt something in that moment.

You felt a heightened sense of aliveness and a deep peace and connectedness with being, so to speak. Why? Because that moment of sense perception of something vast or beautiful freed you for a moment from the incessant stream of thinking.

So the incessant stream of thinking, let's say you see this vast, this incredible sunset or whatever, and for a moment you give it your complete attention. And for a moment, you're not thinking about yourself, your problems, your problematic life history, or your even more problematic future. Actually, you're not thinking about anything.

For a moment, the stream of thinking subsides and it goes, ah. And that is, without knowing it, you have a little flash that's come up from that dimension. And then the next moment, it may come up a few days later again, when you look into the eyes of a baby, one year old, maybe just in the street or in a cafe, and the baby looks at you, and the baby is one year old, and the eyes are like the baby's.

And you know instinctively that the baby is not thinking about you, because thinking hasn't started yet. The words have not accumulated yet, the thoughts haven't started yet, and yet there's a consciousness there. And you can see very clearly, there's an intense consciousness looking through those eyes at you without judging you in any way.

And in that moment, for just a few seconds, you feel so good. And you say, ah. Ah.

Why do you feel so good? Because at that moment, the baby liberated you from your stream of thinking. And again, a little bit of spaciousness opened up inside you.

And so for those few seconds, when you looked into the eyes of the baby, you were not thinking, and the baby wasn't thinking. So through the baby, you are able to be in that dimension, and it felt so good. Spontaneously, they can arise.

They're not recognized by people as ultimately spiritual, but they are. And so many people, there are millions of people who experience those things briefly, but that's enough to give you a sense still of life is worth living. And then there are others who are so burdened by their minds, they cannot even communicate with a baby.

They cannot even perceive the beauty of nature anymore, because their mind is so noisy that they never, there's a total veil. So they don't look at the baby like, they look at the baby, oh, that's a nice baby. They don't really see the baby.

Immediately, it's labeled. And for many, the beginning of spiritual awakening is to realize that there is this stream of continuous commentary in their minds. And that is the thing, oh, that's interesting.

That's a thought, of course. But before the thought, that's interesting. There's the recognition.

Somebody sent me a sticker to put on, why sticker? I don't know where it originated. It says, you don't, what do you think?

Now, Stephen Mitchell, fortunately, does not exclusively use the masculine pronoun as it's done in most other translations. He, the master, he varies between she and he. So sometimes the master is seen as feminine and sometimes the master is seen as masculine, which is a wonderful thing since the Tao has many qualities that are closely related to the feminine, the openness and so on.

There are many images in the Tao Te Ching that are feminine images to point to the essential nature of the Tao, not that the Tao itself is feminine, but to get a feeling for what Tao is, the Tao Te Ching uses feminine imagery. So here we have a little few lines about the master. The master keeps her mind always at one with the Tao.

That is what gives her her radiance. The Tao is ungraspable. How can her mind be at one with it?

Because she doesn't cling to ideas. The Tao is dark and unfathomable. How can it make her radiant?

Because she lets it. Since before time and space where the Tao is, it is beyond is and is not. How do I know this is true?

I look inside myself and see. Let's look at it again and see. The master keeps her mind always at one with the Tao.

That is what gives her her radiance. Keeps her mind at one with the Tao. In the next line, it says, if it's ungraspable, how can her mind be at one with it?

And it says, because she doesn't cling to ideas. Interesting. She doesn't cling to ideas.

That reminds me of the famous Zen saying. I don't remember who said it, but Zen master said it. Don't seek for the truth.

Just seize or stop cherishing opinions. That is, I believe, points to the same inner state of disidentification from thinking. She doesn't cling to ideas.

Cling to, it doesn't mean she doesn't have ideas, the master. But the master does not cling to ideas. And the Zen master, when he said, don't look for the truth, just stop cherishing opinions.

He didn't say, stop having opinions. Just as Lao Tse does not say, don't have ideas. Says, don't cling to ideas.

And the other master says, stop cherishing opinions. So this clinging, which is the same as cherishing, is self-identification with thoughts that arise. In other words, you then believe completely in every thought that comes into your head.

Amazing. You believe in it, that means you are it. That is self-identification with thinking.

So how then to be at one, always at one with the Tao? So simple. On the one hand, you could call it, stop cherishing opinions.

Now, any thought that arises, ultimately is an opinion, you could say. Stop cherishing, stop your self-identification with that. Or don't cling to ideas, in the words of Lao Tse, or this present translation here.

So that there's always a space between you and your thoughts. Or rather, you are not the thought, you are the space for the thought. This is how I put it sometimes.

You're familiar with that. And perhaps in yourself, you know it. You don't have to be in your thoughts, but you can be the space for your thoughts.

Then no matter how weird your thoughts are, it doesn't matter that much. You don't say, oh my God, I shouldn't be having these weird thoughts. No, because that's another thought.

I'm spiritually, I'm supposed to be spiritually advanced, and why am I still having these thoughts? There must be something wrong with me. Does that sound familiar?

That's also thoughts. That's more thoughts that say, I shouldn't be having these thoughts, there's something wrong with me. And then you believe in those thoughts.

Thoughts that judge other thoughts. That may sound familiar to some of you, and there's nothing personal in it. It's the human mind.

So you don't need to eliminate thoughts or to say, I should only have pure thoughts because I'm a spiritual person. Because by now, I should have transcended all impure thoughts. Well, then you're in a dilemma because in this world of polarities, if you only want to have pure thoughts, you're creating the other polarity in the unseen.

And sooner or later, the other polarity will come up from behind, creep up. And this has been done sometimes by Christians who try to practice the teachings of Christ without entering the state of consciousness out of which that comes. So they try to be pure and spiritual and good Christians and denied the other polarity, repressed it.

And then suddenly, they get overpowered by something deeply destructive and negative. So you have a nice, wonderful person who always talks in spirituals, just thoughts and spiritual. And before you know it, he's screaming at his wife or even hitting his wife.

Where did that come from? And he can't even admit to himself that this is what's happening. So if you push away certain thoughts because they do not fit into the mental image of who you are as this or that, then they get to assume a life of their own.

And before you know it, they invade your mind again, if only in your dreams. And suddenly, you have dreadful nightmares. During the day, you're such a spiritual person.

And at night, you suddenly have dreadful nightmares, monsters come, or you become a monster. Oh my God, this shouldn't be happening. And that's because you're pushing something away.

The true spiritual does not lie in one thought or another thought. It lies in being there as the space for your thoughts. Then it doesn't matter anymore, really.

Whatever thought arises is no more than that. It's a form that arises at this moment. You don't resist it.

You don't need to resist it. But you are the space for it. You don't become it.

Somebody sent me a sticker to put on the car. I haven't put it on my car yet. A very wise sticker.

I don't know where it originated. It says, you don't need to believe every thought you think. So this is the practice, then, of being the space or the witness for your thoughts rather than being the thought.

And you can practice with your opinions. Many thoughts are actual. All thoughts could be called opinions, but there are certain things that are definitely, clearly recognizable as opinions when you are talking to people every day, when you're having a discussion or talk with friends or colleagues or neighbors.

So they will express their opinion, whatever it may be about, and you may express your opinion. And you can then observe whether or not there is self-identification with your opinion. And your opinion, of course, is a mental position, the position of the mind.

Are you identified with a mental position? If you are, then you are cherishing opinions in the words of the Zen master, or you are clinging to ideas in the words of Lao Tse. And how do you know that?

You know that when, as you discuss things, you become either defensive or aggressive in the expression of your opinion. Emotion flows into, and you get worked up in, why is that happening? Why are you becoming defensive or aggressive?

And of course, you have to look inside yourself to see whether this is the case or not. Are you becoming defensive or aggressive? You feel the influx of emotion.

And why is this happening? Because unconsciously, you feel threatened by somebody who attacks or questions or contradicts your mental position. Why do you feel threatened by somebody who questions your mental position?

That is a sign that you had identified with a mental position. And identified means your sense of self was in it. So the person is not attacking your opinion in your unconscious viewpoint.

The person you're being attacked in your very life is being, is under attack. Because you identified this, this is not true, but this is how it is perceived, as if they were attacking your very existence. Because you identified with a mental position, there was a self in it.

So anybody who questions it, questions your very existence. It's unconscious process. So that's an amazing thing to realize in yourself.

And it's a deep seated unconscious pattern in most human beings. And of course, as you become conscious of that, you can usually see it much more clearly in others, more easily in your friend or whoever you're having, then in yourself. Usually says, oh, yes, that's what he always does.

Of course, now I understand what my husband or my wife does. I understand completely. That's step one.

This questioner here asks, what if one is secretly angry at God? And I assume the questioner is secretly angry at God. And if you look more closely, you'll see that there are certain thoughts associated with it that create the anger.

Now, what if that's what you want to experience? Is that pleasant? When those thoughts arise, whatever the thoughts say, God neglected me, treated me unfairly.

For some people, it's God. For other people, they call it life. Life treated me unfairly.

I didn't deserve this. Why do other people get all the breaks? I never get any.

To meditate successfully, the idea that you're doing a meditation can be quite an obstacle. So maybe that's the first thing we can get rid of tonight. The preconceptions and the expectations that come with that term.

So why did we call it guided meditation? Well, we had to use some word to get you here. Yes.

Yes. Meditation is usually something that you do among many other things. Doing implies all kinds of things.

It implies time. Even future, to some extent. And yet, true meditation, if you even want to call it that, and it's better not to call it anything, is not to do with doing.

It's not a doing. It's the realization that you are of being, which underlies all doing. It's prior to all doing.

Thoughts, emotions is prior to that. The simple realization, not the realization who you are, because there can be so many perspectives on that, not the realization how you fit into the totality of the cosmos, how that seemingly little life fleeting existence fits into the totality somewhere. Not realizing how I fit into the whole.

It's impossible to comprehend. But an alignment with the totality, without the need to mentally understand anything, is a realization, a simple realization that you are, which is expressed in the sublime words, I am. I am.

And if you've missed elementary grammar at school, you might not realize that I am is the first person singular of the verb to be. Now you think it's two completely different words. The realization that you are not as a concept, but as a deeper sensing of the life that you are.

The aliveness, the life. And something helpful to realize that is to pretend for one moment that there is no past and no future. I'm saying pretend so that everybody is still with me.

If I said, if I said there is no past and future, some of you might suddenly start thinking, just a second, aren't you going to sign books in an hour? And the moment you go into thinking, you're off into the realm of mind, the realm of things, object, objects in consciousness. Every thought is an object in consciousness and every thought has a pulling power.

That's how it arises. And it pulls your attention in and you start thinking, okay, but there is, I came here half an hour ago, there must be a past. I'm not realizing, of course, when you came here, it was the present moment.

And when the books are going to be signed, it will be the present moment because there is nothing else. Okay. But no need to believe that.

Let's pretend. Let's pretend for a moment that there is no past and future. Okay.

Or let's just say, past and future become peripheral to who you are. There's only this. That is the entry point into the realization I am.

[Speaker 12] (9:30:46 - 9:31:07)
Thank you for being such a great master, Master Eckhart. And my question is about music. What is music?

Somehow it does stop our minds. And why it is so important to us? Maybe about art in general also.

And what is your favorite kind of music?

[Speaker 1] (9:31:13 - 9:41:41)
Yes, it certainly stops the conceptual mind, although music exists at different levels. There's some kind of music that very much stimulates the emotions. That's not the mind, but the emotions.

The listening of music can be a wonderful meditation and practicing of music even more so. Do you play an instrument? But do you listen to music?

What kind? Classical, mostly. Classical music.

Yes, yes. Yes, there were several years, I don't know how many, maybe 15 years, when I listened to very little music. And why?

Because the strange thing, I actually said that to somebody at that time who asked me the similar question. And I said, no, I don't listen to music much. That was at that time.

Why not, she asked. Because it felt to me that all those things like music and art, they were all inside me in their, the essence of whatever music can express, I could continuously sense, well, I still can. I can continuously sense inside me.

And so I can appreciate music, I said to her at the time, but I don't need it. It's like I have the cream and everything else is the skimmed milk. But even nature I perceived as a skimmed milk.

I remember often sitting in nature and in a state of sometimes closing my eyes, especially when I was still living in London, I would go on Hampstead Heath every day, sit there on the bench and close my eyes. And such beauty and depths of the formless life itself or consciousness. And then when I opened my eyes again, nature was still very beautiful, but it seemed like a diluted version of what I had within or even what I was within.

Not that there's anything wrong with that. For many people, it can be an entry point into that. So it can take you into that.

Now, then the time came when I started listening to music again as an enjoyment. And I do now, perhaps not every day, but from time to time I listen to music. More recently on my iPad.

Although the speakers are very small, they're about that size on the side. But yes, and I actually enjoy some of the kind of spiritual kind of music, some new age music. Some of it I love very much.

Some of it can be a little bit tinkly and emotional or superficial, but other kinds of new age music I love very much. And the other day I found a station, I think Kim found it. It's called Calm Radio.

And I believe it may even be Canadian. And Calm Radio has many channels. Well, there's one station and you can choose the type of music you like and it will play that classical oriental music, OM music, healing music, spa music, folk music, classical music, opera.

So many channels, just wonderful. Yes, the practice of an instrument also can be a wonderful meditation for many people because it really stops your mind. The important thing, however, it can be helpful, is not for presence to become associated with any particular activity.

The activity can be helpful, but at some point you have to see, use it as a help, like playing an instrument, the flute, whatever it may be. If I learned an instrument, I would probably take up the flute. It looks, it's a simple thing, although not easy probably to master.

This is the, I'm now playing the soundless flute. The equivalent of one hand clapping. Not to become dependent on a particular activity so that you can be present although for a while it can be helpful, but not to become dependent on either, although use it as a tool to help you, yes, but don't become dependent on listening to music so that you can be present only when you listen to music.

Don't become dependent on playing the instrument or dancing, beautiful thing too, moving your body. Don't become dependent so that you can only be present when you're actually dancing. Well, at least it's a wonderful thing.

You can be present when you dance, but you can't dance continuously. Well, unless you regard your whole life as a dance, then it might work. Don't become dependent on climbing a mountain so that you can be present because if you're not, you fall off.

Don't become dependent on driving a fast car. Oh, really present and so that presence is not bound up with one particular thing that you do, but nevertheless, use those things as helpful ways of bringing you into presence, but then once more presence arises, switch off the music. It doesn't mean you can't switch it on again an hour later or tomorrow.

Switch off the music. If music brings you into presence, the mind is not, there's just the pure act of listening and you're aware that there's a pure act of listening and you are the consciousness, you know yourself as the consciousness that's listening. Beautiful meditation.

And then my next suggestion is switch off the music and continue listening. To what? Nothing.

So when you remove the object of awareness, what remains is awareness itself. So this is how it can be a wonderful portal. The same thing, any activity that brings you into presence, once you feel presence is arising, it's there, stop the activity and just be aware of presence itself.

And then you can carry, if you enjoy it, then carry on doing, and then again step out. So that's the, so that presence is not bound up with one particular activity or you can even, you can look at the, you can look at a photo of a spiritual teacher who is present to bring you into presence. Ramana Maharshi, there's one particular photo of him that is a beautiful photo where you actually truly feel the light shining through his eyes and that was where the photographer took that photo 1930 or so and the photographer said, Ramana Maharshi said, is there enough light?

The photographer said, you are the light. And that's a beautiful picture and the amazing thing, some people have even used pictures of me to look and you look, as long as you know you're not looking at a person, that's not why you have the photo. You're looking at, to put you in touch with a particular state of consciousness, you're ultimately looking at yourself, the essence.

So then a picture can activate that in you and then the next step is again, similar to what I said before, close your eyes or remove the picture and continue to feel that presence. So you can use whatever is there to help you but don't become dependent on it, whatever it may be, use it, enjoy it, but don't become dependent so that that then exclusively becomes associated with presence and then you can only be present when you put a little altar with Ramana Maharshi up and then some, but as soon as you go away. So enjoy the music.

[Speaker 14] (9:42:00 - 9:42:01)
Hi. Hi.

[Speaker 6] (9:42:03 - 9:42:30)
The hardest word that I'm having trouble with right now is responsibility and I have a hunch that most of the things that I consider responsibility are just my ego telling me things I have to do but I also, when I think about the future of the earth and human evolution and stuff like that, sometimes I have big emotions of responsibility so I'm just curious. Thank you. About the right relationship to the word responsibility.

[Speaker 1] (9:42:30 - 9:49:58)
Okay. Thank you. Yeah, it's a strange word.

It has been pointed out that if you look at the word it seems to be talking about the ability to respond. So, to take responsibility for what is it that you can take responsibility for primarily it's taking responsibility for your state of consciousness which determines what kind of world you create. You, because you are humanity.

Humanity is an abstract concept, doesn't exist. Humanity is the human being. You are humanity.

So for humanity to take responsibility you need to take primarily responsibility for your state of consciousness because only a diseased or dysfunctional state of consciousness produces a diseased and dysfunctional world out there. By world I mean the human-made world that is, has been imposed on the what's already there, the planet which is potentially, of course, a paradise. The planet pristine, unbelievable jewel.

A being of great intelligence. We are not separate from it. But the being is going through a transitional process and every transitional process is critical.

It may or may not work in which case the being will go some other way. But the your state of consciousness determines what kind of world you create, what kind of action you take and what consequences your actions have. So here this is why my main work is to address the cause of dysfunction which lies in the human mind.

The dysfunction of the human mind or as it is sometimes called in Zen the sickness of the human mind. So as I see it and I don't anybody who reads history can doubt it there is a deep-seated dysfunction in humans has been there for thousands of years and if we know if there's no shift in that then the dysfunction will destroy us. It probably won't destroy the planet because the planet has enormous resources but it will take a while would take a while for the planet to recover.

All you have to do then is primarily take responsibility for your state of consciousness now. Now. Now.

And this is what the entire teaching really is about. What is what is my state of consciousness at this moment? Am I generating disturbance?

Am I generating negativity? Am I generating conflict and suffering for myself and others? Am I generating inner pollution?

Am I polluting my beautiful the beautiful being that I am with continuous absurd movements of thought producing negative emotions producing an entire entity that is illusory that I call the me. So to take responsibility it needs to be just of course an awakening where you can say okay I will take responsibility now. Some people don't know that there is even the possibility of taking responsibility that's why you are so important.

Anybody who realizes it this is you are the beginning of the transformed world. I don't know who first coined the famous phrase you hear it quite often these days you need to be the change that the change that you want to see out there you need to embody that. And that's not primarily what you do there's something more primary than what you do it's who you are.

Who you are is your state of consciousness whatever you do flows out of that. So that's the primary is that so the change is the transformed state of consciousness now that is your responsibility anybody once you've seen that that's your responsibility now you know it. People who are not yet at that level don't realize it and that's fine you can't expect the whole world already to be at that stage it's enough for you to take responsibility knowing there's still a few millions others who don't know that they can take responsibility because they live in such unconsciousness that they see the entire evil in others what they see as evil it's all in them and they make half the world into their enemy it's all out there they're still you don't that's fine your response it's only those are required to take responsibility you who are up to it but even those who are totally unconscious still on the one hand they don't know what they're doing obviously as Jesus said on the cross they know not what they do in other words they are in the grip of unconscious forces or unconscious mental emotional streams they don't know what they do they cannot be held responsible and people say well they should be held responsible no they can't but they don't know what they do however the fact that they are not responsible because they can't be responsible does not mean that they do not suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness so they generate suffering and eventually suffering is the fire in which the ego gets burned up the collective ego and the personal ego that's the long way the slow way the painful way and then there is a shortcut which is any spiritual teaching is just it cuts through that the painful way the long way of waking up more and more suffering the planet might not endure that such a long learning process for humanity so if the learning process of humanity does not become shortened it is doubtful that the planet can allow the humanity to learn

through further learning[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 0:15) further suffering for another 500 years, or even 200 years, or even 100 years. So that's, you're responsible for all that.

[Speaker 6] (0:23 - 0:26)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (0:49 - 6:19)
What is self? Now I notice that it's spelled with a capital S, I don't know whether that's a mistake or on purpose. Probably on purpose.

There's one self, that's the illusion, that is the identification with the mind and the ego, which is the unobserved mind, and there's a self that arises there that is a dreadful burden to live with. You carry around, most people for their whole life they carry the burden of a mentally defined sense of who they are, me, what about me? That's the little self, the illusory self, and that's the self that most people refer to when they say I.

But I potentially has a deeper meaning and is the deepest word perhaps we could say in the language, in its truest sense, I refers to who you are beyond the form, beyond the thoughts and the emotions. You as the consciousness is the self. Now the self has no form, you cannot grasp it, you cannot see it, you cannot really define it, you can never say, ah, there it is.

Because who is saying that? You are the consciousness, the perceiving, you are it. You can never see it as an object external to yourself, it's the essence, you are not what is seen, you are the seeing, you are the consciousness behind the seeing.

You are not what you hear, you are the consciousness behind what you hear. So it's never, this is what Jesus said when he used the term the kingdom of heaven or the kingdom of God, he said in one of the gospels, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be observed. You cannot say, ah, here it is or ah, it's over there.

It's a free translation more or less, that's what he said. And of course, what do Christians do? They're waiting for the kingdom of heaven to arrive.

When they've been told, you won't be able to see it. You can't say, ah, there it is, it does not come with signs to be observed, literally he said that. It's, and I'm sure that's one of the, there's a lot of things that people later put into his mouth, but that is one of the things, the words that were uttered by somebody who knew the reality.

It doesn't come with signs to be observed. You can never see it or grasp it or know it as an object for your knowledge. Because you essentially are it as the consciousness that perceives, the consciousness behind your thinking, behind your emotions, behind your perceptions, behind your experiences, the very light of the world.

Another thing he said, he not only said, Jesus, I am the light of the world, he said also you are the light of the world. So he's pointing, what is the light? It's the light of consciousness which illuminates the world.

You are that, that is the self. It has no form. Therefore it seems that Buddhism and Buddhists and Hindus are in disagreement, but only those who haven't realized the reality behind their teachings, those Buddhists and Hindus who have not really realized the reality behind their teachings, they are in disagreement and they have arguments whether there is self or no self, atman, anatman.

The Hindus believe in atman, that the existence of self, the fundamental underlying reality, and the Buddhists say no, anatman, no self. And then whenever you see a Hindu and a Buddhist discussing, perhaps even with negative emotions, whether one or the other is true, then you'll know that they haven't experienced, they haven't known the reality behind the teaching, because the reality behind the teaching is exactly the same, it's just a different perspective on the same. The Buddhists like to deny, they don't want to give it, call it something, as if the moment you call it, you say the self, the danger is that you make it into a mental object and start believing in it.

The Buddhists don't like that, so they say there is no self, which in a way is true also, there is nothing that you could say, there it is, it is an empty space almost, you could say, but it's potential fullness also, it's full and empty at the same time. It's all the same, the self, and that's why the Dalai Lama I saw giving a talk a while ago to Hindus and he said, you believe in atman and we believe in anatman, what does it matter? And he laughed, ah, ah, ah, makes no difference, ah, ah, ah, that's a good answer.

[Speaker 4] (6:46 - 6:59)
Hi, my question has two parts, it's what is the purpose of mental illness, how can something that is consciousness depriving have its necessary place and function?

[Speaker 1] (7:02 - 7:08)
Somebody, perhaps it was me, probably said that everything has its necessary place.

[Speaker 6] (7:08 - 7:09)
Yes. Okay.

[Speaker 1] (7:23 - 18:01)
Now, in the larger context, if you look around the world, it's not only mental illness which exists in different gradations, mental illness in its acute form where it is recognized as mental illness, mental illness in its less acute form where we call it neurosis, whatever, and mental illness, well, neurosis already is normal, so mental illness in its normal form which is normal human consciousness and the world is full of consciousness, seemingly consciousness blocking events, all the suffering, you say, what purpose could that possibly have? For example, you could say, what purpose could human beings killing each other in the 20th century alone, human beings killing 100, not 100 million as I said in the Power of Now, that was a mistake, I've realized later, but closer to 170 million people killed in the 20th century alone, humans killing other humans, 170 million, nobody knows the exact figure, but that's, 170 million killed, what purpose can that possibly have?

You can ask also that all that suffering can't possibly have a purpose, can it? And then all the other things that you have, young children dying in accidents or illnesses, all kinds of things that seem to be blocking consciousness, people trapped in dreadful conditions, slave-like conditions still in many parts of the world and it was like that until recently even in the Western world, trapped and not totally deprived of freedom, all these things that seem to block the arising of the flowering of consciousness, particularly if you look at it in isolation, but it does seem that first of all, a misperception arises when we look at a human being as if he or she were an entirely autonomous entity, in other words, as if he or she, the life that he or she has were his or her own life. Because then you see, you then look at everybody as an autonomous life form without realizing that all life forms and all humans are a temporary expression of the one life, the life in you or in me or the consciousness in you is the consciousness in me, the same consciousness expressing itself in a different form. And there is something happening in this universe which is consciousness coming into the world of form and expressing itself more and more fully through the world of form, but it is always the one consciousness, assuming billions of life forms constantly.

But the human thinks, that's me, that's my life. No, it's life. It's not my consciousness.

I don't have my consciousness. It's the one consciousness, the one in the many. So all life is one.

So when something seemingly dreadful happens, all life is one. On one level, it is always dreadful. Nobody can say that humans killing 180 million of their fellow humans is not dreadful on that level.

But if you go to a deeper level, you see that something is emerging and for some reason it is through, in many cases, seemingly being blocked here and there, that the consciousness is emerging more fully. That also has its place. You can't see it when you look at individual cases, but when you look at the totality of consciousness wanting to emerge yet finding seemingly obstacles everywhere, but it's through the obstacles that the flowering actually happens.

And so you might say, oh, isn't it unfair that this person represents a greater obstacle than another person? But the essence of any person is the one consciousness. So nothing is lost ever.

And in so-called mental illness, there's also something to be learned by the one consciousness. What it is, I don't know, but I do know that many mental, a certain percentage of mental illnesses are arising of consciousness that has gone slightly wrong, that isn't quite, or is unrecognized. There are people in India who have become saints and masters who would have been put in a mental home in the West, because the West doesn't recognize certain things, the spiritual arising.

And fortunately, they were not born in the West, but there are probably many people in the West. I'm not saying that all mental illness is a misinterpretation, a non-recognition of awakening process, but ultimately everything is part of the awakening process. And why do I know all these things?

You know things by looking at your own life. And I know that all the things that seem to block the full arising of consciousness in my life, and I'm sure you can find the same in your life, all the seeming obstacles to living a life of fullness and ease and greater awareness, ultimately, all those things are part of the awakening and those things actually led to the arising, to the awakening. When I look at my own life, and my own life is only a microcosm of the collective, it must be.

And I see all the blockages and all the suffering actually was part of the awakening, without which it would not have happened. And collectively, the suffering of humanity in so many forms is also unfortunately a necessary part of the awakening, but realize that what we see as somebody's personal identity is not who they are. They are an expression of the one which is constantly finding new channels through which to express itself in this world.

So if this channel is blocked, we see it as a person who is suffering. That's also true on one level. And of course, you help if you are there, you give whatever help you can, that's part of it.

But this, that personal sense of self is ultimately an illusion. And because who you are is ultimately timeless and beyond the person. So I know that if I had not encountered all these seeming blockages in my life, I wouldn't be sitting here now.

And if you had not suffered what you suffered, you wouldn't be here now. And so the obstacles to the arising of consciousness are ultimately part of the arising consciousness. And there's only one life.

And that's a liberating thing to know, that the life in you, the life in me is the one life. And if I die at this moment, nothing is really lost. If you die, nothing is lost.

So we need to get away from the misperception that you have your life and it's a unique thing and you are an expression of the one and everybody is. And so humanity as a whole is awakening. And there's a term in the Bible which says the birth pangs of the new age, the birth pangs, before giving birth there's a pain.

So these are the birth pangs of the awakening. And it all, if you could see the totality, that also would make sense. It doesn't mean that killing 180 million is okay.

Recognizing that it is insanity is part of the awakening. The recognition of that as insanity, that collective part of the collective insanity, that's part of the awakening. Does that make sense?

[Speaker 8] (18:10 - 18:10)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (18:27 - 33:39)
And ultimately, if there is a true message, that includes angels or angelic presences, it always boils down to find out who you truly are. Find your connectedness with the source of all life. Well, some people seem to have contact with different entities that are not physically embodied.

And there's no doubt that there are entities that are not physically embodied. There are lots of guides, those entities who are also pretending to be somebody else. And the main criterion is what is the quality of the information that you are getting?

Rather than trying to figure out who they really are. And this also applies to so-called channeling, when this is still quite popular, I suppose, in some places more than in others. In the States there's a town called Sedona, which is a New Age kind of, in Arizona, a New Age town, where it seems every other inhabitant channels some kind of spirit guide.

So I have seen many channeled writings, and a large percentage of them seems not all that relevant to anything. Small percentage, yes, there's something there. A prominent example is the Course in Miracles, which is not for everybody, but it is a high quality text, scripture, whatever you want to call it.

And that was definitely channeled, because the person who wrote it had an inner dictation, and she wrote down what she heard. She did not fully understand what the dictation was saying, and she couldn't live it, the teaching, and yet the book was produced. You may have heard the saying, as far as deceased people are concerned, some people think when people, at the moment they are deceased, they know everything.

But there's a saying that goes, just because they are dead doesn't mean they are smart. So, whether you do channeling, or you go to somebody who does channeling, who goes, the eyes usually close, and they go, this is so and so talking to you. And whether or not it's genuine, listen to the quality of the teaching, if it is a teaching, the words, is it truly, is it just, is it fictitious, could it be information that you have to believe in, and they could say anything, and does it make any difference to your life whether or not what they say is right or wrong.

Perhaps they're talking about life on those distant planets and what happens there. Could be a science fiction novel, as far as you are concerned, but some people are so impressed by the fact that these are channeled entities, they go, okay, and then what happens on those planets? Or they identify themselves as big entities from outer space.

Who knows? Ashta, my name is Ashta, commander of the galactic fleet, and I have come here to guide you. Okay, so what do you have to say?

And ultimately, if there is a true message, that includes angels or angelic presences, it always boils down to find out who you truly are, find your connectedness with the source of all life. All true answers will come from within you, and whatever I say, verify it in your own experience, don't believe me. If you cannot verify it in your own experience, then it's not relevant.

This is what the true guide would say. So the great scriptures of the world, they're not the author, some are anonymous. There's a difference between spirit guide and teaching that comes from a deep connectedness of the teacher with the source.

In that case, the teacher does not feel that it comes from an entity, but it comes from the source. And if an entity gives you information, where do they get that from? From the one consciousness.

So it may well be that this entity is more closer, more deeply connected to that one consciousness, but they are not separate consciousnesses, there's only one consciousness. And every guide, the one consciousness can only speak through any guide, no matter who it is, whether it's an angel or a deceased person, or Ashtar, commander of the galactic fleet, there's only one consciousness that can speak through them. And the essence of their message needs to be, if it is to be true, find out who you are in your essence, and then begin to live from the essence of who you are.

So use your own insight, and I believe you will be able to tell whether what they say is helpful or not. At the moment, I can only think of causing miracles, that's of a high quality. There was a time when there was Seth, the writings of Seth, the woman channeled, an entity called Seth.

Some of that is interesting and has some helpful things there. It doesn't necessarily go to the deepest level. Nevertheless, there's some useful information there, but not at the deepest level.

What's interesting is that when I speak, I don't feel that some other entity speaks through me, but I do realize that this is not the person speaking. This is consciousness using the mind, this person's mind as a vehicle, and consciousness speaks through me. In that sense, what I say is also channeled.

Also, I don't know what I'm going to say next, and most of the time, I don't know, even before I talk, what words are going to come out of my mouth. And that connectedness is important. That is the connectedness with the source, with being, with stillness, with presence, whatever you want to call it.

And that you have that available to you also, you might not give public talks, or you might at some point, and some of you already do. But in whatever area you are active in, to be connected to the source will empower you in whatever area you are active in and will make your work much more helpful to others and more empowered. You become more inspired, and you become an inspiration for others, even if you are just, even if you sell tickets, cinema tickets, or whatever, it doesn't matter.

Everything becomes transformed through your connectedness with source. But to have that, the vital thing is to be able to access the space of no thought. And that, and another way of calling that space of no thought, which I sometimes express by, because it's an inner space, thinking, thinking, thinking, you remember?

And then you go, shh, present. That's the space of no thought. So in order to have the connectedness with source, you need to open up that space of no thought.

Alertness, relaxed alertness. It seems almost paradoxical, but they go together. Relaxed alertness.

And you could also call that becoming comfortable with not knowing. Because otherwise, your mind always thinks it knows already. So when you're trying to help somebody, somebody has a problem, often people will immediately try to say something helpful.

They think hard, okay, what can I say to this person who is so suffering so much? I need to say something helpful. And you search in your mind.

And usually, it's not that great. And it's not, and it's not well received by the person. And it's not that helpful.

They might say, okay, thanks. But they feel it doesn't come from any deep place within yourself. All your intentions are good.

You're trying hard to say something helpful. But to be really helpful, you need to become comfortable with not knowing anything. And that because the space of no thought is, you don't know anything in the space of no thought, at least not conceptually.

The miracle is that in the space of no thought, you access the source of all knowledge. But it hasn't reached concepts yet. It's potential.

It's potential of all knowledge, the primary source. So many people are actually afraid of going there, because they're afraid of not knowing. And so they need to keep thinking.

So if you can, somebody comes to you, let's presume, let's assume you have practiced already beforehand not knowing, for example, by not labeling compulsively everything around you, but actually be present with a tree, with a sky, with another person. And so you, you almost, another way of putting it, you almost disappear as a person in that state of no thought. Because in no thought, who are you?

You're simply a presence. You're not a particular person anymore. So it's a voluntary kind of disappearing act where you as the personal entity disappear.

And there's just a space of consciousness where you were before. This sometimes happens to people who suffer greatly. They suffer so much that their ego gets destroyed and eroded.

And what's left is just a presence. And you, this could happen to you, but probably won't need to happen because you're already voluntarily going there. So life doesn't need to push you into it.

So to become comfortable with not knowing, let's say a person is comes to you with, is in suffering again, or is close to death, or somebody has just died, or they have just lost everything, whatever it may be. Or of course, it could be pseudo suffering too. It could just be a suffering totally created by their mind.

No actual situation, just totally mind created. In which case, I naturally always have a little smile on my face. I'm not laughing at them.

I'm just smiling because I realize it's a delusion. But let's assume it's real suffering. Somebody has just died or is approaching death, or has an illness.

And then instead of figuring out what can I say, you just go still. And you just listen. And it may be that no words come.

But an energy, you contributed an energy to that situation that is helpful, that is healing. Some healing comes in, healing, the deepest healing really comes in that way too. When you access that, it's not always words that come out of that space.

Sometimes a wordless emanation comes out of that space, which some people might call healing. And healing is not necessarily healing of a physical symptom. There's a deeper level of healing that helps that other person to connect with the deepest source within themselves.

And that's really the true, the ultimate and true healing. So when I was many years ago, I was many, many years ago, I was beginning to work with people who came to me for advice and counseling and so on. And I was always naturally becoming very still.

So that's, and it all came out of that. I never knew the answer beforehand. Just get still and listen.

Oh.

[Speaker 1] (33:42 - 53:16)
And I may have told the story before. For a while, I thought I was a healer because that was early on after my shift in consciousness when I didn't understand much. So I was sitting with this woman who had been a Catholic nun for 15 years and then left the order because she hadn't found God yet.

And she came to me and I was sitting in that state of not knowing, but being comfortable with not knowing, not being uncomfortable with not knowing because that's not pleasant and then it gets blocked immediately. And she said she could feel the energy suddenly that was flowing and she'd, oh, you are doing healing. You're a healer.

I said, oh, that's what I am. And I thought, oh, so that's what this energy is. And then for a couple of years, the word must have spread.

People called me a healer and some people came for physical healing and some people had a pain there and the foot was hurting and can you heal my foot? Well, I don't know. And so I, and then I realized after two years, most people who then came were just interested in getting rid of certain symptoms.

They were not interested in a deeper healing. So I made an announcement as I am not a healer. So consciousness to me is the emanation of God, like the light of the sun, which expresses itself as the universe.

The essence of every human is immortal because the one life is beyond life and death. It's eternal. It's only in this dimension that time seems to be real.

So God expresses itself as you. One of the challenges I faced when I first started reading your books and in the experience I was going through at the time is something that everyone in here shares, the experience of losing someone they love. So a lot of things, if you lose them, you might even say your money, a spiritualist might say, well, that's probably a good thing.

You'll be in a better place when you realize you don't need money. But when you lose a child or a spouse, being present, how do you be present with that and make everything okay? Because sometimes it's not okay.

It will never be okay again. But some people might feel like their lives are over. I don't have that thing that I love.

How do you deal with that? Yes. Deep loss, whether it's through somebody close to you who died, or there's also a sense of deep loss if a long relationship, like a marriage that lasted for a long time suddenly comes to an end.

It's also a kind of death. And so there can be the emotions that then arise of sadness. You may find yourself periodically, it comes in waves, periodically you cry and the deep emotion of sadness comes.

The important thing is to, you know, to be bring acceptance to what has happened. At first it may be difficult. The first thing you cannot accept the death or the loss, but that's okay.

But what you can do is you can accept the emotions that you feel at this moment. It's natural. You don't feel, oh, I shouldn't be.

No, you should. This is natural. So you accept that there's this deep sadness and that it comes in waves and you cry.

And then gradually you realize certain things that everything in this world is, as the Buddhists say, is impermanent. If you live with a partner, soon or later, he or she will leave you or you will leave him or her because one of you will die first. So everything, there's an impermanence built into everything in life.

Nothing lasts forever. And the sense perceived universe is not as solid as it seems to be. The structures are not as solid as they appear.

If you live in a Western country, you often get the impression that everything is, there's a solidity to the external world. If you go to other, another country like India, you realize that things are not as solid as they are in the world. Even the buildings look a bit shaky and things are not as organized.

Things don't work very well. You see in many third world countries, you see old and decrepit people in the street, which in the West very rarely see because old people and sick people are in buildings. They are kept away.

They say they are looked after, okay. But you don't get a real sense of the reality of life in the West because old age and madness and sickness, I'm not saying they shouldn't be, but the fact is people who are approaching death, unless they are close relatives and you visit them, you don't see them. In a third world, this is everywhere around you.

So you get more of a sense of the nature of the fleetingness of human life, of every human life. Also, all these things that you have life insurance here and you think there's a solid foundation to your existence. It's not anything good that could happen any moment.

Life insurance is an illusion. It's fine. It has a function on a practical level, but really, first of all, it should be called death insurance because it's about death.

It's not about life. But if you called it death insurance, nobody would want to buy it. So there's a fleeting sense of the nature of life in the West.

So you get a sense of that. First, you come to a sense of acceptance of it and when it happens, first you accept the emotions that you feel and then you may be able to accept that this has happened without too much of imposing a narrative on it. Although you could, depending on your beliefs, because you may believe that the essence of who they are has not died and in a way that is, I would suggest, the truth because the essence of a human being, you can see so clearly that if you look at a dead body, you can see so clearly that that body was never the true being that was there.

The essence is gone, that human being. And so some people can even feel that that person is still there, the essence of that person is still there. So I want to, but I'd like to be able to suggest that even without having any particular belief, you can still come to an acceptance of the short-lived nature of all forms so that you do not, the period of mourning after great loss is natural and should be allowed to happen, but if you then impose a narrative on that, which is negative, that can prolong the sadness that you feel for many, many years or the anger that you feel about it, you feel that it is unjust that this happened and so on, which are all mental judgments, and then it is normal for a period of sadness where they'd last a few months or a year or two years, and then you practice surrender. And surrender is really the deeper acceptance, surrender to the is-ness of life. There's a story of the Buddha, a mother came to the Buddha and said, was weeping because a child had died and was asking for advice, the Buddha, and the Buddha says, okay, I'll tell you what to do in this village or town where you live, go from one house to another and ask them whether they have ever had a death in their family and then come back to me.

So she went from one house to another, it took several days, and then she came back to the Buddha and there was a relief because in every house that she came to, she had heard, they confirmed that yes, they had also experienced people dying. Yes, yes, yes. And the Buddha said, and suddenly she was able to come to an acceptance, to surrender.

But in that surrender, there is a strange realization comes. Surrender means you're not judging this anymore as good or bad, you just accept the is-ness of that. In that, I experienced it when my parents died, both in the same year, although they didn't even live together and didn't even live in the same country.

They were divorced many years ago, but they both died within six months of each other. So in that year, I had the two, there was the death of my mother in the summer and the death of my dad in the fall. So twice I sat with first my mom's dead body, and then a few months later with my dad's dead body, and there were tears, I cried, then they subsided, then tears came again, subsided, and I sat with the dead body, and suddenly I could sense this deep peace underneath the sadness.

So there was both the sadness, but with the surrender came also a deep peace. And that peace was something feeling my own essence. But in feeling my own essence in this, and this is really what we've been talking about today also, getting in touch with that, the deepest level in you, which is cannot be seen.

There's a beautiful quote from a French book, what is essential is invisible to the eye. Whatever is essential is invisible to the eye. So what I see in a human being, I see the body, and I see whatever their mind, the words I hear, whatever I perceive is their mind and their body, their personality, but the essential thing about the human being is deeper than that.

The essential thing about me is deeper than any thought or any emotion, it's consciousness itself. And so in that peace that I felt underneath the sadness, I could also feel the essence of my mother and father as a deathless essence, and I don't even want to say whether reincarnation or no reincarnation, but every human being is like a spark of the divine. I see consciousness that is the essence of every human being, of every being, is like a ray of, if you take the analogy of God, let's say in this analogy God is the sun, and as you know in the past, in other cultures they worship the sun, because the sun is life-giving, it gives force of itself continuously, it gives and gives, it pours out energy continuously, and every life on this planet is the life of the sun. The warmth in your body comes from the sun, it's calories. So the sun is in you, the sun is can be used therefore as an analogy in the sense-perceived universe for God, which of course God is not in the sense-perceived universe, God transcends the sense-perceived universe or anything we could imagine, even talk about, and yet I'm talking about it.

And then you have the sun, then you have the sunlight, the sunlight comes from the sun, and the sunlight gives life to everything here. Now is the sunlight separate from the sun? No, it's an extension of the sun, it's not a separation, you can't even say exactly where the sun ends, it has no surface as such, so you could say that the sun ends wherever the light of the sun ends, which would be beyond the earth.

So this is an analogy then for what to me God is, and what consciousness is, to me the consciousness that is the essence of every being, oh by the way, consciousness to me also manifests in every life form, that to me solid, so-called inanimate matter is like frozen consciousness, plant life is like consciousness in a different state, the human mind is like water, you can have water in different states, you can have water as ice, you can have water as liquid, you can have water as vapor, so consciousness can exist in many different states, but the entire life is an expression of the one consciousness which emanates from the source, from God, the central intelligence of all life, and so every human is an expression, a temporary expression of the central intelligence of all life, briefly, very brief, I mean on a cosmic scale every human life is a flicker, if you could see the planet, humans on the planet, a human life on the planet on a cosmic scale, one human life would go like, just a spark, and it's gone, and so there are billions of sparks on the planet, the one consciousness continuously expressing itself in forms, but of course we attach names to the sparks, so the essence of all life is really divine, consciousness is not God, in the same sense that the light is not the sun, and yet it is, so consciousness to me is the emanation of God, like the light of the sun, which expresses itself as the universe, and so as that, the essence of every human is immortal, because the one life is beyond life and death, it's eternal, God is eternal, it's not subject to time, it's only in this dimension that time seems to be real, so God expresses itself as you, as me, as even as the dog in a different form, as the flower, these are expressions of the one, and then when you recognize that, now does this particular expression of the one, which is a human being in a human body, does this particular expression of the one still continue in its seemingly separate, individualized state, even after the body has dissolved, so does this particular expression of consciousness that is you, or somebody close to you who died, does this particular expression of consciousness still continue to express itself as a particularized expression of consciousness, or does it immediately go back to the one consciousness, this is something that one can look at, my suggestion would be that for a while it continues on its journey as a seemingly separate entity, even after one particular body has dissolved, so in other words, it's not immediately absorbed in the oneness again, it continues for a while, as perhaps other separate existences, the journey continues, and so in that way, the universe becomes more and more conscious, now God exists in a transcendent dimension that is timeless, so in that sense, God does not need to become more conscious, but when God expresses itself in our dimension here, there is a seeming evolution of consciousness, in other words, one could say that God gradually is expressing him, her, itself, gradually, more and more fully in this dimension, and I think what I've just said now is the most one could say, because I've already said too much, because the mystery of the universe cannot be contained in words. Questioner Hello.

[Speaker 3] (53:47 - 54:25)
My question is about charisma. It seems to be a phenomenon that we all recognize, but unlike embodying stillness, it doesn't seem to have an intrinsic, be intrinsically good or bad. We can say that Nelson Mandela has charisma, but Adolf Hitler must also have had charisma.

So my question is, what is the energy or the force behind charisma? Is it something that you're born with? Is it something that you can learn?

Ajahn Brahm Thank you. Thank you. You better sit down.

Yes, that's a very strange thing, isn't it? Some people seem to have some kind of emanation as personal power or something, sometimes people call it. Hitler probably had it, but other people who seem the opposite on the opposite polarity also had it.

Angela Merkel does not have it, and yet Angela Merkel is better for Germany than Hitler, much better. It seems that some people, at some point, they access something, a source of power, and I believe charisma is a manifestation of what is traditionally called chi or shakti or whatever. It's an inner power that comes and emanates through the person, and you may remember that I wrote somewhere that chi is the bridge between the unmanifested and the world of form.

So the unmanifested is totally beyond form, and then out of the unmanifested form is born, and forms also return into the unmanifested, but as I'm talking about something that is totally beyond words and becomes distorted, of course, and reduced the moment you talk about it, but let's do it anyway. So there's the unmanifested, and then the energy comes out. I would say that's what the beginning of the creative process, the energy that is the creative energy that then goes and creates form in this world, mental formation first, then physical formations, and there we have the energy in its half form-like state and half unformed state, which is chi, and some humans, in some humans, they have access to the chi, they're not just manifestations of it, they can connect with it at an earlier stage, and so it sometimes happens to people who have, for example, Nelson Mandela, if he has charisma, it probably happened because he was in prison for many, many years, which probably forced him to go within very deeply because there was nowhere to go without. So it forced him to go within very deeply, and then there was a source of power that he contacted which is chi power, and that power then was able to, he manifested that when he left prison. That power is beyond good and evil.

There are spiritual teachers who have it very strongly, some of them, but just to be connected to chi is not a guarantee that you're free of ego. It's only when you go deeper than chi and touch the unmanifested and realize that who you essentially are is beyond anything that has form, and chi is already moving into the world of form. That is the only place where the ego dissolves.

There are people who are powerful transmitters of chi and still have a huge ego. There are spiritual teachers where people go to them and they say, oh, I can feel his energy, and they get addicted to the energy they feel, so they all come and go. It's not a guarantee.

It may well be that the teacher is free of ego, but there's no guarantee that he is, and in some cases it turns out that there's a huge ego. In fact, the ego can become energized and magnified by somebody who touches that halfway power in him or her. It can magnify the ego and then you become a very powerful Genghis Khan or Hitler or, I don't know, Stalin, maybe he also had it, who knows.

And everybody listens to you when you speak and you project this energy and you influence people and have power over people and you love it, you love the power you have over people. But in the end it leads to your destruction. It's like the genie that comes out of the bottle, but in the end you encounter disaster.

If you magnify the ego, the end result is always magnified disaster. You can't have a good outcome if whatever an amplified ego produces will create disaster sooner or later. So that's how Hitler and Stalin and all those people, and it all ended in disaster.

So some have it, some don't. Those who are at the deepest level, those who embody the spaciousness also have an emanation that sometimes is not detected as easily by other humans. You need to be attuned to it to feel it.

Just Qi can be a very raw energy. There are people who can project Qi through their hands, they can light a fire with their hands. You just project the energy out through your hands.

Are you free of ego? Who knows? Maybe not.

Maybe your ego loves being able to do that and you build up a big ego. Or maybe you are free. We don't know.

But that in itself is not spiritual attainment. It's a great power, but the spiritual only comes in as you go deeper so that you realize who you are instead of identifying with an energy stream of Qi and think that that becomes part of your sense of self, which would be a magnified ego. So if energy moves through you, there is a famous word in cities in Indian spirituality, they have a wider vocabulary than we have in the West to describe these phenomena.

People who go very deep within and touch and access the transcendent dimension, sometimes they manifest what is in conventional language called supernatural powers. Certain things happen around them, the strangest things, and these in India are called siddhis, they are supernatural powers that are a by-product sometimes, but not always, of the transcendent dimension. A by-product of deep spiritual realization.

And all the great teachers will tell you that do not pay too much attention to the siddhis, the powers that arise as by-products of the deepest realization. When they are there, it's fine. They are there, you can acknowledge it, welcome it.

If you get attached to them or identify with them, it will lead you back into ego. And the same thing the teacher will tell his followers, don't get too attached if you observe certain powers arising, that's ultimately not it, it's a by-product no more. It is not, to develop certain powers is not the aim of spiritual awakening, it's a by-product sometimes of spiritual awakening.

So that's important to realize and every, all true teachers will tell you that. So if I appear to you in two places simultaneously, if I'm here and then somebody else sees me in Los Angeles at the same time, don't pay any attention to that. And if you live in a false identity, a conceptual identity that you allow the world to tell you who you are, you allow the world to determine your worth, so you've stopped thinking, the ripple has stopped thinking, and in that at first there is a strange, I'm not thinking about who I am or my problems, and yet what is left here is just a presence.

And that means the ripple is becoming aware of a transcendent dimension that is deep. And that is the awakening of the ripple, and that is the awakening of the ripple. And that is actually the main purpose of your life, is to become aware of that, because that is the awakening of the human species.

And the human species is only one manifestation of the consciousness of the universe manifesting here as a human species. I'm sure there are others on other planets or galaxies who are also awakening, and your purpose is that. You may sometimes question whether your life is this weird notion of life.

How do you judge your life so far? Success? Failure?

Something in between? And of course it's, yes, it's nice to achieve something in this world, to create this or that, but it cannot tell you who you are. It always leaves a sense of lack ultimately behind, even if you can hang on to it until finally you die and you have to let go.

Or it leaves you, either you leave it or it leaves you, whatever it is. It leaves you or you leave it. And many things leave you before you die.

Achievements too, especially in the age of reputation can leave you, especially in the age of Twitter. One wrong tweet and your entire life is destroyed. And if you live in a false identity, a conceptual identity that you allow the world to tell you who you are, you allow the world to determine your worth, you look to the world and other people to tell you that you are good.

And if you allow the world to tell you that, then it's ultimately, you're trapped in a conceptual identity, that's me. And that can be destroyed. In the past you had to do a little bit more to destroy your reputation, but nowadays it's so easy.

Just tweet something and suddenly the hive mind will pounce on you and you have to say, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry. And you can't show your face in public again anywhere. Exaggerating only slightly.

But that's all, it's so fragile because it's a fictitious sense of self. It's a surface I. But to lose your reputation or to lose your possessions or to lose your position is a wonderful opportunity for realizing who you are beyond your position and your possession and your achievements.

Some people need that. It's a blessing for them to lose, not everybody needs it, but many people need to lose some things very significant in their lives in order to bring about, to initiate the awakening process. And retrospectively, many humans look back and say they're really grateful that they lost this, which they regard as irreplaceable and extremely valuable.

And with that loss they lost mostly most part of their identity was a fiction anyway, but they didn't know that. And that led to suffering, of course. So the loss of fictitious identity, which can happen to anybody, to some people it doesn't happen until they retire.

They had a particular job title and suddenly if you pack your bags and you look forward to, okay, now I can start living. But then suddenly you realize you're nobody, beyond your job description and your function that you fulfilled for decades, perhaps an important function, member of the board. And suddenly you're not a member of the board, you're just bored.

But you have been looking forward to the golfing or there's a lot of golfing around here. Nothing against golf, can be wonderful meditation, but you've been looking forward to the golfing or whatever it is, you're very tired and I can start living. And you do some golfing and then you sit there and do a bit more golfing, whatever it is.

But who are you suddenly? You don't get these phone calls anymore, only very occasionally. And this great sense of something missing arises, oh, I'm nobody suddenly.

Yeah, because your entire life, your entire identity was built upon a fiction, a conceptual edifice in your head. And everybody else confirmed its truthfulness, but it wasn't. So the loss can be great, a great, great help, but it can be, most of you are not in desperate need of a huge loss, or it might happen, the universe gives you what you need, because you've already voluntarily come here.

You have voluntarily embarked upon a course of, to put it in blunt and somewhat scary terms, a course of meditation. A course of self annihilation. But it was only the surface self, there was nothing real there.

So when you, for example, when you now, especially now during the COVID pandemic, especially in six months, when your practice is your inner state, the practice is becoming familiar with awareness, allowing awareness into your life, realizing that nothing is more important than that. And then the most important thing is, you discover your ability to refrain from thinking. It doesn't have to be long at first, just long.

Not just when you're meditating, say, okay, now I'm going to do a meditation. That's fine, it's good. But there's more, there's much more to it.

To refrain from thinking, in ordinary situations, when thinking is not required, simple thing like looking at flowers, looking around the room. Do you have to think while you look around the room? Or can you look around the room without thinking?

And who is looking when you're not thinking? Is the person looking when you have no labels for your perception? Or when you're listening to a bird or the sound of the ocean?

Or the sound of rain, which may be coming tomorrow? When you're listening to that, and you're not labeling it mentally, you're not saying anything about it, but there's an alert listening. Who is listening?

Are you then a person with a history and so on that's listening? Or is there a deeper eye that has emerged and the sensory perception is happening against the background of, or within the space of, that deep eye? So in that sense, you could say the universe is listening to itself.

And there is a, let's say there's the bird song, or there is the crushing of the waves, or there's the sound of the rain. And suddenly, that listening is an enormous addition to the universe. The universe is awakening to itself, its own depth, its own beauty, through you.

But you can only fulfill that function as part of the totality, the function of the awakening universe, if you're not excessively burdened and excessively trapped in your personalized sense of self. And because otherwise you carry the burden of your self, the surface self, the little self, but the little self can feel very huge. It occupies your entire mental and emotional space.

And it sings about itself, and it talks about itself, and it moans about itself. I am the most important thing in the universe. He's me and the rest of the universe.

Oh dear. And now, how do you become free of, how do you step out of this, the trap, the prison of the self? As the Buddha just called it, the self.

Jesus also called it the self. It's not a very well-known fact, because they don't understand it in the churches, most of them, some may do, but they don't understand when he said, deny yourself. Jesus said, deny yourself.

Deny thyself, in the old translation. Meaning, obviously, you're not supposed to deny something that is real. The implication when Jesus says, deny thyself, is obviously that the self is not real.

Why would he ask you to deny something that is real? Would not make sense. And so the Buddha, of course, always pointed out to the, pointed to the fictitious nature of the self.

It said, Buddha said, self is an illusion. And as long as you are trapped, I'm paraphrasing the Buddha now, as long as you are trapped in the illusion of the self, you will encounter dukkha, translated as suffering. Sometimes translated as misery, or translated as unhappiness.

Suffering, misery, unhappiness, unsatisfactoriness. When you're trapped in that ultimately illusory self, you continuously generate dukkha, which is from the Pali language which is related to Sanskrit, meaning suffering, unhappiness, unsatisfactoriness. And wherever you go, whatever situation you go into, whatever relationship you go into, whatever place you go to, whatever attainment, whatever you attain or achieve, or get, there's always, sooner or later, and usually sooner, you will encounter the element of dukkha.

In other words, it gets tainted with unhappiness. And so the Buddha, that was the teaching of the Buddha, said wherever you go, you'll find dukkha. But why?

Because you take something that you are not to be real, and ultimately, who you are. And so that is a fiction. And therefore Jesus said, deny thyself.

Meaning, not deny the reality of yourself, meaning, deny the un-reality of yourself. Recognize the un-reality of yourself. That's the significant meaning of deny thyself.

Recognize the un-reality that is a denial of the self.

[Speaker 4] (1:20:55 - 1:21:11)
I read a quote where you were discussing people's food choices, and how that's connected maybe to their spirituality. And I'm wondering if you could elaborate on how that's connected, especially concerning ahimsa?

[Speaker 1] (1:21:13 - 1:41:11)
Thank you. I would say, I've never, as I never do, to tell people, you should do this, or you should not do that. But you should be present with whatever your food choices are, and then the right food choice will happen for you, rather than giving an abstract guideline.

It needs to come from within, rather than as something from without. So, if you are vegetarian, that's wonderful. It doesn't mean it immediately makes you into a person who is spiritual.

You could be egoically identified with being vegetarian, in which case it would be a hindrance to the realization of the spiritual dimension. So, I shocked a vegetarian once when I said, did you know that Hitler was a vegetarian? That person was very strongly identified with the mental image of me as a spiritually evolved vegetarian.

And so, yes, he was a vegetarian. I don't know why he was a vegetarian. Perhaps, I don't know, I haven't read about it, but I know that whenever people around Hitler were eating chicken soup, and so he said condescendingly, so you're eating dead bird soup.

So, it really is, it comes, the answer to that comes from within. Within you, and you have to do what feels right, what corresponds to your state of consciousness at any time, when you go into, when you even look at food, or even think of food. It is helpful to, sometimes when I buy some food, I go into a supermarket, and I look at the shelf, I imagine that this is going into my body, and then the body either opens up to it or closes down.

And so, if you're in touch with the body, then that is quite helpful, it makes it easier. The mind often doesn't really know what the body really wants. The mind remembers some past pleasure and wants to repeat it, and that's where overeating also occurs, because it's just, overeating is on the external level, on the physical level, the need to fill a sense of insufficiency that is ultimately there on the psychological, spiritual level, the sense of not enough is ego.

The ego lives from that sense of insufficiency, of not enough, and of needing more. And for some people that comes into the physical realm, in which case then you eat more than the body really needs or wants. And again, it's a spiritual dilemma and can only be really ultimately transcended if you realize that you are not that needy entity that says, I need more.

So body awareness helps a lot in food choice, and then it's up to you what it is that you feel, and you will know, you will not be in a dilemma, you will know what is right for you. And so this is, all important answers need to come from within you. And what you're experiencing here, realizing here, is the Tao, or consciousness of the Tao, in its pure form.

Well, I don't remember what I say it is, so let's see. Whatever you say about consciousness ultimately is not it, which is actually the first line in the Tao Te Ching, talking about the Tao. The Tao that can be spoken of is not the true Tao.

This is one of the translations, this is the first line in the Tao Te Ching. So in the widest sense Tao can be equated with consciousness, and the moment you speak about consciousness, consciousness becomes an object. But this is the reason why Lao Tse, the author of the Tao Te Ching says, the moment you speak about it, realize that it's not it.

Because the moment you speak about it, it becomes an object of thought. Whereas the essence of consciousness is that it is the eternal subject. So consciousness, you cannot understand it, you cannot understand what it is, you can only realize it as the essence of who you are.

And instead of talking about it right now, I suggest that you, I, right now, see if we can realize it as the essence of who we are. Realize or even just get a glimpse of what is meant by consciousness. And you might notice that the words I'm speaking are slowing down a bit.

And if you are listening attentively, then your attention will be such that you tune in completely to the words which arise out of thought and make them your own. So as I speak, these words are perceived as by you and they become thoughts in your mind. And if you're very attentive, then you don't add any other thoughts.

So you can actually experience this moment of me speaking in the same way in which I experience this moment. I experience this moment as I am speaking thoughts that become words arising spontaneously. But I'm slowing down, which means in addition to the thoughts and words arising, there are gaps in this discourse.

There are gaps between words and sentences, although there's lots of gaps. And if you're attentive enough, then you will also become aware of these gaps. So you're aware of the words which are only pointers right now.

The words that I'm speaking right now are only pointers that point your attention towards the gaps where there are no words and no thoughts. So you become aware of the words, yes, which are the objects that arise in consciousness. And if you're attentive enough, you're also aware of the spaces, gaps, spaces between the words and the sentences between the words.

And while you're aware of these gaps, you realize that you're not actually aware of any object. A gap or a space is not an object. It cannot be an object.

When you talk about it, it becomes an object. But when you experience the gap, it is just a space. It's not an object.

And so what is it that you experience? There is just a spacious presence. It has no content.

And what you're experiencing here, realizing here, is the Tao or consciousness in its pure form, its pure, no form, which is the Tao, which is the Tao before it becomes something, before it becomes a thought or words. So right now, you're aware of sense perceptions because you can still see me. You're aware of the words.

But more importantly, you are aware that you are aware. You know yourself as this aware presence, space. Without that space, that aware space, there would be no sense perception.

It is the light of consciousness in which all the objects of consciousness are perceived. Most people are not aware of themselves as consciousness. They're only aware of the object that arise in consciousness.

And their sense of identity also, their sense of who they are, ultimately, is an object that arises in their consciousness. That's me. This is my story, me and my story, my identity.

I am this and that and that and all those things together, that's me. But they're all thought forms or emotional forms that arise in consciousness. They are an object in consciousness.

And this object in consciousness, for most people, is the foundation of their sense of identity. But that, unfortunately, is an enormous limitation and, ultimately, a misperception of who they actually are. Most people's sense of identity, therefore, is based on a misperception.

Because who you truly are is not an object in consciousness. That's ephemeral. It's here for a while, then it evaporates.

Who you truly are is a space of consciousness itself. And so you become aware of an underlying presence, just to use a word. And a wakefulness, a certain alertness, a stillness.

But not a stillness that is asleep, an alert stillness. That's the realization of consciousness, of yourself as consciousness. That frees you from this misperception that you are an object that arises in consciousness, the egoic self.

That has its place, of course. You have a past. You have certain conditioning.

Your mind, your mental, emotional field is conditioned in certain ways. And that conditioning becomes the person or the personality. But there's a deeper dimension, a transcendent dimension to your identity.

And if you realize that, that's an enormous liberation from this extremely limited and, ultimately, erroneous sense of self that is the person. And now the interesting thing is you can actually sense this presence that you are in the background of your life at all times. Now you may not be able to do that yet.

It may become obscured many times. And then, again, you become identified completely with the conditioned mind, with the personality, with the person, with its reactive patterns, its conditioned likes and dislikes and opinions and so on.

And then, suddenly, again, you know yourself as this alert stillness.

So it's deeply satisfying to know that there's infinitely more to you than your personality. So you're no longer, you still have a personality, but it's no longer a prison. It's no longer your prison.

You're no longer totally confined within it. You're aware of a transcendent dimension to who you are. And this is, this can only be realized directly.

So the answer to the question, how do you know that consciousness is what you're saying it is, is quite simply this. The cessation of thought and what remains is the unconditioned consciousness. That's who you are in your essence, but that's not only who you are.

That is also, and more fundamentally, who or what the universe is in its essence. It is a disguised desire also for God. But those who are trapped in ego don't know that what they are really looking for is not the house or the car or the recognition from others or the fame.

What they're really looking for is themselves.

Hello, Eckhart. The question that I submitted was, what is the fundamental difference between your teaching of presence and the current popular teaching of the law of attraction? Behind that teaching is really a question about desire.

And I have always felt very drawn to the Sufi teaching which says, hidden deeply within my desire is the desire of God. And yet, the law of attraction people are saying you can have or do or be anything you want if you think and feel in a certain way. And I always feel a red flag when I hear that because I think the ego could go wild with that.

So my question is, is there a deeper fundamental level of desire which is not of the ego?

The Sufis are right, of course, when they say that ultimately every desire is really a disguised desire for God. It's a disguised desire for ultimate satisfaction and fulfillment and being fully and truly, completely who you are. And basically, we're talking about the source, realizing the source of all life.

Everyone is longing for that, but in most humans still, the longing for what I sometimes call the return journey to where you came from, the source of all life, but never really left the source, of course. It's not really a journey, but it's words. There's a longing to return to the very source of life, and it's really only then, when you have discovered it, found it consciously, then there's a completion there of life.

That's what the universe wanted. It wanted not, it wants two things. If you observe yourself, you know that this is true and you are the universe, so you can learn a lot about the universe by observing yourself, because you are it, and it is you, and as above, so below.

The tendency, or the desire, to create, the human being has the tendency to create. There's a desire to create in the world of form, to bring things, to give birth to whatever it may be. It may be a material thing, it may be something else, but there's a desire in humans to participate in the act of creation, which, of course, the act of creation is there even without humans.

The millions of life forms on this planet alone come into being every moment. Millions of life forms of different kinds, it staggers the imagination, how many different life forms on this planet alone are being created every moment, and of course die at the same time, continuous. Birth, death, birth, death, continuously.

Humans too, humans are being created every moment. I can say a human being is being born now, now, now, now, now, somewhere on the planet, and a human being is dying a little bit slower, now, now, now, now. At this moment, somebody is dying on the planet, and again, and again, and again, and being born.

So that's, there's the act of creation that the universe is engaged in, and creation is becoming, is increasing in complexity. If you look at our planet alone, you see that there was a time when it was barren, there was only minerals. Then came plant life, and then other levels of life, increasing complexity.

Like a tree, first there's only one branch, the stem, one branch, and then a lot more smaller branches coming out of that, so it grows, and it goes into complexity. And even human life forms, if you go back in human history, human society and the human being was relatively simple thousands of years ago, even a few hundred years ago compared to now. There's much less complexity in people's personal lives, what they had to deal with, and the collective.

So there's the, the universe then is growing in complexity and is indulging in or wanting or delighting, perhaps, in the act of creation, because otherwise it wouldn't be happening. It is a desire of the universe to create, and that's what it does, and that is reflected in humans. We participate in the, this wanting to give birth, so the human, the act of creation can happen to the human, the human can create, and that's, in that sense we are different from animals, because we can create all kinds of things that are totally new.

We can create music, science, and many, many other things, art, philosophies, pictures, movies, organizations, Wall Street, all kinds of things, and you can probably find in yourself that there's part of you that would like to do and participate in the act of creation and bring something into this world that wasn't here before, in the world of form. Maybe it's a book you want to write, or a piece of music, or you want to create an enlightened organization that changes things in the world, or whatever, or you want to, to help people who are suffering, you create a structure that is helpful, but you create something. There's that desire to, or in some people it is more fundamental, it's a desire to acquire something.

Some people who are very much in the egoic consciousness don't see it so much as giving out into this, giving from your treasure, and then create something. You must to some extent have already gone beyond ego if you, the creationist comes from the fullness that you sense inside you, and from there you can truly create, this is really presence. In the egoic consciousness they're also very interested in the world of form, but it's the egoic consciousness is not so much, doesn't come from the wanting to give, but wanting to have.

So the ego goes, what can I get? And the, from presence, when you participate in the creation, it's more what can I give birth to? That's the difference, so there is the egoic aspect of increasing complexity in the world of form, and life forms, the egoic part is wanting something, so the ego comes not from fullness, but from neediness, from a sense of not enough.

And so it says, where can I get, and that is the ego desire, the ego says, I desire that car because I will really feel better when I'm sitting in that car and driving it, especially if other people see me in it. Without other people it doesn't really work, because it's only, okay it's comfortable for the ego, yes it's a comfortable ride, but that's not such a big thing, it only begins to work for the ego if other people have cars that are not like mine, then it works. The same with a house, or whatever you acquire, any possession, you can perfectly enjoy a nice house, or a nice car, without the ego deriving any pleasure from it or enhancing itself, I'm not saying things cannot be enjoyed, if you have no ego you can still enjoy lovely things, but not because they add to your sense of self, it's a simple enjoyment of a beautiful thing that perhaps a human has created, a beautiful piece of furniture, beautiful, could be a house, you enjoy that house. You would probably not want to acquire a 20 bedroom house for yourself when you're not coming from ego, it's unlikely that presence would say, I'd love a 20 bedroom house.

We have, so the, I suppose the egoic aspect of wanting to, not so much the ego, not so much create, but have, but it's a world of form, and the non-egoic desire of the universe to give birth to more forms and experience more forms. So the universe does it without the humans, but an added dimension comes in when the universe or the greater intelligence or consciousness creates through the humans, a completely new level of creation comes in. And this is why we have the expression, we become co-creators with God, God creates the fishes in the sea and the plant life and all the animals and the human bodies, and then through the human form, the human mind, including thought, the universe can create things that wouldn't be there without the human co-creators.

So that's, desire as such is really an egoic phenomenon. When you create beyond ego, it's not so much a creation out of desire, it's a creation, because desire implies some kind of lack. Creation comes as wanting to give from the fullness that you sense within you.

Something wants to be, the way I perceive when I wrote the books, the books wanted to come out and I could feel it wanted to be created. It's not so much that I had a desire to write a book, the book wanted to come, and so that is creation when it's not, does not come from ego. The desire of the ego, as I mentioned earlier just now, if you look deeply, it is a disguised desire also for God, for spiritual realization.

But those who are trapped in ego don't know that what they are really looking for is not the bank account or the house or the car or the recognition from others or the fame or whatever it is that the ego thinks would give it fulfillment. What they are really looking for is themselves, a fuller version of themselves. And who are you in your essence?

You are the source. Who you are in your essence is consciousness itself, which is, if God is the sun, so to speak, an analogy, then the light of the sun is, you are, the consciousness is the light of the sun. God is the source, the unmanifested, of which you cannot speak because whatever you say is a distortion, it's absurd to speak of that mystery as the Tao Te Ching says, you can't speak of the Tao, and nevertheless we are speaking, and nevertheless the Tao Te Ching did get written in words.

And the people who are impelled by egoic desire eventually experience frustration and suffering, even if they attain an egoic state, and particularly if they attain whatever they desired, because then they realize, no, this doesn't seem to work, I'm still, I still feel this unfulfillment, perhaps even more strongly when you no longer have anything that you could mentally project yourself to and say, when I have that, I'll be okay.

And so when you have everything that this world can offer you, some people do, not many, most people are wanting, want that, desire that, but those few who do, I've met a few, who have everything, and they can either realize the futility of desiring things that ultimately cannot give them themselves ultimate fulfillment, ultimate satisfaction, a sense of permanency, vibrantly alive inner peace, these things can't give that to you.

But in the meantime, as long as the egojis don't know that, they are free to practice manifesting, they are free to practice, okay, I need to manifest the car, I need to manifest the house, I need to manifest this, and they, to some extent it can work. You're a little bit hampered when you're coming from ego consciousness, so your powers of manifestation are limited, nevertheless you have some. In addition, what the ego also manifests, of course, it's its own dysfunction that comes with the house and the car, so what we're not mentioning here is that while the ego can manifest a house and a car and whatever else it wants, it will also manifest the drama in the marriage that's in the house, the drama with the wife and the husband in the big house, that's a side manifestation of the ego that it hadn't planned that, but because of its inbuilt dysfunction, it also manifests continuous conflict around whatever else it manifests.

So it's a, and eventually you realize that this does not provide you with satisfaction, and then you begin to awaken. So, am I, I'm, there are then two ways of manifesting the ego. One comes with the ego's neediness to manifest, and another is out of the fullness of presence you can manifest.

You, even coming from the fullness of presence, presence can use also the human mind, because presence flows through the, can flow through the mind and can energize your thoughts, your thought structures, and they're no longer dysfunctional, and whatever the, whatever presence wants to manifest through you, it can and it can use the power of thought to manifest, but it will come from a giving behind it, it's a desire to give, a wanting to give, not to get.

So, thought can be used, and it used more powerfully when the ego is no longer interfering, but presence, when the human becomes co-creator with God, then presence can flow into the human mind and use also human thought and create original things out there, and that's a beautiful thing. What part does willpower play in the awakening process, if any? Don't I use some willpower to motivate myself to follow your teachings?

I must listen to Icarus now. I don't want to, but I have to. So it's not willpower, because if you use willpower and you listen because you think you should be listening or you're a spiritual person and you should be listening to a spiritual talk to just prove to yourself that you're spiritual, or you're determined to awaken.

No, there is something in you that wants to listen and that responds, and that in you that wants to listen has nothing to do with willpower. It's an energy field that rises up, and whatever, the only way you can listen to any spiritual teaching is from that deeper level, not from the conceptual mental level, and whenever you listen to a spiritual teaching, it's always from the deeper place. It's always a recognition of what you already knew deep down.

So the truth is always recognized because it comes from, you listen from the same place from where the teaching arises, and so it recognizes itself. The truth, you already know it, even though it may be too deep for you to access it for yourself, then you listen to a spiritual teaching and suddenly the truth that is in you is called forth and drawn out and responses, oh yeah, and you immediately sense, that's it, yes. Why didn't I know that before?

Of course, you did know it before because now you recognize it. Now there's something else in you that does not want to listen. The egoic entity may sometimes take over and say something like, I can't deal with that spiritual stuff now, it's just too much, what's the point of all this?

It's not getting me anywhere, is it? I've been doing that for years, where's it getting me? Nowhere.

The story in the head. And then you believe in what it says, and sometimes it can stop people temporarily from going to the spiritual teaching, but then if that goes on for long enough, you start to suffer more and more. And finally the suffering becomes the thing that awakens you again, that creates the gap or the opening in you and you're ready, ah, now you want to listen again.

Can't stand the suffering anymore. So willpower is not it. Now it may sometimes look to, at first sight, it may look, when I say be present, you can choose to be present.

When there's a certain level of presence in you already, you can choose to be present rather than to drift back into your mind. And there is an alertness associated with presence, but it is a relaxed alertness, not a tight alertness. It's not, it's not a, no, it's a, you see the difference?

It's easier acting it out than talking about it. It's not, it's not the tight, almost fearful alertness that is there, or even some anger behind it. It's a relaxed alertness, so it's almost, it might seem incompatible almost, relaxed alertness, but it's not.

So the alertness has an intensity to it. And, but that's not willpower. The non-relaxed alertness has an element of willpower in it, and that's not it.

You can sometimes see in paintings or drawings of Zen masters, that alertness, that intensity, that willpower alertness, and in Zen masters, that particular version of spiritual awakening, there is a fierceness. There's a fierceness to the way they look sometimes in the ancient drawings, and there is also a fierceness to the way in which they teach. And it's partly culturally conditioned because everything comes through the particular veil.

The teaching is the same, no matter what cultural veil or conditioned veil it comes through, but the way it manifests can be conditioned by a culture, or in the case of the teacher, it can be conditioned by the energy field of the teacher. Some teachers are, seem more forthright and aggressive almost. It's not really aggressive, but it might look so to the ego.

So there can be, there's a fierceness sometimes to the alertness, which is sometimes required to break through all the mental stuff you need to go into. Now whether you look fierce at the same time, doesn't matter, you can. But if you look at the greatest drawings of Zen masters, at first sight they look fierce.

If you look more closely, you'll see that behind the fierceness, there's a compassion and a gentleness. And of course, those can only be done by artists who are masters who can capture what the inner reality of the Zen master, which is both the fierceness and behind it is hiding compassion. The same applies to meditation practice.

Willpower is not a good way to ensure that your meditation practice is successful. In other words, it doesn't work. Because willpower in meditation is the famous lid on the boiling kettle.

You're holding it down, forcing yourself to be still instead of surrendering into the present moment so that stillness arises naturally, forcing yourself to be still. And then that may work for a while. And when the next episode of unconsciousness happens, which will be soon, when you go back into your normal life after the meditation, you come downstairs into the building and you're shouting at somebody.

And everybody's disturbing your serenity. So when you realize that what's important is already here and not in the next moment, what really matters, that means you already have shifted to a different state of consciousness. Very simple, just that realization.

But it's so deeply ingrained, the illusion that you believe, the unconscious assumption that the next moment matters more than this one. Everybody inherits that mind pattern. And that makes life very frustrating.

You all know that. Life consists only ever of this moment. So we are here to go deeper into this moment and not wait for something more significant in the next one.

So we become comfortable with being here now and get rid of the illusion that there is something important missing from your life. Or there's something not quite right that hasn't arrived yet. Something, a very deep-seated illusion.

There's something not right. But it's going to be right perhaps one day. The person who is still deluded by worldly things believes it's going to be right when this or that happens or I attain this or that.

And the spiritual seeker believes it's going to be right when I become enlightened. In both cases, it's future, the promise of that. And you're continuously overlooking something vital that is very easy to overlook because the movement of thought is so seductive and hypnotic.

There's a light in you, not a visual light, a presence that is essentially who you are and has nothing to do with your past or future. And we are here to become familiar with being that presence consciously. If it feels good and right for you this moment to be here and to hear this and almost, let's say, to recognize the truth of it, that means that's it.

Just a sense of goodness and rightness of being here, that means that dimension that has no form is already arising. So for example, St. Francis of Assisi, he was born as the son of a very fairly wealthy merchant in Italy. And he was so disgusted by his father's wealth and consumption and that he told, there were very few spiritual who rejected all material things so completely.

He was the ultimate hippie before hippies. So he didn't, he would always go barefoot, have no possessions whatsoever. I don't want anything, no nothing material.

And so he, and many people joined him, young men, often some women, they joined him and wanted to live like him. It seemed a wonderful thing. And then gradually his teaching spread and more people joined the order.

And then they had to come to the church, it was becoming suspicious. He had to go and visit the Pope and ask to have permission to have an order and so on, and he had to do that. There's a wonderful scene in a movie, Brother, Son, Sister, Moon, where St. Francis visits the Pope. It's a beautiful scene. And then as the movement grew, and St. Francis got older, the order started to have possessions. They had, beginning to have buildings and lands.

And he was so disgusted by this, he didn't want to have much to do with it. He let other people run it. I don't want it anymore.

He didn't like. But if that had not happened, the entire Franciscan movement would have evaporated after his death. It needed to be somehow rooted in the materiality, the physicality of things.

Jesus lived by, was supported by women, mostly. Strangely enough, many people don't know that. And it's only said in one line in the New Testament, where many women followed him and served him with their possessions, with their money.

So if you, and then how would some, let's say, a publication, a Western publication, where Jesus lived nowadays, a Western publication would say, he's exploiting this, look at this spiritual teacher. He's exploiting these women. He's taking all their money.

This would be the headline. Some of them have left their families, and he just dreadful charlatan, look what he's doing. So there's no clear, everybody has to decide for themselves what they feel comfortable with.

If you are a spiritual teacher, what is it that you feel comfortable with? Do you chant? Do you say donation?

Whatever you do, somehow you need some money. And if you go to a spiritual teaching also, you can see, do you feel comfortable with paying something or not? If you don't feel comfortable, go somewhere else where you don't pay.

You can go to a Buddhist monastery, and for a while you don't pay. If you go there a few times, they're going to look at you and say, well, where's your donation? I mean, you need, it wouldn't make sense.

So there was a time when after my shift in consciousness, when I explored, I had this need to explore all kinds of spiritual traditions. And I went, I tried everything, because I didn't understand what had happened to me. I, eventually the understanding came through Buddhist teachings, and then I understood, oh, this is what it is about.

It's a cessation of thinking. When a Buddhist, a Zen monk said to me, well, Zen is about not thinking. And I said, that was a revelation to me.

Not thinking. And then I realized that I was doing very little thinking. But I only experienced the not thinking as inner peace.

I didn't know it was not thinking. But anyway, I explored other things, causing miracles. There were workshops.

I went to, wanted to know, what's the cause in miracles? I read, very interesting. I went to Scientology.

I never became a member. I did one test. I just wanted to, but they were so, the guy who was doing it was so stupid that I didn't even want to know his interpretation of my test.

But then I went to other workshops. There were some workshops charge money, and occasionally I was so interested that, okay, this one charge is 500 pounds for the weekend. Well, I don't have 500 pounds.

And I remember, okay, I need to get a job. I need to make, I was really interested. I can't remember what it was.

There are so many things. I need 500 pounds. Okay.

I remember what job I got to get the 500 pounds for two weeks. I got a job at the Kennel Club in London, registering dogs on little cards. What's the name of the dog?

They were all coming in, every day they were coming in. I had to open the envelope, register breed, name, age, gender, all called, there were no computers then. Okay.

And after two weeks, I had enough money to join the workshop. It wasn't very good, but at least I knew that wasn't for me. And I never felt, oh, these people are terrible.

If they want that money and people do it, perhaps it's worth it. Perhaps it's a wonderful thing. It happened not to be a wonderful thing.

So, generally speaking, you're very right. Money can make people very unconscious. Even just some people, even just beginning to talk about money, especially people who have had an experience of scarcity in their childhood and whose parents were fearful around money.

And money was always discussed in their family with negative emotions. There was never enough and so on. So, I know I've met people who were relatively conscious in most of their lives, except the moment when money was mentioned.

Then immediately it pulled them into unconscious reactivity. And not just necessarily huge amounts of money, it could just be, he charged me too much, it was $10 too much. The entire bill was $200, but the $10, it's terrible.

So, just mention money and they become unconscious. For some people, there are other triggers that still make it. Maybe some of you have certain triggers that make you unconscious.

Whenever you think about it or talk about it, it could be, for example, your ex-spouse. Whenever you think or talk about him or her, you go, awful. Or it could be money, or it could be something else, some other, your pet subject that you feel something in politics.

That's the moment it's mentioned, you go react, become reactive. But for many people, it's money. So, you need to observe that money is only, one could see symbolic energy, it symbolizes energy.

And in itself is not problematic, but for many people, it becomes associated with fear, the fear of not enough, and also ego. It becomes associated with ego. So, how much money you have determines your worth.

How much, this is a weird expression, how much is he worth? That's ridiculous. So, what's your relationship with money?

[Speaker 3] (2:25:20 - 2:25:29)
It's one which has evolved over time, and now it's a place where I see it as symbolic energy, and that's what I'm going and teaching the world about. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (2:25:29 - 2:35:11)
Yeah, good. That's good. I'm doing good with the money.

Not everybody, almost nobody knows what exactly I do with it. I feel like Jesus' advice when you give something, don't let the left hand know what the right hand is doing, or something like that. So, nobody knows, because it can so easily become ego.

I met somebody last year, lovely, wonderful man. He's doing such good in the world, and he's very wealthy, but he's not here, so I'm just saying it. He probably won't even know I'm referring to him, but soon after meeting him, he gave me a list.

He pronounced, well, I'm engaged in the following charities, this one. I've been supporting this charity for 15 years, and then I'm supporting this, and then I created that charity. It's wonderful work, but I could see he was already spiritually awakening, but his ego was clinging to his charity.

So, he's doing good, but it's not doing him much good, not his ego. So, it's better to give anonymously, as I often do, to give anonymously. People don't even know where it's coming from.

It's a lovely way of giving. Marina asks, from North Carolina, in my efforts to be in the now, I find I'm able to reach a state of peace and connectedness. I think that I wouldn't call it effort, but I know what you mean.

It feels complete and fulfilling, and yet there's a voice in my mind saying that to be truly connected, I should find a way to be in service to others. Can you help me understand the role that being in service to others plays in the evolutionary impulse of the universe? Thank you for bringing a ray of hope to humanity.

It is an interesting synchronicity to me that the day of your program launch is also my birthday. Happy birthday. The evolutionary impulse of the universe, the arising of presence, you cannot not be of service to others as presence arises, one way or another.

The way in which you are of service to others will vary from person to person. You may not immediately know what your way is. Again, the mind sometimes wants to know too soon, okay, what am I going to do with it now?

I'm present. Be present. And gradually, the realization of how you are to serve others, whether it's through direct spiritual teaching or whether it's through some activity into which the energy frequency of presence flows, you don't know.

It may come to you. It might take a while. It took years for this teaching to come out of the state of presence, so many years.

It may take a while, or it may happen very quickly. There is an acceleration happening on the planet now of the arising of presence, so it's probably happening more quickly to you than to me. How to be of service to others, whether it's through direct spiritual teaching or some activity, it will come to you either through an external circumstance that will tell you what it is that you need to do.

It can come from the outside as a synchronistic event, and many people are telling me that they're finding that things that are just right as they live more and more in presence come into their lives, the right offer, the right meeting, the right person, and suddenly what it is that you need to do arises from the outside. It comes, or you wake up one morning with the realization of, this is what I need to do, and then I would wait and see just to make sure that it comes from a deep enough place, and if it's still there the next day and a week later and there's a deep sense of peace with it and power, then it comes from a deep place and then it's good to act on it. This is how I got taken away from living in England.

I loved England, but one morning I knew I have to remove myself without knowing why, and it was so strong that I removed myself. I knew I had to go to the west coast of North America, not knowing why, and it took a while before I got rid of everything, removed myself, landed on the west coast. What now?

Don't know. And so I sat there for a few weeks in presence, and the mind, yes, came in occasionally and said, this is, why did you come here? And the mind even got, started to look at ads for flying back to England, fares, and then at some point the impulse came to buy a notepad, to carry the notepad, not home, I didn't have a home, somebody had put me up, and there in his kitchen the pen came and a very strong impulse came to write, and I wrote, what is enlightenment?

Somebody had once asked me that, but I hadn't, I remembered more or less what I had said, but that was a new stream that came, and I'd written one page and I knew this is a book, it's coming, and so there was simply something I couldn't have predicted, obedience to what came out of the present moment, and the trust to go just into the, with a limited amount of money, into complete unknown, but don't do it on an impulse that is a restless kind of impulse, or that comes out of any kind of negative emotion, and see if it's still with you after a while, then it's right, it's peaceful and it's powerful. It seemed the book could only be written on the west coast of North America because of the energy field there. I realized that later when I went back to England, the writing stopped, I could only do editing, and so all kinds of things people will be called upon to serve in all kinds of capacities according to your abilities.

It may be that you produce something artistic or music that is inspiring to many people, whatever it is, we don't know. It may be that you set up a business and everybody who comes there is greeted for who they are, so you recognize everybody as spirit, as consciousness, and everybody who comes away from your business feels lighter and more themselves. Many things can be used as excuses for spiritual transmission and spiritual teaching, and if you already have some business or some activity, it is quite possible that this could continue to be used then as a vehicle for transmission of spiritual energy, and then it will become empowered.

Beautiful thing. There's no predicting how this will change your life, except that it will change your life, and even if some people may not remove themselves, they may stay where they are, and yet it will change, might not change what you do, but it will fundamentally change how you do what you do. That's always the most important thing, it's not what you do, it's how you do it, what is the consciousness that flows into it, is it the egoic consciousness or is it the unconditioned consciousness?

[Speaker 7] (2:35:32 - 2:35:35)
To be enlightened, how does it feel like?

[Speaker 1] (2:35:44 - 2:35:45)
Feels good.

[Speaker 7] (2:35:45 - 2:36:06)
I mean, I need to know what I'm doing, you know, so I think I have to go through the mental process of understanding this, and what will I get out of this?

[Speaker 1] (2:36:06 - 2:44:39)
The motivation to seek enlightenment can be of various kinds, some work better than others. There's a danger that the search for enlightenment is ego-motivated, that can easily happen. The ego feels a sense, which is quite normal, of lack or dissatisfaction with the things, either the things it has or the things it has already achieved and didn't fulfill it, and then it went on to something else, and that wasn't quite that fulfilling either, and then it reads or hears something about the possibility of achieving a state of enlightenment.

Well, that sounds much better than all the things I've been looking for so far, because those things haven't satisfied me, so I'm going to go for that. And then the ego creates, of course, a goal, I want to reach that goal, in the same way that before it created other goals that it either reached or did not reach, either way it wasn't satisfying. You might have heard the saying, there are two ways of being unhappy, one is not getting what you want, the other is getting what you want.

That's when the ego operates, that's the case. So, either it achieved already what it wanted and it didn't satisfy it, or it couldn't achieve it, and now it's looking for something else that maybe it could achieve, and enlightenment seems a good option, because the Ferrari, that didn't satisfy me, and then I tried the Lamborghini and that didn't satisfy me, and then I tried whatever else, didn't satisfy me, but enlightenment, that's it, I want to go for that.

And then, of course, it wants to know, okay, but what exactly does that mean? I want to know what I'm striving towards, because it might be the wrong thing, maybe when I achieve it, I won't be there anymore, or maybe the only way to achieve it is for me to dissolve. I don't know if I want it anymore.

I think I'm going to ask Eckhart that question. So, what I can tell you, in addition to what I've already said, is enlightenment will not satisfy your ego. Sorry about that.

Ego needs to be recognized as an illusion, an ultimate fiction in your mind for something else to emerge, and in that sense, one can say nobody actually becomes enlightened. You don't become enlightened, but when you get out of the way, there it is. So enlightenment is not something you can actually achieve, and I have no feeling that I achieved anything or that I am enlightened.

I said it feels good because just the present moment feels good, that's all I know. So, even to make that claim, I am enlightened, is ultimately, cannot be correct, because who is saying that? Who is making that claim?

So, in ultimate terms, you cannot be enlightened, but if you, the person, recognize its ephemeral nature and you no longer see your sense of self there, then something else is suddenly there that has always been there, but you just didn't know it. It was obscured. It was continuously overlooked.

The presence of consciousness was continuously overlooked in every experience. You could have been conscious of it at any moment, but it was overlooked because the hypnotic nature of the sensory world, and especially of the mind, was so overpowering that you overlooked something more essential in you that has always been there, is always there, will always be there. So, and therefore, if the motivation to seek so-called enlightenment comes from that place of seeking some permanent fulfillment, then it's not going to work, and there are spiritual practitioners, without knowing it, they spend years and years looking for that thing, and they're mentally projected into this place called future, which, by the way, only exists as a thought, but has no reality as such. There is no future except as a thought in your head.

Nobody has seen future, touched it, been there. You can't. It's not there.

Life is now, always. There is no future. So if you seek a future state, it's misleading, and if you seek enlightenment in the future, that very search is the obstacle.

So there can, however, there can be another motivation for seeking enlightenment, but then I would suggest a different word for it, and not enlightenment, but liberation. And that motivation can be not to find some greater fulfillment, but that motivation can be to become free of suffering. So there can be another motivation for seeking enlightenment, but although I would prefer the term liberation here, or in Christian terminology, a related word that's used in Christian terminology is salvation.

So if the suffering in your life gets too much, and then realizing that there is a way beyond suffering and wanting to know more about that, that is a better motivation for finding liberation than seeing what can I get out of it when I finally get enlightened. And of course, the answer is, the one that's asking that question won't be even there to experience it. If we do not take action, I do not believe that the planet will become destroyed, but we will destroy ourselves.

I don't really have a formulated question, but I'd like to hear you talk for a second. It's kind of been hinted at here and there, but talk more specifically about the situation of the planet, the ecological situation, you know, without panicking, without getting self-righteous, and all these other things. Clearly, a change of consciousness is necessary, but things also have to be done in real time, because these are processes happening in time.

And so, just if you had anything at all to say about that, and how these two processes of consciousness, and also changing things, doing whatever would be necessary for the planet, how this works together.

Yes, thank you. Are you engaged in that kind of work? To some extent, and hoping to be more, yes.

Well, one thing, as you know, I don't need to say it again, the foundation for any action you take is to let it arise from presence, rather than from a feeling of fear, or anger, because those two are not very productive. What comes out of fear or anger is not productive. Presence is much more powerful.

There's an enormous power in presence, and true intelligence, intelligent, really intelligent action comes out of presence. So, that's vital to know. There are many things that need changing in our relationship with the planet.

Things seem to be going the wrong way right now. All I can say is, do as much as you can to help change the way in which we live on this planet. Do what you can, with peace in your heart.

That's the main thing, with peace in your heart, because otherwise, without peace, the opposite of peace is war and conflict. So, if we don't destroy the planet, we destroy ourselves through war and conflict. The planet, there's more to the planet, this is my intuitive realization, by the way.

There's more to the planet than we realize. The planet is a being. It's not a rock floating in space with things growing on top.

The planet is a living being. Many humans or scientists cannot accept that. What I mean is, it is pervaded by an intelligent energy field in the same way that your body is pervaded and held together and run by an underlying intelligence that keeps everything, the thousands of functions in your body, because the planet is another kind of body.

The thousands of functions that need to be constantly coordinated and controlled that keep this body alive, keep the atoms and molecules together, keep the organs from cooperating. No human or the greatest computer could possibly do that. Even now, we only understand a fraction of how our physical body operates.

There's a vast intelligence built into it. When that intelligence says goodbye, then very quickly, the atoms and molecules say goodbye to each other, too, and then they depart, and then the form dissolves. The planet is also an intelligence, a being that is intelligent, and it has produced us in a way, not alone.

There have been other factors. The sun is also more than a fireball. We think the sun is a ball of just energy.

There's more to it than that. We think the sun is extremely hot. Well, hot is one way, but really what that means is the energy of highest intensity, which our physical body registers as extreme heat.

The sun is also a celestial being. You don't need to believe me, by the way, but I'll just tell you what my intuitive realization is. And the planet has an intelligence also that we need to, one reason why we need to be active in protecting the planet, so that we don't use these absurd ways of the resources of the planet, the absurd ways of getting energy.

We need to go beyond that. There are other ways. The universe is infinitely abundant.

The energy on the external level, the energy, obviously inexhaustible energy comes continuously from the sun. And all the other energy forms that we discover on the planet are really transformed sun energy. It was once sun energy.

So, and to use those is a very primitive way of using energy. And we need to, as soon as possible, and this is the task of scientists and so on, who also need to be present to go beyond those primitive ways of using the energy that's left over by sun energy on the planet. The planet, if we do not take action, I do not believe that the planet will become destroyed, but we will destroy ourselves.

Or the planet, which has an intelligence, but it's just slow, because to a planet, a hundred years is nothing, 200 years is nothing, one second in your lifetime or less. The planet, if the planet feels threatened by humans, I firmly believe that it will eliminate humans. It can do that very easily.

We are, because we are connected, our physical form is connected to the energy field of the planet. It's part, it's come out of the planet. So the planet could easily, even without violence, the planet could end all humans within a hundred years, without any act of violence, by simply making males and females infertile.

That would be an action taken by planetary intelligence. Say, these humans, we can't have them anymore, that's too much. Or let's just get rid of 95% of them, and then they can have a new beginning and can try again.

But it doesn't have to come to that. So before the planet takes action, and the planet is slow, we need to take action, but with peace, because otherwise we are unconscious beings, we'll just contribute. Even if in our unconscious action, we could save the planet, we still wouldn't save ourselves, because we would create warfare, if we are unconscious.

There are many ways we can destroy ourselves, not just through destroying nature. There are other ways we can destroy ourselves, and we will, if there is no, if the shift in consciousness does not reach a sufficient number of people. But the essence of what I'm saying is, peace in your heart, do not fear.

There's more to the planet than you realize. If the planet needs to get rid of you, it will. How do you deal with challenges?

And challenges will continue to come, that's the weird thing. And that's a wonderful thing, because if life did not give you challenges, you would not evolve. And that not only applies to humans, it applies to every life form on the planet.

Life is challenging for every plant, and every tree, and every animal on the planet. There's no doubt about that. It presents challenges for every species on the planet.

And that is how consciousness grows, through being faced with challenges. And once you see that, you might recognize it in a movie. You wouldn't want to go to see a, watch a movie where the characters are not challenged by life.

In other words, let's say you go to a cinema, and the movie begins, and nothing goes wrong. And then you would say after 15 minutes, this is not an interesting movie, there's nothing going wrong. Because almost any movie, something needs to go wrong, otherwise there is no movie.

Because it's only if things go wrong, the character gets challenged. And then something happens. Either the challenge is resolved on an external level, which is a not so good movie, which means the bad guy is finally eliminated, or put away.

Or if the challenge is, if it's a good movie, the challenge with which the characters are faced brings about a change in the character. And in a very good movie, and there are not many of those, but some, the character becomes more conscious through the challenges. And then you might even want to see that movie again, and again, and again.

It no longer depends, you already know what's going to happen, but that's secondary. You just enjoy the process of watching somebody awaken. And as you watch somebody awaken, you somehow participate in that awakening.

And it could even be a funny movie in addition to that. So one of my favorite movies, or I'm sure most of you know it, Groundhog Day. And I've watched that many times.

And that shows somebody deeply unconscious, and suffering, and suffering, and suffering, is stuck in the same day again, and again, and again, and he can't get out. This is, of course, the state of the egoic state. And then until finally, something changes in him.

Finally, he comes to acceptance, and surrender, and becomes helpful by accepting and surrendering what is. He becomes helpful to other people. And then in the end, the same day, which is forced to repeat again, and again, and he's stuck in a place that he hates, in a town that he hates, doing what he hates, seeing people that he hates.

And finally, he can't stand the suffering anymore. And then he's not hating anymore. He just accepts.

And then suddenly experiences the same day differently. He begins to awaken. And in the end of the movie, he says, oh, this place is so nice.

Let's stay here. And then he's free to go. So that kind of movie that you want to watch many times, because that is a rare thing.

It shows the unconsciousness, and then how a character by facing challenges, ultimately self-created. And then there's a deepening that happens. So, and that's reflective of life.

You would not want to see a movie where nothing goes wrong. But when things go wrong in your own life, implicitly, you think this should not be happening. The movie of my life should be such that nothing goes wrong.

I want it to be totally boring. So people complain when what they love to watch in movies, when it happens to them, they complain and think this shouldn't be happening to me. So I'm talking about the challenges that are an inevitable part of your daily existence.

And even as you awaken, you get challenged by the gravitational pull of the unconsciousness within yourself, but also in the form of other people around you and situations that you encounter, your workplace, family members, relatives, friends, you are challenged by the unconsciousness of the world that you inhabit. And that's how it's meant to be. Now you might develop a theory that if only the conditions in my life were more suited for my spiritual growth, all would be well.

And then if you could devise a list of things that you need in order to facilitate your spiritual growth, you would say, okay, I have enough money to go to the most exquisite spa places in the world where I will have massages two or three times a day, live in absolute bliss through the most pure food imaginable. My needs are being met so that I can meditate if I want to, I can exercise my body, clean, pure air, not being disturbed by noises and things around me. Everything will be so beautiful.

I can dedicate myself totally to being present. And if that became a reality for a while, you would be happy. And then after a while, you would find yourself, you would find your level of presence decreasing after a while.

It can be nice as an interlude in your life for a week. It might be great. Withdrawal and so on can be great.

But if you think that that will facilitate your spiritual growth, the absence of challenges will facilitate your spiritual growth, you would be very much mistaken. You would eventually find yourself, your level of presence decreasing because it is not needed. Things are going too well.

There's no challenge. Everybody is so nice. Of course, they're nice because you pay them.

If you lived with them, they wouldn't be nice. But that's, so you have enough money to pay all the people around you so that they can be nice to you. And you're not being challenged by these obnoxious humans anymore.

And it would not ultimately facilitate your spiritual growth. And you may reach a moment after spending two years in this wonderful spa of longing to get back to your challenging life. If you even have enough consciousness even to long for something at that point.

So what I'm really saying is, whatever arises in your life is your practice. It is the practice designed for you. It is your spiritual path and particularly the challenges.

[Speaker 8] (3:01:50 - 3:02:11)
Okay, now tell me the ultimate secrets of God in the transcendent universe.

[Speaker 1] (3:02:12 - 4:23:59)
You can't. It's absurd. I am is the word.

All you can say is I am. But you don't need, you don't add anything, not this or that. I am.

In the Old Testament, God is asked, who are you? And that's perhaps the most profound sentence in the Old Testament is I am that I am. Where God defines him, her, itself as the I am, as the essence identity of all forms.

And also another beautiful sentence in the Old Testament, as you know, the Old Testament is a mixed, the New Testament, the Bible is a mixed bag of fantastic things and other things. But I like to look for the jewels that are there. And another beautiful statement that points to all this is, be still and know that I am God.

Be still and know that I am God. Now these words are all synonymous. Be refers to being.

Still is a state of consciousness without thought, stillness. Being and stillness, the same thing. And know there is a deep knowing in that.

In fact, it's that is because that is the source of all intelligence. There's a deep knowing but from the point of view of the conceptual mind, it looks like unknowing. It looks like ignorance because it's not knowing through concepts anymore.

There's a deeper knowing. And this is where what we call wisdom arises, which is very different from intelligence, the IQ kind of intelligence. The wisdom that the world needs, not more intelligence, please, no.

But wisdom that yes, be still and know that I am, it is the I am of being God. Oh, here we come to a difficult word, but they're all synonymous. What is God then?

I rarely talk about God because you can't really, it's so transcendent that whatever you say would be very limited. As you know, human language and human thought is relatively limited. How can I make statements about the ultimate transcendent reality?

Just by producing a few weird sounds with my vocal cords, plus air pressure through my tongue and lips. Oh, the vowels, A, I, A, E, I, O, U, E, U, R. This is what language is.

Okay, now tell me the ultimate secrets of God in the transcendent universe. You can't, it's absurd. Just produce a few sounds and that explains.

No, however, I'll carry on talking. All we can do is give an analogy or like a poetic image of what God might be and how God relates to who you are. And that image is that I prefer is the image of, you know, we can only use images from our sense-perceived universe.

The sun is a life-giving thing in our universe. The sun gives of itself ceaselessly for millions and millions of years. One could almost say eternally.

It's not eternal, but as far as we are concerned, it's eternal. Without the sun, there would be no life, no physical life here. So the sun gives of itself, it emanates continuously.

The very heat in your body ultimately comes from the sun. So the sun, if you use the sun as an analogy for the transcendent God, God has no location in space or time. God is neither there, or if we have to say anything, we could say God is right here because it's transcendent to this dimension.

So if we use this as an analogy, the transcendent emanates into this dimension, something that creates form, that creates life. And what it ultimately, this thing that it emanates is consciousness. At first, very little.

At first, consciousness appears as if we're frozen as minerals and stones. And then consciousness becomes as if it were a liquid. If we use an analogy of water, then it becomes vegetative life.

And consciousness gradually evolves. So one consciousness, more of it comes in, then you get animal life. And then you get human life.

It becomes ethereal as a human mind. So emanating from the source of all life that is transcendent, of which you cannot say anything, into this world, as the sun emanates light, the God emanates consciousness, and this brings about this universe. And in this universe, it's a process.

It grows in the transcendent. We don't know anything about that. So not the important thing is the ray of sunlight that you come that hits your hand, you feel the warmth on your hand.

That ray, it's not the sun, you couldn't say I have the sun on my hand. I mean, if you got close to the sun, you would immediately disappear. But this ray of sunlight is still connected to the sun in some way.

It is still part of the sun. We can't even say where the sun exactly ends. It doesn't really end anywhere.

It doesn't have a clearly defined surface. It extends outward. So it emanates continuously.

So what the source of all life emanates is consciousness. And you can sense that in yourself. When you can sense yourself as consciousness, the presence, then you realize this, the ripple on the surface of the ocean has realized that it is not only a ripple, I'm mixing analogies now.

It's not only a ripple, more fundamentally, the ripple is the ocean. And suddenly the ripple is no longer fearful, because it can sense its deep connectedness to that which is vast and all encompassing. And so the ripple suddenly lives in a different way because it realizes its own timeless essence.

Or the sun, the ray of sunlight could do the same, it could suddenly become aware that it is still connected and part of the sun. It can, and you can sense in yourself the undoubted fact that you are conscious. But not only that, we're creating a duality here that doesn't exist when we say that you are conscious.

The essence of who you are is consciousness. So you are consciousness. And this consciousness is the brain, yes, mainstream science, most of it will still tell you that consciousness is a byproduct of the physical brain.

But mostly scientists avoid talking about consciousness because they don't know what to do with it. It does not make much sense in their universe. They say, well, it's a byproduct of the chemical activity in the brain.

Okay, well, what does that mean? A more sensible thing that some scientists are beginning to already embrace the possibility, they're mostly scientists who are close to retirement, so they have nothing to lose anymore. They're beginning to embrace the possibility that consciousness, that the brain, which undoubtedly is linked to consciousness, acts more like a receiver and a transmitter of consciousness than a generator of consciousness.

So the brain is like a radio. The radio does not produce the music. The radio just transmits and then gives it form.

And that could be, and I believe that is the relationship between the human brain and universal consciousness, which is one. So there's not your consciousness and my consciousness, there's only one consciousness. And that one consciousness manifests as this flower too.

And it manifests beautifully. It manifests as any life form. It even manifests as so-called inanimate matter.

It's just a totally different frequency. So the entire universe is really consists of one substance, which is not a substance. It's one.

It's the multitude, the manifold manifestations of life in this universe are all manifestations of the one. And this one, the one that you can find, this is what in the past only rare mystics have talked about it or realized it. But now it becomes more accessible.

This is why here we're talking about it and not just talking about it. This one, which is the essence of not just of who you are. The weird thing is the essence of who you are is one with the essence of the entire universe.

So when you realize this essence of yourself as consciousness, when the ripple realizes that it is also and more fundamentally the ocean, then it's not only a realization of the ripple. It's a realization of the ocean too, through the ripple. So the consciousness that is underlies this universe, which emanates from the one is awakening through you.

It's awakening. It wants to awaken. One cannot say much more about it because there's a limit to what one can say.

But the most important thing is the realization within yourself of you are consciousness. And you need to be able to realize it is not that difficult to, as much as you can, step out of the stream of thinking so that you are not throughout the day, that you are not trapped in this continuous torrent, this current that drags you along one thought after another and another and another. Invite gaps into your life in the stream of thinking, for example, by conscious perception.

For example, if you wanted to do it now, bring a gap into the stream of thinking, I would say, become aware of your sense perceptions. Look, listen, be alert. Look and listen.

Be the alertness for the perception. No need to label what you are perceiving. Just look.

Look at a flower, at a tree, at the sky. Look and don't label it through concepts. And that's a wonderful way of inviting presence into your life.

And then there's in the background, there's an alert stillness. And then in the foreground, there's sense perceptions. That alert stillness is the essence of who you are.

But it's also the essence of the universe. And that is a wonderful, very simple spiritual practice as much as possible, especially when you're waiting somewhere just for a moment. Conscious perception.

No labeling. And the more dependent you become on the way things are going to turn out, the more likely it is that they're not going to turn out the way you want them to turn out because there's fear in you. The most important teaching in the Bhagavad Gita that runs through, it's mentioned in almost every chapter, is what's called karma yoga, which is a way in which you perform action in this world.

I already briefly talked about it in our first session, but since this is perhaps the central theme, and it's the main spiritual practice, one could say, recommended in the Bhagavad Gita, is to do whatever you do in a certain way. And what that is, I'll explain again briefly. And if you do whatever life gives you to do in a certain way, that will lead to a deepening and spiritual realization.

And that can be really, you can summarize that as in the words of the Bhagavad Gita, do not be attached to the fruit of your action, which, of course, simply means don't look to the goal of what you want to achieve through whatever you're doing now. Give your complete attention to the doing rather than where you want to get to through the doing. And that's, again, a very important lesson nowadays, because most humans don't know that yet.

They are always one moment ahead, they want to get there. You may find in your own life, still, a lot of the time, you are not present moment centered, you are focused on the next moment that you need to get to. So whatever you are doing at this moment is designed to get you to the next moment.

And internally, you project yourself away from what you're doing now, because the doing becomes a means to an end. This is very normal, everybody lives like that. Whatever they do is a means to an end.

And in their mind, the end is more important than what they are doing. That is so habitual and unconscious that most humans don't even know that that is how they live, that they always live for the next moment, but they're never completely in this moment. They also don't know that by living in that way, they create frustration and suffering and stress and discontent.

Basically, they're condemning themselves to continuous discontent and to stress. Because if you ignore the present moment continuously, and ignore means, you make it into a means to an end, because the next one is so important that you need to get to, then you miss life completely. You miss the depths that potentially is there in life.

And life becomes shallow, because it's all mental, because the next moment is always a mind formation. The next moment is a mental projection. Next moment is never a reality, because it doesn't exist.

When the next moment comes, okay, one minute from now, I've got one minute to finish this. And then after one minute, it's not one minute, it's always now again. And then there's the next thing to do, of course, immediately you look to the next thing, because you have become used to being uncomfortable with the present moment, conditioned since childhood to feel ill at ease in the present moment.

Oh, I should be doing something, and doing implies some future projection. You can never be, you're always doing. And now the Bhagavad Gita by recommending as a spiritual practice to renounce, as it's called here, to renounce the fruit of your action.

Sometimes that is called a sacrifice. And what is really in this ancient terminology, what is to put this into modern terminology, is really designed telling you to pay attention to what you are doing in this moment, and make this moment the primary focus of your life, whatever you're doing in this moment. And the secondary focus is what you want to achieve through whatever you're doing.

And that is called a sacrifice. One could say you sacrifice the future, you renounce the fruit. It says if you renounce the fruit, a different energy flows into what you do, and then many helpful factors come in.

And that is the truth. And it's a new way of living, where you actually, whatever you're doing now, you give it your complete attention. This is more important than what I want to achieve through it.

Yes, I know what I want to achieve through it. But since there's only ever the present moment and nothing else, surely this must be important than the projected future moment. And then you can give your fullest attention to the doing and not to the desired outcome.

And also then you are not dependent for your sense of fulfillment on the way things turn out. Because if you're dependent for your sense of fulfillment on the way things turn out, quite often you will become frustrated, because they may not turn out the way you want them to turn out. And especially, and the more dependent you become on the way things are going to turn out, the more likely it is that they're not going to turn out the way you want them to turn out, because there's fear in you.

And when you need things to be in a certain way, there's already fear in you. So the fear flows into what you do and contaminates what you're doing now. The quality of your doing is contaminated by fear.

And so the very thing that you were dependent on is less likely to happen, because the quality of your doing diminishes. In other words, you are less conscious in the way in which you act. The less consciousness flows into the way in which you act, the less likely it is that the outcome is going to be productive and satisfying.

So the more you depend on a satisfying outcome internally for your well-being and sense of identity or sense of worthiness or whatever it may be, the more you depend on the desired outcome, the more likely it is that you're not going to get it. It'll fail in some way. And that makes life very frustrating.

But if your sense of fulfillment is derived from the doing itself, that is, the outcome is secondary. You no longer need it to make you feel fulfilled. The fulfilling thing is what you're doing now, the attention behind it, the consciousness behind the doing.

If you can feel the consciousness flowing through you as you do something with your hands or as you speak or whatever it is you do, relate to other humans, if you feel that and you enjoy the doing of this moment. Let's say you have a business negotiation. The outcome is you want the contract to be signed.

And if your focus is excessively on wanting the contract to be signed for the company you work for or whatever, then the quality of your interaction with the humans that you need to sign the contract diminishes. The other human, the other person will intuitively feel your unease. You are uneasy because you're fearful about the outcome.

So will also intuitively feel that you are not truly relating to him or her as a human being. You are making him or her a means to an end unconsciously because you want them to sign the contract. Now these, the people that you're dealing with, they don't know these things consciously that I just mentioned, but they can feel that and they will feel, no, I don't think I want to sign the contract with this person.

It doesn't feel quite right. Or something will come in, they'll verbalize it in some way. No, it doesn't feel right.

Or they bring up some obstacle and magnify it and say, no, no, I can't do that. And then you have the alternative, somebody who doesn't need the outcome, but who gives his or her complete attention to the other person and actually enjoys the negotiation, the talking. Enjoys not just the words that are being spoken, but enjoys the presence of the other human being there behind the words.

But you can only enjoy the presence of the other human being if you can enjoy your own presence beyond the mental constructs in touch with yourself. So there comes a sense of goodness and rightness in the present moment of being with this other human. So you acknowledge their being.

You're not using them as a means to an end. Primarily, yes, it would still be nice if they signed the contract, you know that, but that is not your primary focus anymore. And if they don't sign it, you're not suddenly turning hostile.

In the business world, often you find if the people, if you don't do what they want you to do, they become hostile. Or they walk away, immediately lose interest in you. You haven't signed the deal.

And that's quite normal. The people who are most effective and successful actually are people who perhaps without even knowing it, perhaps because they have good karma, as the Bhagavad Gita would say, they live in this way. They like every moment of it, of interacting with you if you are the client.

They love interacting. They love that present moment. They don't transform the present moment into some means to a future end.

And this teaching about renouncing the fruit of your action is the primary teaching of the Bhagavad Gita, which is 2,000 or 3,000 years old. And still, most humans haven't learned that lesson. Whatever the obstacle arises, you bring this penetrating stillness to it.

You can also look into manifesting, but then the question is, what is it that wants to manifest through this form? It's no longer, this is what I want, the surface I. What is it that wants to manifest through this form?

Very different. And you may not know that immediately. There may be a time period when you don't know exactly what to do with your so-called life, which is not yours, just a conventional way of speaking.

There may be, for a while, you don't know what to do with your life. And so you're just there, being as still as possible, do your whatever activity you're already doing, but bring stillness into it, presence into it. And then at some point, either the realization of what it is that you need to do, that wants to be done through you, comes from the outside.

Somebody tells you something, ah, or you wake up one morning and say, ah, this is what I have to do. And then you start taking action, always making sure you're not so attached to the outcome that you think it's more important than the present moment. An action can become egoic when you lose yourself, it becomes egoic when you lose yourself in the doing.

And a good sign or good criterion is when something happens to, that is against your, it seems to be an obstacle, a person or a situation. Say, I want to do this or achieve that, and suddenly somebody says, no, you can't do that. No, they won't allow you to do that.

Or a situation becomes a challenge, it's difficult, it's blocked, you want to go. Somebody says, no, you're not qualified to do that, you shouldn't do that, it's not allowed, whatever, you need this and that, which you don't have to achieve. Obstacles come all the time.

If you get upset, that means the ego is back in the doing when obstacles come. If you're not upset, you're still present and you look at whatever the obstacle is, and you look at it with this penetrating gaze of presence, which is stillness also. You look at whatever the obstacle arises, you bring this penetrating stillness to it, and that is like a light shines on it.

And then that dissolves the obstacle or it shows you a way around it. That's the power of consciousness. It always happens.

Either it shows you how to get around it, or it shows you how to use the very force of the obstacle. And you turn it around, if the obstacle is wanting to go this way, and you go with it for, I'm just demonstrating now, something counteracts what you want to do. It's coming this way, you want to go that way, but you don't meet it head on and start complaining, saying, no, this shouldn't be happening.

No. Perhaps you go with it for a little while, and you go, and then you turn it around. And the very power that was against you, then works for you, and you achieve your goal through that.

It happens, and this is the wisdom that comes with non-resistance. So whenever you go into this conscious doing, resistance always pulls you back into unconscious doing. It can easily happen because it's an old habit pattern, unconscious doing.

Inner resistance to whatever arises in the present moment pulls you back. Inner resistance is some form of negativity, some form of complaining, some form of fear, aggression, anger. And this is important because whenever you complain about what somebody else does, you're already beginning to fall into that trap of unconsciousness.

And of course, yes, you meet lots of people who are still trapped in ego, and they may not like what you do, but just no judgment. Just look at what the situation is. They say this, they want that, you want that, and they don't say, oh, they're dreadful.

I know what he wants. He wants to deceive me, and he always does that. He wants to go.

No, just clear. This is the situation. This is what he says he wants.

This is where I want to go, and see. Okay. Never any judgment of a personal situation.

Just clear seeing, clear facing. This is the power. It's like a light beam of consciousness.

It falls onto, illuminates that situation, that moment, that person. That's the power of consciousness. No resistance.

Jesus already talked about the power of non-resistance, and that the moment resistance comes, you're drawn back into identification with form. Protection, resistance, fighting. Are you going to succeed all the time in this?

No. It's a shift from a way of doing that has been with us for thousands of years, and a new way of doing that is only arising now. So you are transitional beings between the old consciousness and the new, and don't judge yourself if you fall back occasionally into the old consciousness, but you will quickly know it.

How will you know it? You begin to suffer. You get upset.

You get upset about situations. You get upset about people. You get upset about what somebody said.

You get upset about what somebody should have said but didn't. You get upset about what somebody did or failed to do. Oh, there's a sign that you've fallen back.

Beautiful line in the Course in Miracles, I am never upset for the reason I think. Now, upset is a generic term. It could be in any way that you're out of alignment with is-ness.

There's a disagreement with the is-ness of the present moment, and then you become upset. Now, many people are upset a lot of the time, but they don't realize they are upset, and if you talk to them and say, why are you upset? They say, I'm not upset.

I'm just bloody angry. Or, I'm not upset. I'm deeply hurt because he didn't invite me to his birthday party.

Deeply hurt. Not upset. I'm never upset for the reason I think.

Now, the deeper meaning of this, of course, is you are upset because you have lost awareness of being, your essence, identity. And the reason you think is superficial. When you lose connectedness with being, you just wait a few minutes, and something or somebody will upset you.

And so, if we believe that that which seems to cause the upset is the actual cause, this is not the case. These are interchangeable. It could be anything, and it will.

So, you'll be upset many times every day. By other people, by situations, by the slightest things, or the biggest things. Upset, upset, upset.

The entire world is so frustrating. So, that's a little sign then. If you're upset, you want to go somewhere, but people are not cooperative.

Situations are not cooperative. And you can talk to yourself. So, that's a good sign then.

You can use, also shows you to what extent the ego is active in you, because what's upset is not you, it's the ego in you. The ego is the erroneous identification with form, a false sense of I, which wanted something to make itself feel more at ease, or bigger, or more important, or whatever, and is frustrated in its aims. Well, that's a good, then it's like a little, if you had a little, it's almost like having a little technical device on your arm that tells you whenever your ego comes back, it goes, bleep, bleep, bleep, bleep.

You don't need that. Well, if somebody here is a technical wizard and is going to invent it, it's fine. But you don't need that, because all you need is to know if you're upset or not in everyday life.

Now, for many walking egos, upset is their normal state. They might not even know it anymore, because they're upset virtually all the time, and just waiting for some other thing to happen to explain why they are upset again. But, of course, there's the underlying dissatisfaction that's always there.

Foundation, then, is stillness. That's the return journey. So, can we be, then, simultaneously in the return journey to the source of all life, spiritual dimension, God, stillness, and still be active in this world?

And then, if we are that, then what we then do in this world becomes empowered by the intelligence that emanates from the source. And then the source creates through you. The power of the source is then no longer distorted by the ego, and its power greatly diminished to a trickle.

So, the source is like light, you can say sunlight, wanting to shine through fully. But for a long time, it's become reduced to a tiny little hole. There's a little bit of light coming through just to keep you going.

And now, it can come through and use you. When we use language, we always create duality. So, when I say, it uses you, it's not quite true, because you are it.

But language does that. It uses, then, once we know that it's okay, we can use those words. It uses you, then.

Now, what exactly it wants, I don't know. Perhaps it simply wants to create beauty, or forms that are alive and joyful, and enjoy that. It's enjoyed the drama of thousands, hundreds of thousands of years.

It's enjoyed the drama of people cutting each other to pieces and eating each other up. It's enjoyed the drama. The movie is changing now.

And perhaps it's creating a much more pleasant movie. And who knows what is in store for us. I've never, I cannot predict the future.

I'm not particularly interested. This present moment is wonderful enough. But something is, there's a change happening.

And, of course, there comes a point in your life when you may not, this, the source may become much more important than whatever you do. So, you reach a time when you say, well, I've done this, and that, and it's been wonderful. And then, all you are, you're just still, and you emanate that stillness.

And even then, you affect the world around you without any doing. If you just be there, and whoever you come into contact with, there's some almost, one could say, transmission, even if they don't notice it. You can do that, and some humans, perhaps, will mostly live in that way.

How much doing you do, how much varies from form to form, person to person. Some will be very active into conscious doing, and create, and enjoy the creation. And others may do relatively little, or may just continue to do what they're doing already, but whatever they are doing will be a vehicle for consciousness or stillness that flows into this power, this beautiful energy that flows.

It could be even a person who just gives information. Let's say you work at an airport, and you give information to people, and maybe you stay there, and then everybody who comes to ask, where's gate number 16, you say, well, you go that way, and it's only about a three-minute walk. And there were not only the words, there was a transmission of stillness with the words.

Not in the sense that I am going to transmit stillness, no. It happens because you let go of the sense of doing, of I do, it happens. And the person, this one traditional word for it is blessing, the person goes away being blessed with that energy.

And so, beautiful. So what you do really is secondary. Some may do great things.

Others may do things that look on the surface not so significant. And ultimately, ultimately, what you do is secondary, but how you do it is primary. And how means the consciousness that flows into what you do.

By dissolving the ego, won't I be dissolving my self-esteem? Do I not need self-esteem to love myself and others? Yes, self-esteem.

Many people seem to have a problem with that. Lack of self-esteem. I read a while ago that when the Dalai Lama was younger, he was meeting with a group of Westerners, and they were talking about the lack of self-esteem.

And he just couldn't understand that, what that was. And they tried to explain it, and then he went around the group and asked everybody, do you have that? And most people said, yes.

It's very strange, self-esteem. Now, the human species, it's the only species on the planet, of course, that has a relationship with itself, where you have a relationship with yourself. That's normal.

But the cat doesn't have a relationship with itself. Or the bird doesn't have a relationship with itself. Or the tree doesn't.

So birds, cats, trees, monkeys, flowers, none of them have a problem with self-esteem. And even the most ugly looking cat wouldn't have a problem with self-esteem. It hasn't created a secondary, an image self, mind created.

And once, of course, that's created, it walks with you, like next to you, behind you, or wherever it is, you always walk with a mental image of me, and you have a relationship with that. And often, you don't like what you see, that image self. That's poor self-esteem.

And then you may be in conflict with it, with itself. You may be talking to yourself in the head, telling yourself something about yourself. Some people talk to themselves in the first person, but many more people talk to themselves in the second person, as you, you see.

You failed again. You see you are not as good as you see you. Why can't you?

And then at times, perhaps the self feels suddenly great about itself. Some people predominantly have low self-esteem. In other words, feel bad about the mind made image me, feel bad about that, and then realize that some realization comes in when they realize that it is mind created.

And they realize, and usually in the West, it's connected with new age teachings, and they realize that they can do something about their bad self-esteem, the image. They can, you can actually change your thinking about yourself. First, you discover that the thinking about yourself is predominantly, or to a large extent, negative.

And then, you see, that's a little bit of presence is arising. It must be, because you are able to stand back a little bit and watch and see what you are creating with your thoughts. And then the possibility comes of changing your thoughts, your self-esteem through workshops, affirmations, visualization, and all those practices.

And then after a while, that image looks a little bit more comfortable. And you feel more comfortable with that thing, walking alongside you. But since everything in form, all mind creations, thoughts are subject to polarities, you can't walk with a high, continuously with high self-esteem and feel great about yourself.

There's always a polarity to it. And it's usually bound up with what happens or not happens in your life, what feedback you're getting from others. And it is usually comparative.

The self-esteem is comparative. How do I rate myself in relation to others? And that gives you the indication of where you are on one to 10, or whatever it may be.

So self-esteem is mind, is connected with the mind made me, lack of it, or in a good self-esteem, but it exists within polarities. Even if you spent a whole year affirming continuously that I love myself, I love myself. And maybe until now you hated yourself.

And your whole, your house is full of little stickers. And wherever you look, you see, I love myself. And you look in the mirror and look into your eyes and repeat that, I love myself.

To some extent, it works to some extent. You have a better relationship with yourself, but there's always a downside. It's hard to sustain that because the other polarity will manifest also in your life.

And you go through life when, in order to know how you feel about yourself, you need to compare yourself with others. And then you say, oh, I'm actually better looking than this person. So I actually feel quite good about myself.

I'm actually much more educated than that person I feel good about, or whatever you can get. Well, this person is ill and I'm healthy, so that's good. So you need for self-esteem, if you look, you need relativity and you need comparison.

And ego is always comparing itself. Is it possible to live without having a relationship with yourself? Neither good nor bad.

Is it possible to be so completely yourself that the mind made image of me dissolves? Yes, this is why we're here. This is the essence of our gathering.

The mind made image is connected to thought, to continuous thinking. It's fueled by, perpetuated by, upheld by the continuous thought processes, many of which are about me and myself. And so I have, through thought, I have a relationship with a thought made entity, which sometimes feels quite comfortable and sometimes feels not pleasant, don't want to live with that person.

And of course it's true, many people live with a self that is very unpleasant, that creates a lot of trouble, a lot of problems, a lot of suffering, that continuously criticizes them, that continuously blames them, that continuously tells them they're not enough. And they live with that entity, mind made, conditioned mind movements, conditioned in such a way that they attack you continuously. And that's the self that they have a relationship with.

They would never live with a person like that. You would run out of the room. You couldn't live with a person for more than a day.

If your partner, somebody you live with, did that to you, what your self image is doing to you through thought, you would have filed for divorce long ago. But you can't do that with that because it's on the mind. It walks with you.

And there you have this complaining and whining and accusing and, oh, get away. And a large part of that is because you're identified with thought. There isn't the ability to step back from thought and watch thought, watch that.

This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. If you are at the mercy of situations, you're at the mercy of things going exactly the way you planned them and the way you're supposed they are supposed to go.

And if they don't, you get upset. Some people get sad or depressed, others get angry and irritated, whatever it is. So you are at the mercy of things happening or not happening or happening in a particular way, or people behaving towards you in a particular way.

So you're under, you're always at the mercy of stuff happening or not happening. And if you are more deeply connected with the presence, that is the source of satisfaction in your life. Every other source of satisfaction is kind of fake, pseudo, not the real thing.

Presence, that arising presence is the source of satisfaction. The primary source of satisfaction in your life. Yes, there are secondary sources of satisfaction, of course, an apple pie.

You have a nice swim, feels good. You go for a hike. You have sex.

You have a drink. You even achieve something. You learn to master a certain skill.

And then as you practice, that is a satisfying, it's satisfying. And then you achieve it, it's satisfying. It's, these are all secondary satisfactions in your life.

And there's nothing wrong with that, of course. And if you meet a long lost friend, suddenly, it's great to meet you. It's so wonderful.

Of course, it's, there is a satisfaction in that, but they are all secondary satisfactions. The main source of satisfaction is the presence. And even all those things that are secondary satisfaction, many of them are, because for a moment, they bring you into presence.

For example, if you're climbing a mountain or you're hiking, or you're walking on the beach, or you're swimming, certain activities take you out of your mind and can bring you into presence while they last. And you feel so good. And you think it's caused by the activity, but it's caused by the fact that you're, all the habitual torturous thinking subsided, and you're suddenly completely there.

That was so good, that swim, that hike, that whatever it was, it was so good. Okay, why? Well, it was good because, were you thinking?

No. Were you thinking about yesterday or tomorrow or your problems or your difficult life or difficult people in your life? No.

Okay, you were completely present. So once you realize and sense that true satisfaction is derived from presence, that means when things go wrong in ordinary life, when you encounter undesirable, so-called undesirable circumstances, when things don't work out, they were supposed to work out, things break, suddenly you lose something, a difficult person comes into your life, you can, even in that situation, you can continue to be in touch with the source of satisfaction.

Let's say you made great plans for some great wedding, and suddenly on the wedding day, something happens, and the groom or the bride are detained somewhere, and they can't make it. And we've invited 300 people, and we've paid thousands of dollars for this wedding, and I've been looking forward to this for years. It was supposed to be the culmination of my life.

It's a fictitious situation, but it could happen and probably has happened. It's just one of many possible examples. So this is a very unpleasant thing, if you're not in touch with the true source of satisfaction, and you go all shaky and upset, or hysterical, whatever, depending on your predispositions.

You lock yourself in a room, or you scream, depending on whatever kind of ego you have. But if you are in touch with the source of satisfaction, in presence, wow, okay, that's a pity. But of course, we'll have it some other day.

And you continue to feel a sense of aliveness, because after all, this moment isn't that bad, just because the wedding has collapsed. And I'm using the collapsed wedding as a metaphor, whatever collapses or goes wrong. So here we have...

And you are then above the situations in your life. They don't control you anymore. And I wouldn't go so far as to say that you control them.

To some extent, of course, you can manifest certain good things, but you're never totally in control of externals. There are many other factors. And you don't need to be totally in control of externals.

So question always arises, are you above the situation, or are you below the situation? Are you at the mercy of situations and people, or are you free of dependency on how other people behave towards you, or how certain situations evolve or happen, or dependent on whether something happens or does not happen? And shortly after this shift in consciousness, I had saved some money to visit my dad in Spain.

And because his wife was extremely challenging, it was agreed that I would stay in a small hotel. That was... I was in my...

I think I was about 30 years old. So I was looking forward, of course, to going to... I lived in England, going to sunny southern Spain, spending 10 days there.

And I booked, or my dad booked for me a place. He didn't have any money at that time. Well, he had some money, but not, I think, not enough to book a great room for me.

So he made a booking, but he hadn't looked at the hotel or the room. And when I arrived, the hotel was by the sea. So I imagined a view of the beautiful blue Mediterranean Sea.

And when I got there, and I looked out the window, there was a brick wall. It was facing away from the sea, and there was a kind of cliff, and there was just a brick wall and a little bit of sky. And so I stood there, and looked at the brick wall, and suddenly I felt incredibly peaceful.

And I suddenly realized it doesn't matter at all whether I have a sea view or a brick wall. Why didn't it matter? Because there was a flow of satisfaction coming from within.

If it had been my choice, I would have said, I prefer a sea view to a wall view. But I didn't have a choice. And I was amazed, because that was not long after this inner shift.

So I wasn't yet familiar with all the effects it has on things in one's life. And there were many, many instances when I was amazed. I said, why do I feel so peaceful?

I don't know. I just feel... I did nothing.

In this particular case, I knew that at some level it did ultimately did not matter. And that was so liberating, so liberating, that reminds me of a very similar story. We had a retreat in probably Oregon many years ago, and one of the participants, who was also a friend of ours, had just started to unpack things in her room, the retreat room, when a woman burst into her room without knocking in tears and sounding hysterical.

And she said, this was supposed to be my room. And they put me somewhere else. I asked specifically for this room.

I've been waiting for this retreat for a long, long time. And I'm having difficulties in my life. This is all just so dreadful.

And our friend, without even having given it a single thought, said, you can have it. I'll move into yours. And the woman's, really?

No. Do you mean that? Oh, my God.

Oh, wonderful. Thank you so much. I'm so happy.

It is probably true that she had been through difficult times. Yes. But she was totally at the mercy of externals.

And our friend, I didn't inquire further how she felt when she moved into that undesirable room, which probably wasn't that bad. I don't think there was a brick wall outside the window. So she was fine.

So in her, there was some connectedness with the source of satisfaction. So her well-being did not depend on what kind of room she was in. Now, does that mean whatever room they put you in, when you book a room in a hotel, you should say, okay, not necessarily.

Why not? If that is not the right room, you can talk to them and say, this isn't the room I booked. I'd rather have the room that I booked and paid for, and then see what happens.

But again, there is not going to be that, uh, uh, or the anger. How dare you put me in this room? You lose all, there's no longer a flow.

Do you remember we talked about what makes up a true human? It's goodwill towards other humans, a flow of benevolence and goodwill, no matter what the situation is. And even if you're complaining about your room, you can complain.

And there can still be a flow of benevolence and goodwill because there is a human being there. That human being may have nothing to do with the fact that they put you in the wrong room. And you probably know that, but you're angry with him or her.

So of course you can change situations. And I think I probably asked, I don't remember all the details. I may have asked, I'm sure I did in that when I got to that hotel with a brick wall outside, do you have another room with a sea view?

Sorry, that's all we have left. Okay. So it was a surprise to me that one, that I could be okay with that.

And I don't know how this woman from the retreat, whether she benefited from the retreat and whether by now, I haven't seen her in a long time. I wish her well. And

I do hope that by now she has found the source of true satisfaction within herself so that the wrong room does not create an enormous amount of suffering.

If a wrong room creates an enormous amount of suffering, how much suffering when something really goes wrong. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Do we need ego only for the purpose to find out that we are not it, or could it be useful for anything else? Ego is a necessary stage to go through because there is a pre-egoic stage for humans. There was a where they live in relative happiness compared to the egoic state in a simple oneness with nature, with each other in tribal communities.

But for the growth of consciousness, we have to go through the egoic stage, form identity, developing. The ego is not to be totally, the ego has its purpose. You cannot become awakened without going through the ego.

It's like having those pre, in pre-egoic societies, people lived in oneness with nature. They didn't even know it. They didn't know that they lived in oneness with nature.

They just did. So in order to experience or to know something at a deeper level, you have to go through a loss of it first. You go through a loss as described in the parable of what is called the prodigal son in the New Testament.

The prodigal son is the son of a father who loves him and is wealthy, but he wants to leave, lead his own life. He leaves the father's home, goes to a foreign country, gradually squanders his wealth and becomes destitute. He loses his connection to the source of happiness and wealth.

And then messengers come to remind him who he is and that the father wants him back. So he then returns to the father's home. And then he is known by the father and the father loves him more now.

So he is back home, but it's not the same home as before. There is an added dimension to it that wasn't there before. So we are all prodigal sons.

We have to lose our sense of oneness in order to regain it at a deeper, more conscious level, our connectedness to the source. Before it was an unconscious connectedness which just resulted in relatively unproblematic life, simple, unproblematic life. And then, so it's paradise lost and paradise regained.

When paradise is regained, it is regained at a much deeper level than before. There's an added dimension of consciousness there. And that is there because we moved through the egoic stage.

And what we learned in the egoic stage will not be totally discarded. The form identity remains. Our next stage is in the evolution of humanities.

Once humans are rooted in being, the next stage is conscious creation, where humans can manifest without having to go through the laborious processes that at the moment we still have to go through. Factories, heavy technology. For the future of humanity, I don't necessarily see an ever-increasing technology.

It is more likely that technology is one branch of human's development, but not the one, not the branch that will lead further up the tree. The ability to manifest through consciousness will, you already have it to some extent. There are things that you can manifest in your life, especially if you are rooted in the consciousness.

So it's not the ego that wants to manifest, but the consciousness wants, can use you as a vehicle for what it wants to manifest consciously in this world. So a time will come when we can manifest what now we laboriously produce energy. It's absurd how we use, where we seek energy in fossil fuels and so on.

Ultimately, obviously, the next step is there are two inexhaustible sources of energy. One is outer and one is inner. The outer inexhaustible energy is our sun.

It's an outpouring of energy and it's virtually limitless, although we know that the sun has a lifespan, but that is not relevant to us because the lifespan is a few more million years. And that is an inexhaustible supply of energy on the outer. And then even the sun is only an external expression of the inexhaustible energy that is the source of all life.

So it's just an outer manifestation. And this is why ancient traditions worshiped the sun because in a way one could say, well, that's very much like God because it's a continuous giving of life. It's a life giving entity, not asking anything back.

It just gives of itself continuously. So when people say energy is limited, of course, energy is not limited. It's only where we look for it that's limited.

If we continue to look for it in fossil fuels and so on, that's limited and can be very harmful, but energy itself is not limited. The sun is unlimited and the source of all life is unlimited. We just have to find it.

So the next step is using sun energy. And then after that is being able to use the energy, source energy for creation. You can't even imagine what even science fiction books, they're not, can't even think of any that have even thought of what life can be when humans can effortlessly generate or manifest what they need or want.

But it won't be, they will not manifest superfluous or unnecessary things as the ego would. So let's not go too far into that. So if you discover within yourself that a lot of the time you're in a state of lack, of insufficiency, of not enough, and you feel that the answer to the remedy is to be active in this world and achieve and do as much as possible, then you'll probably find that ultimately that is not the answer to your state of lack.

In order to transcend, to go beyond your state of lack, of neediness, of not enough, spiritual practice and spiritual realization is necessary. Focus on the realization of being. It's only there that you can go beyond that state of lack which is ego.

Go within and discover who or what you are beyond the person.

[Speaker 3] (4:24:25 - 4:24:53)
I was watching a talk with you and Neil Donald Walsh and he said, you know, we both wrote great books but the difference between him and you is that you live it. And so first I just got to thank you for being such an example for something that's truly missing in most of the world. But my question is, what's a day like in the life of Eckhart?

It sounds like a bad reality TV show but...

[Speaker 1] (4:24:55 - 4:26:27)
It's not terribly interesting. It's very ordinary, unless when I'm traveling it gets a bit more interesting because there's a plane to catch and there's a hotel and so on. But when I'm not traveling, it's extremely ordinary.

I love being, so there's always set aside time for just being still or walking in nature. And I'm notorious for not meeting deadlines. Everybody knows when they say there's a debt, this needs to be done, this thing needs to be done by so and so.

Well, we'll see. And I love night times, so I sometimes don't go to bed until 1.30 or 2 and sleep about five hours. And I like little things, going to a cafe, have a coffee somewhere.

Nature, as I said, love walking in nature, reading occasionally, being, doing whatever needs to be done, people call. There's always things that need to be done. I do them quietly.

Some things don't get done at all and then they disappear.

[Speaker 3] (4:26:29 - 4:26:38)
Easier for you, right? Are you still able to go out in public though and still able to go out in public?

[Speaker 1] (4:26:38 - 4:33:47)
Well, that is interesting. I go out usually with a baseball cap, which I never really liked, but I've been wearing them for years now. And the, because I love privacy, I love to be invisible, I love to be in a room and being able to just observe what goes on in the room without anybody being aware that I'm there.

That's more difficult now. So often people come up, even with a baseball cap, they come up and usually it's lovely. They say some that it's been so wonderful, my life has changed.

It happens almost every day. And that's wonderful. I prefer not to be recognized, but the moment it happens, I'm happy and I respond and it's a loving interaction.

But my preference is not to be seen. Uh, I'm an introvert by nature. So even to go out and give talks was a very strange thing for me.

I knew that this is what the universe wanted me to do or the universe acting through me. So it's, it's things that one surrenders into things and then they're fine. It's not my nature to go out and sit on stage and talk.

Uh, and uh, so every situation brings its own challenges. The loss of privacy and so on is, could be seen as a challenge and requires then surrender to see in this world, there are polarities. You gain something here, you lose something there in the world of polarities on the surface, on the surface level, you experience polarities.

The gain here has to be paid for something. So the fact that the teaching has gone out to so many people, that's wonderful. Of course, then yes, privacy is lost that need to accept that.

Uh, before I had privacy, but very few people were reached by the teaching. Well, I did workshops in the, in the eighties and early nineties. Uh, but I, there was one evening talk in England that had been scheduled.

Nobody turned up. I was alone. I just sat there, but I had my privacy and then I had a workshop one schedule.

Usually I had about a seven, 10, 12, 15 people for little workshops or one workshop had been, somebody had organized a workshop for me and I arrived for weekends, Saturday and Sunday. One person turned up waiting at the door and said, okay, let's do it. So not that many people were reached, but I was wonderful privacy.

No. So that's how it is. It's, um, uh, simple.

I don't live in an ashram, uh, where, uh, some spiritual teachers live in an ashram where they're surrounded by, by people who go. And that can be, of course, comforting for a while to the ego. If you still have an ego, hopefully not the spiritual teacher, but, uh, it's not good.

It's, I prefer to be in every normal everyday life and, uh, go to the supermarket. And so it's, so it's not interesting, unfortunately, and not, not even glamorous, except occasionally when I visit Oprah, then suddenly it's, ah, driving into the big, the gates open to the big mansion and you drive in. But otherwise not that much glamour.

Thank you. Another question is, what is the key to stop the self-talk in the head? Well, just briefly, because I've spoken about that a few times in various occasions.

First of all, you need to know that there is self-talk in the head, not after, uh, several hours of being totally immersed in self-talk in the head and suddenly you get a moment of reprieve and then you say, oh, there was so much self-talk in the head. In order to, to, to become free, you need to know that there's self-talk in the head while there's self-talk in the head. Otherwise, there's just self-talk in the head without any awareness.

There needs to be a glimpse of awareness. And from there, you can, you can see that you want to be free of it, and that's not who you are. And the past, everything dissolves and then it becomes the past, which is a memory of a present moment in the now.

You talk about the past, you're remembering something that happened, but when it happened, it was a now, and it's still the now. So, but that absorbs human attention completely for the most, for unawakened humans. My past is my life.

And then you look back on your past and you come to some kind of conclusion about yourself, your identity and your life.

[Speaker 6] (4:33:49 - 4:33:49)
Hmm.

[Speaker 1] (4:33:50 - 4:42:31)
Well, that's my life. For many people, it's a mixed bag. They're not completely, it's not a, it's not the greatest, because there are things that are not going well in my life.

It could be, it could be your financial situation. It could be your relationship situation, your professional situation, your living situation, your health situation. Somewhere, other people, oh my God, problems.

You can look in your life, where are the main problems in your life? They're somewhere there, what I've mentioned. Hardly any human is free of experience.

This one or two of these dimensions is problematic at any given moment in time. And if you, for a moment, everything is going well. Let's say you have achieved great professional success.

Your income is great. You have a wonderful place to live. Your family is doing well.

You have two healthy and intelligent and wonderful children, and your wife is perfect, and your health is great, and your body looks fantastic, and you're great looking. Is that possible? It may be possible for a brief moment, but not for long.

So if that's the case with you, just wait a little, and something will pop up out of nowhere and challenge you and say, oh my God. And especially you just solve something here, and then something pops up there. Even if you practice positive thinking, which is a great thing to do, it will improve your life considerably, but it does not mean you will not be challenged by life again.

You will experience the opposite. Every situation contains opposites. You gain something here, but you lose something there, and you will experience being challenged by life.

And you can't get away from it. That's the weird thing. So if all is going perfectly in your life right now, it's unlikely that there's anybody here to whom this is happening temporarily, because why would you come here?

Everything is perfectly fine. So you get back into your big car and have a big meal and drink, and then you go to your radiant family in your beautiful home. Okay.

Everything is so satisfying, it doesn't work. It's not... So being challenged does not stop even when you begin lucid living, which means what we are talking about here, to bring consciousness into your daily life by not losing touch with the underlying awareness or presence within you, which would be my call still a field of highly, let's say, a field of highly intelligent presence that underlies it all.

And that, it is a stillness, but it's alive, vibrantly alive, a stillness within you. Underneath the personality, not separate from it, but underneath it. So one could almost say that, well, one could say that you as a person or the personality exists on the surface of being, so to speak, in the same way that a wave or ripple exists on the surface of the ocean.

Triples everywhere. And this, I often use this analogy because it's quite helpful, because that's actually how it is. You exist on the surface of being as a physical entity and a psychological entity.

And as such, you are a ripple on the surface of the ocean, a ripple that has forgotten its nature, not only its connectedness with the ocean, but its absolute oneness with the ocean. The ripple is the ocean, the ocean temporarily manifesting as a ripple. Look at me, says the ripple, and looks at other ripples and fears other ripples and complains about other ripples.

And then seeking out some satisfaction on the surface of the ripple existence, never getting a feeling of home, of having arrived. Ah, briefly, yes, briefly, but usually it means there's a lowering of consciousness. I mentioned drinking alcohol, for example, you drink a couple of glasses, you feel a little better.

Why do you feel a little better? Because it slows down your thinking process, which sustains the person, the problematic entity. And so that slows down towards, and you suddenly, you can observe it in people when they have a couple of drinks.

Not everybody I come to, there's another possibility what could happen too, but let's stay with that for a moment. You have a couple of drinks and you feel life is suddenly lighter. You feel like singing, you might even sing, and then you say, I need another one, because if two is good, three must be better.

And if three is better than four, surely. And finally, you're moving more and more towards unconsciousness, and then you fall off the chair. So that's not the way to go.

So you, yes, humans are longing to become free of the self. And then many of them, whether it's unconscious, they go to drugs to experience a little bit of that. Some release from their problematics and almost continuously unsatisfying existence, continuous sense of lack, continuous sense of not enough, something missing, of discontent, of restlessness.

Even youngsters have that. And then they need some substance, and they take something in to feel that there's something missing, and that slows down the apparatus of your thinking mind that creates continuous unease and discontent. And suddenly, or you smoke a little bit, you go, ah, feels so much better.

Yes, it is you becoming free of yourself temporarily, but I'm not necessarily saying never do this. But that's not the ultimate way. It's not a regressive movement.

We don't want to fall below thinking. We don't, because animals and plants, they are not burdened with this self. They are not burdened with incessant, unconscious, conceptual thinking.

[Speaker 8] (4:42:31 - 4:42:34)
They are conscious. There's a consciousness there that operates.

[Speaker 1] (4:42:56 - 4:48:26)
When you were in utter despair, would having access to someone like you have helped you? That's another interesting idea for a science fiction story of time traveling, where my old, my 28-year-old self comes here and sits somewhere in the audience and listens. Now, would that have helped?

There needs to be a readiness in the person to be helped. Some definitely want to suffer a bit more. They would definitely refuse.

Any kind of the openness would not be there. There were times at that time when people noticed around me that I was unhappy. There was a professor of the university.

He was doing transcendental meditation. And he said to me, you really should be doing meditation. And I said, no, I don't want to do meditation.

I lose all my motivation to work and that's not what I want. I was a bit scared of meditation. He said it would transform me and make me completely ineffective because I wanted to achieve.

I wanted to become an important intellectual. So meditation would have thought might be an obstacle to that. No, I'm not doing this.

So I refused. The help could have been, this was a hint of the universe said, why don't you do transcendental meditation? You might be less anxious.

But I didn't do it. So perhaps if I had met myself, I would have said, who is this guy? I don't know.

Some, you cannot help everybody. You might've noticed. And some humans need, and if they cannot, if there's no openness to be helped, it means they are happy with the spiritual teacher they already have.

And his or her name is suffering. Then they just need to experience that a bit more because if you show them the possibility of going beyond suffering or somebody else in a different way shows them the possibility and somebody else does and another therapist and another, or they open a spiritual books. What is this mumbo-jumbo?

Not ready, not ready to listen. Need to suffer a bit more. Suffering has a certain function in the evolution of consciousness.

I would, if let's say, if you were an omnipotent, the omnipotent God and you removed all human suffering right now, that's the end of the evolution of consciousness. Of course, you could, if you were totally omnipotent, you could say, let consciousness only express itself right now. That's not how it works, but the, it cannot express itself except through this.

Suffering is necessary until it no longer is necessary for you. And so it has a function within the totality. It is, you can see it in your own life.

I had to go through it up to that point. And there's a lot of collective suffering. There's not only suffering in poor countries.

Yes, there is. There is different kinds of suffering everywhere. There's intense suffering in the rich countries.

You can probably find more happy people in the poor countries than the rich countries. So they're just different degrees of suffering. And so at some point, the individual realizes that suffering that is ultimately self-made, self-produced, and then the shift happens.

And then evolution has a, is of a different kind. It is no longer impelled or fueled by suffering. You still evolve, but it's no longer through suffering.

It's so, and that helps when you encounter a spiritual teaching or a spiritual teacher, that is the moment when that spiritual teacher takes over from suffering. That's the old spiritual teacher. And then you, you get, you get handed over to the new one.

That's a wonderful, that should be celebrated in a person's life. The transition from Mr. and Mrs. Suffering or the guru called Suffering, three, three Suffering, to an actual teacher.

[Speaker 6] (4:48:26 - 4:49:38)
I love you.

[Speaker 4] (4:49:41 - 4:50:29)
So in talking about thinking, I know this has an obvious answer and I'm actually asking beyond this, but where do our thoughts come from? So oftentimes I'll, I'll have thoughts and I, I recognize them as even not my own or, or possibly patterns that have existed for years and years. You know, jealousy thoughts or competitive thoughts or the thoughts of being threatened and fear.

But truthfully, is this something is waking us up in the middle of the night that you were just talking about? What is that? Is it, is it just part of the condition of being alive?

[Speaker 1] (4:50:30 - 4:50:45)
Thank you. The Buddha was asked a similar question. I'll tell you what he said, but then I'll, I will answer it because he didn't.

[Speaker 6] (4:50:47 - 4:50:48)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (4:50:54 - 4:57:12)
Somebody asked him a question like that and he gave a parable. He said, you've got, somebody shot you with an arrow. You've got an arrow stuck in your body.

And before you remove it, you're trying to find out where did that arrow come from? Before I remove it, I need to know who shot it and why and where it came from. Let's examine this in more detail.

And that was his answer. What he was saying was, our main concern should be to remove the arrow instead of trying to find out where it all started. How did it all start?

Where did it all originate? That was, his teaching was very practical, totally practical. Not all of Buddhism is that practical anymore.

Some of it still remains practical compared to other traditions. But in the very beginning of the Buddhist teaching was just totally practical. Remove the arrow.

The arrow, of course, stands for suffering, any form of suffering that is self-generated through the mind. And, okay, so that was his answer. Now, of course, I agree with that, and I'm sure we all do.

Thought, going a little bit beyond it, thought is, there's such a thing as a collective mind. And so many thoughts are not your thoughts, really. They arise in the collective mind.

They are energy fields or energetic entities that one could almost think of them as little bubbles floating around. They may not be literally true. I haven't actually seen any bubbles, but little bubbles, thought forms floating around.

And if the thought form discovers any resonance with anything inside you, for example, any form of negativity, and then there's a thought form in the collective mind, an even heavier thought form of negativity floating around, just a slight irritation about what somebody said today. And then there's another thought form that resonates with that negativity, and then that little, that bubble comes. And before you know it, the irritation has become something bigger.

So you connect with the universal mind, and it moves through you. So when we deal with our so-called our own minds, with far more than our own minds, and whatever awareness arises in you is not just your benefit. It has an impact on the totality of the collective mind.

When awareness arises in you, it means awareness is arising in the collective mind of humanity. So it's not just a personal thing. In the same way that any thinking that takes possession of your mind is not really personal.

There is no personal thought as such. It pretends to be personal. It's the human collective mind.

In the same way, of course, an emotion generated by that is not, it looks like my emotion, but it's either it's anger or it's sadness or it's jealousy or it's whatever this, and that's basically, it's the same in everybody when it arises. It attaches itself to slightly different stories in the mind of why I'm angry, but the anger is anger, human anger. So again, it's not yours.

You pick it up, and then it gets hold of you, and then many humans live virtually with a mind that has taken possession of them, pretends to be them, and they're stuck with it without even knowing it. If they knew it, there would be the beginning of freedom. They don't know it, and if you tell them they are, they get angry, but they don't.

The mind does because it feels threatened. So there's still humans who won't hear this. They can't hear this because immediately they would feel threatened by it because they're totally possessed by the mind.

You can see how, for example, certain collective thought forms can take possession of an entire country. Such has happened, for example, during communism, Soviet communism in Russia, Maoism in China. Millions of people all thinking the same thing.

But even in our society, it's not necessarily one monolithic thought form such as that, but there are different thought forms through the media become perpetuated, and without knowing it, often they are our most basic assumptions, how we interpret the universe and the world around us. Our basic assumption are thought forms that come out of the collective, have taken possession of us, and they're all forms that consciousness takes in the mind, and that's all fine in itself. It's fine if there is an awareness, but if thought is all there is, it becomes destructive and insane without awareness.

Of course, your next question, if you want to carry that, is why? How did it all start? Where does it come from?

And that's the arrow again.

[Speaker 4] (4:57:12 - 4:57:12)
Right.

[Speaker 1] (4:57:13 - 4:57:13)
Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (4:57:13 - 4:57:20)
In fact, my friend Jen and I use the phrase, when you ask why, that is the lie.

[Speaker 6] (4:57:20 - 4:57:21)
Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (4:57:21 - 4:57:40)
Just the need to let it go. But the thing that occurred when you shared your answer, thank you, is that the thinking isn't something I need to war against, but rather it's a tool, and it's showing me where I'm allowing myself to identify with something that I'm not, and thus identify with being separate from this one.

[Speaker 1] (4:57:41 - 4:57:41)
Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:57:41 - 4:57:42)
It's a wonderful tool.

[Speaker 1] (4:57:42 - 4:57:43)
Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:57:44 - 4:57:49)
That is ultimately powerless in the face of consciousness. Is that correct?

[Speaker 1] (4:57:49 - 4:58:16)

Yes. If you are identified with thinking, is it powerless? Yes.

Because you're not there. You're absent, virtually absent, or completely asleep when you're identified with thinking. So you're being run by patterns on the karmic collective patterns, mental patterns.

And so your true power comes as you wake up out of that.

[Speaker 8] (4:58:21 - 4:58:23)
Thanks Eckhart. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (4:58:44 - 4:59:20)
My question is around, before you were talking about intensification of presence. So at times I've felt intense energy in my body, throughout my body. But that's more rare.

And it's, I feel that I experience presence in more of an underlying calmness. So my question is, is presence experienced, is there something consistent with presence?

[Speaker 1] (4:59:20 - 5:04:19)
Do you mean, does it always feel the same? Is that what you mean, perhaps? Well, the, as I said, the intensity of presence can vary.

Then, so presence is the energy field. Now, this is very hard to talk about, but I'll just, I will make an attempt. It is almost as if there's a place inside from where presence emanates.

And that place is timeless. And I can only compare it in the sense-perceived world, could compare to this, like the sun that continuously shines, and yet it has no form. So it's like a space rather, out of which presence emanates.

So the sun is an actually positive presence. But if you imagine that the sun were an empty space, out of which the light emanates, then you get a better, this is closer to the truth of how it is experienced as you go very deeply into it. So there is a space within, or a spaciousness, that is the point out of which the emanation of presence happens.

And that space is absolute repose, absolute stillness. And to feel that in yourself is joy, very joyful, in the, for lack of a better word. There's an aliveness there, but it is absolutely still.

That's the core. And that is, perhaps as I speak of it, you can get a sense within yourself what that is. You can only sense it when you're not thinking.

You can't be thinking and sense that. That's the innermost stillness within you. Out of that emanates presence, which can emanate directly from the body, can also move into your mind and begin to use your mind and inform the mind and speak through the mind.

There were times in my life when I was very passive for, you know, my episodes on seeking on park benches, but even after that, for long periods of time, I was so immersed in that inner stillness that there seemed no point in doing anything. And you don't need to go that way. I didn't have any guidance, so nobody could tell me what to do with that.

So I gradually had to learn for myself that you can be active in the world and at the same time completely rooted in the stillness. So you particularly mentioned the state of calmness when you can feel it. So it may be that you have that connectedness with a still point within and feel that very strongly.

It's very hard for people to, people also differ in their choice of words when they speak about it. So you could ask, if you go to India or you go to any Buddhist country, you may find that, and ask them about spiritual awakening, you may find that the words they use to describe it are very, very different. And only if you know already from direct experience what it is they're talking about, you can recognize that they are talking about the same thing.

So I've already said too much about it because what I have said may, those words may not be what the words that you would choose to talk about your experience of presence. So are you, are you able to suspend thinking for certain moments without going to sleep? Um, I'm not sure.

Okay, try it now. Okay, stop. Okay, how was that?

[Speaker 3] (5:04:20 - 5:04:23)
Um, I don't remember a thought.

[Speaker 1] (5:04:23 - 5:04:28)
Okay. Yeah. So there was no thought.

Yeah. Because not thinking is not memorable.

[Speaker 6] (5:04:29 - 5:04:32)
Yeah. Okay.

[Speaker 1] (5:04:33 - 5:17:18)
Now, this is very significant. So the mind doesn't know what to do with not thinking because the mind is thought. The mind cannot really appreciate how important not thinking is, because what the mind is interested in is, let me ask another question.

That's what the mind is interested in. It's not interested in, in stepping aside and allowing no thought to arise. So the mind has a certain momentum.

The most important thing is to become familiar with that state of no thought. Far more important than any question that could arise in your mind or any answer that the greatest spiritual teacher could give you. So that's why I mentioned in the New Earth, I was visiting that big, a big center where they offer countless fascinating courses on developing this and that faculty and spiritual development and, and physio, physical development and all kinds of huge number of courses are offered.

You can have anything, a menu of courses, you can pursue any interest, wonderful and fascinating. So I don't know if you remember reading it, I wrote, somebody came to me and showed me that program, that menu of fascinating courses and workshops. So which one do you think is most suitable for me?

And I looked through it. There's so many, I don't know. But I can tell you this.

What are the way I put it at that time was be aware of your breathing just for a few days and you will gain more than attending any of these courses. And it's free. Be aware of your breath as you go through daily life as much as you can.

What does that imply? That implies there's a space of no thought because you cannot be aware of your breath and think at the same time. If you want rapid acceleration of spiritual awakening, don't ask another question.

Because that the next question and the next and the next won't get you any closer, especially after. As you can see, I'm winding down. Especially after being here for several days, I have said all that can be said about spiritual awakening.

The next step is up to you. And it does not consist in. Well, let me see.

No, I need to do something else. I need to know. I know that some questions are helpful because.

But ultimately, the most essential thing is bring presence into your life now, for example, by being aware of your breath as much as you can. It's just one way of bringing presence in or feel the inner body as much as you can. And that's rapid.

Or if you can, just step out of thought already without using any of those portals. Just move out of thought. And some of you can do that already.

Then choose that as much as possible in your daily life. Choose to be in thoughtless awareness whenever you don't actually need to think. And that's quite a lot of the time.

That's the spiritual practice. There's no other spiritual practice. Everything else would point to that.

But this is the most direct spiritual practice. And very rapidly, you'll find the shift happening. You have a choice.

Now, with choice comes responsibility. Because the moment you have that choice, it implies that there is sufficient awareness in you for you to have choice. Once that has arisen, that choice becomes your responsibility.

We have to look at it from that point of view. Because if people ask me, well, who is responsible? Presence or you?

And all kinds of strange questions. But the most useful approach is to see that you can choose to be present. That's your responsibility.

Choose to be present in many, many situations in your daily life. Choose presence over useless thinking, for example. When you're in bed at night, when you wake up in the morning, when you're walking in nature or walking to work from here to there or traveling on public transport or sitting in your car, stopping at a red light.

Choose presence over thinking. You are able to do that. First, you have to remember that you have a choice.

That comes one. Okay, I have a choice. And then exercise the choice and take your attention away from thinking and put your attention on attention itself.

Become conscious of being conscious. From another perspective, which is also true and actually more true but less helpful, it is true to say that when you exercise your choice of being present, what is really happening is that presence is choosing to manifest through you. But what presence wants you is to feel that you can have that choice because it helps it to manifest.

Ultimately there isn't you and presence. You are an aspect of presence. So forget about what I just said.

But exercise your choice to be present, no matter where you are. And if you lose it, fine. It's coming back again and again.

Of course you will drift off again sometimes. You drift off into thinking. You may drift off into reactivity and find, oh, and then come, but then come back.

The moment you notice it, the moment you notice that you've drifted off into reactivity, your choice is to come back. If you cannot come back directly by saying, okay, I'll just be present, then use either your breath to bring you back, use the awareness of the inner body to bring you back, use some conscious movement to bring you back, or use sense perception to bring you back. Looking without labeling.

It's all, all the, especially natural things are helpful. You look at them, look at your dog. He's not thinking.

So, and immediately, it's so easy to be present with an animal, with nature, with the sky. You can use those things as help. So if you need some additional help to be present, use that.

I sometimes call it a portal into presence. There was a man working with Byron Katie, a spiritual teacher. The man was saying, if I had enough money, I would move to Hawaii, and that would be so great.

That's my dream. And she said, well, what would you do in Hawaii? Said, well, I would sit in a deck chair by the beach or in my backyard and look at the palm trees, breeze.

And she pointed out to him, well, where are you sitting now? Is the chair comfortable? Yeah.

So what's wrong with that chair? How different would it be to have just a slightly different view around you? You can be in Hawaii now.

It's an inner state. It's just the mind telling you, you need to be somewhere else in order to be happy. You need to be somewhere else.

It's here now. What's wise to seek, postpone fulfillment to some future imagined point, not realizing that the source of all satisfaction is within you already. And then sense that as your very presence and everything else, whatever happens or doesn't happen, you catch the bus or you miss the bus, you lose money, you gain money, up and down, hot and cold.

That's all the details. This mind made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. To be free, you awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation.

Now, where is the limit between necessary discernment, perceiving insanity or insincerity, meaning not being naive by expecting only good things from another person, and judgment? So again, where's the limit between necessary discernment and judgment? Necessary discernment, the questioner says, would be perceiving insanity or insincerity and not being naive by expecting only good things from another person.

Discernment, judgment. Now, if you distrust a person, that's a thought form that, of course, creates a big barrier between yourself and that person. If you distrust a person, you cannot go beyond the conditioning of that person.

When you distrust a person, of course, what you react to is the conditioning in that person. The distrust on a conventional level may be justified or not. You may be right, let's say, I don't want to do business with this person.

I distrust him because he seems to me to be dishonest, or you could say I have evidence that he is dishonest.

[Speaker 8] (5:17:20 - 5:17:22)
And so I distrust him.

[Speaker 1] (5:17:48 - 6:28:25)
Which is more effective as meditation practice? To mentally ask, who am I? Or mentally think, I am.

It amounts to the same. If you ask, who am I? Don't expect an answer.

If an answer comes to you, that's not it. Because any answer that comes to who am I will be some kind of concept, and that is a thought form, and that's not who you are. Many people who are unawakened are very, very strongly identified with their physical form, and that's only level one of their form identity.

In the moment of noticing, you're not thinking. Because you cannot notice a silent space and think at the same time. There needs to be something in you that corresponds to that silent space, and that is the inner space of awareness.

And amazingly, that is also a way of realizing who you are at the most essential, the most fundamental level. Because you are essentially that silent presence, that awareness, that consciousness. That is the essence of who you are.

It's the essence of each person in this room. And that's an amazing realization. It transforms the way in which you perceive your identity, your sense of self, because that is perhaps one of the most important questions in life, in your life, is the question of identity.

And that's why the ancient Greeks, in ancient Greek philosophy, probably going back to Pythagoras, one of the most important sayings they had, which is actually inscribed at the Temple of Apollo at Delphi, know thyself, know thyself. That is one of the most important things in your life, to know who you are. Now most people think they know who they are because they identify with, first of all, of course, you have a physical body.

And on the level of form, that physical body is, of course, a part of who you are. I call that, this is the level one of form identity. So the most important realization, this is so essential, I don't know why they don't teach that at school or university, the most important realization is that there are two dimensions to your identity, whereas most humans on the planet, which is all those who are not yet awakening, only know themselves through one identity, one dimension, and that's the dimension of form, form identity.

Form identity begins with the physical form, and that is the first thing, of course, when you meet somebody else, the first thing, of course, you notice is the physical identity of that person, a man or woman with a body and an external appearance, and that's the first thing you notice. And with yourself, many people who are unawakened are very, very strongly identified with their physical form, and that's only level one of their form identity. They are very strongly identified with their physical form, either in a positive or a negative sense, in a meaning, some people are proud of their body and appearance, look at me and compare themselves mentally to other bodies who are not as beautiful, strong, whatever it may be, very strongly identified with body and with appearance, and that's all negatively identified, I'm very unhappy about my body, it looks so awful, that again is a negative identification with body, and of course that's amplified these days through the clever technology that humans have developed, selfies are very popular these days, and usually they show aspects of your body, I suppose, your appearance, so you go, and then you send it out to as many people as possible, and then everybody, all your friends, including hundreds of people you've never met, they look at your body or your external appearance, and feel bad because you look so happy, and that makes them feel even more unhappy than they were already, and to compensate for this, they also get out their phone and take a selfie, looking extremely happy, and perhaps you can find a background that makes people feel envious, or you show yourself in a restaurant having this incredible meal, and for a while that can keep people, well, not never happy for very long, but busy, and you feel relatively okay in that dimension, of course, sooner or later a time comes when the body changes, strangely, changes its appearance, and you may think that the mirrors are no longer as good as they used to be, because you don't look quite the same as before, and so there are many options open to you, but you begin to be then a little bit unhappy more, because you identified with something that doesn't last, and particularly people who had a very strong body identification become very unhappy as they grow old, very unhappy, and nobody has told them that such an identity is extremely limited, extremely limited identity, but they don't know that, that's all they have, all their life, and then suddenly the body that made them feel superior now becomes a source of great unhappiness, and that is the fate of all those who cannot, do not go deeper within in order to discover deeper levels of who they are, so I never particularly was tempted to identify even when I was young with my body, because it wasn't particularly strong or good looking, so what do I do? I felt inadequate, it was a source of suffering, however, I realized I am more than my body, I'm also my mind, if I can't look stronger and more beautiful than the person next to me, I can be more intelligent, I can be more knowledgeable, so my sense of identity shifted instead of physical, although there was some negative identification, but my sense of identity shifted to my mind, it shifted to that, which of course is the next level down for your form identity, is your mind, your mind is all the accumulated knowledge and memories and so on that are kept alive by thought processes, so to compensate for my inadequate body, I read as much as possible, so that I could make other people feel inferior to me, because they didn't know as much as me, so I was still very uneasy, but whenever I was in a group of people, I would immediately start talking about knowledgeable things and show how much I knew, to make other people feel less than me, that's a very normal egoic strategy, was that the ego saying, don't talk about me so much? Of course I wasn't happy, I was continuously in a state of unease, because there were always people who knew more than me, what do you do with them?

And then there were others who didn't know more than me, but they had something else to identify with, they had a high social standing, went to university, I met a few lords and ladies, they didn't do anything to deserve those titles, they were born with them, so the baby comes out of the mother's womb and say, well this is lady so and so. So many of those people had a very strong, they derived a very significant part of their identity from their social background, upper class, basically it means family history, so they identified very strongly with that, and it could give them a sense of superiority towards most others, and even if the others were more intelligent, you had so much more class, so much more influence, background, whatever you call it, even the way you speak in English language in England, and even the way you speak, you will immediately show others, well not a little less these days, but when I was young and lived in England, the moment you opened your mouth, people would judge you, which social class you were, working class, middle class, upper class, upper middle class, upper class, and many of course pretending, trying to sound very upper class in an exaggerated way, it's very embarrassing, but they thought it worked.

Again, people are looking for an identity, and the sense of identity is never ultimately satisfying, they're always looking for more, they're looking for something to strengthen their sense of identity, to strengthen their sense of who they are, and the ego, basically that's what the ego is, to have a sense of identity that is based on the conditioned mind, plus the emotions that reflect the conditioned mind, if the ego, usually people think when one speaks of a big ego, that ego is people who are bigger than life, they have a huge ego, they think they are the greatest and the most wonderful and superior to everybody, that can be one aspect of ego. There's also another ego, if you don't have enough stuff to identify with, you don't have more knowledge than most people, you don't have a great body or appearance, you don't have social class background, you don't have possessions, what do you do then?

What do you identify with then? Oh my God, who am I? Or then the ego very cleverly shifts to a kind of victim identity, I am so, I've been treated so unfairly by life, my parents, it started when I was born, dreadful background, life always been at a disadvantage, always been a victim, either you personally or you can identify with the whole social group, and say we have always been victims and we still are victims.

Not that certain, of course people have, there are individuals who have been born into very dreadful circumstances, there are also, there have been on our entire groups of people who are born into bad circumstances, that is undoubtedly true, the danger is making that into your sense of identity that keeps you trapped very much in a kind of prison. Very seductive, there's a big tendency these days for people to have a collective victim identity, very seductive for the ego, you can read about it on the internet very quickly how this becomes more and more fashionable almost these days to have a collective victim identity. So let us be still an instant and forget all things we ever learned, all thoughts we had, and every preconception that we hold of what things mean and what their purpose is.

Well today I'd like to read to you and comment on some brief quotes from A Course in Miracles. A few years ago I gave a talk about The Course in Miracles in a little bit more detail, The Course in Miracles, I don't know if you have read it or done it or heard of it, it's a channeled book, first channeled in the 60s, later part of the 60s, and first published in 70, probably 76, and it's been around since then become a kind of spiritual classic, it's one of the few channeled books that are deep and quite profound, and it's not for everybody definitely, it uses Christian terminology but reinterprets Christianity so that it becomes a very deep teaching, perhaps that's the original teaching of Jesus.

It was channeled by a psychologist, clinical psychologist at Columbia University in New York, so she didn't understand the content very well, having little spiritual background, so it was dictated to her by an inner voice. So the Christian terminology is helpful to some people and a hindrance for others, it uses this old-fashioned language with exclusively masculine pronouns and God, the Father, and he going about God as he, that may be considered a limitation, but you can't look beyond that. Today I would like to, instead of using the entire course here, which is a big book, I don't even have it right here, this book was published, just a little volume here of quotes from The Causing Miracles, and it's called Accept This Gift, Selections from The Causing Miracles, four words by Marianne Williamson, published by Tartar Cornerstone Editions, and the quotes are quite very short and beautiful, and they selected also quotes that are relatively neutral in their language, so you don't get a lot of the masculine pronouns and the old-fashioned terminology. So what I will do today is just select a few of these very brief quotes and comment on them. This does not mean I'm simplifying The Causing Miracles or reducing it to something simple.

With a spiritual text, it's very different from other kinds of texts. It does not work in a cumulative sense, so the truth can be contained, the entire truth can be contained in one sentence. So it operates in the dimension of depth, not extension.

Although, of course, paradoxically, The Causing Miracles contains lessons. One part is the text, the other part is the lessons, 365 lessons, one for each day of the year. So it gives you time in that sense, but it gives you time because you need time to remove time from your mind, so to speak.

That's quite a paradox. Some of The Causing Miracles writings are quite poetic. They're almost like little poems, and maybe I'll start with one of those little almost poems.

They're quite beautiful, and perhaps the most profound one that I will start with comes towards the end of the course, which is, if somebody does the course 360, so it would be towards the end of the year doing the course. This is the longest quote in our session today, so it's actually a poem that I will read to you, and I think you will appreciate the beauty of it, and then I will comment on the meaning in case you need it. You probably don't.

I don't know yet if I'm going to read it all at once or I'll read parts first and then comment on each part. It's about a couple of pages, well, short pages. There will come a time when images have all gone by and you will see you know not what you are.

It is to this unsealed and open mind that truth returns, unhindered and unbound, where concepts of the self have been laid by is truth revealed exactly as it is. That's the first paragraph, first of the poem. Let me just briefly comment.

There will come a time when images have all gone by and you will see you know not what you are. It is to this unsealed and open mind that truth returns, unhindered and unbound, where concepts of the self have been laid by is truth revealed exactly as it is. Images have all gone by and you will see you know not what you are.

Now, does that mean that somewhere else in the Course it uses the ancient expression, know thyself, as one of the main purposes of the Course is to teach you to know yourself, know thyself? I don't know if I can find it. How does that relate to you?

A time will come when you will realize that you know not what you are. How can you know yourself? And then it says time will come when you, as a positive thing, that you know not what you are.

Well, that's easily explained. To know yourself you have to let go of concepts about yourself. And when you let go of concepts, mentally held concepts about yourself, then you no longer know who or what you are on the level of concept.

And when you have then let go of concepts, where concepts of the self have been laid by, let go of, is truth revealed exactly as it is. So when you surrender mental concepts about who you are, which is stories, narratives, interpretations, then another dimension of knowing arises which is deeper or higher, doesn't matter what term you use, than concepts. And instead of the conceptual knowledge which you let go of, a deeper dimension of knowing arises.

And in that deeper dimension of knowing that is not conceptual, it's not based on thinking, the truth of who you are reveals itself. So that's the essence of all, whether you look at Indian or Hindu teachings, Buddhist teachings, mystical Christianity, it's all the same. Sufism.

Now let's carry on with this poem on the same theme. I call it poem, it's just part of the text. Let us be still an instant and forget all things we ever learned, all thoughts we had, and every preconception that we hold of what things mean and what their purpose is.

Let us remember not our own ideas of what the world is for. We do not know. Let every image held of everyone be loosened from our minds and swept away.

Be innocent of judgment, unaware of any thoughts of evil or of good that ever crossed your mind of anyone. Now do you know him not, but you are free to learn of him and learn of him anew, him being any other person. So this section here points to the clarity that comes and the deep realization that comes when you let go of thinking basically.

So let us be still an instant and forget all things we ever learned, all thoughts we had, and every preconception that we hold of what things mean and what their purpose is. Let every image held of everyone be loosened from our minds and swept away. So it's not only about ourselves letting go of self-concepts, it's also about letting go of concepts that we hold of other people, judgments, concepts, conceptualization.

So meeting another person without any concepts. So you let go of the conceptual knowing so that a deeper knowing arises. Be innocent of judgment, it says.

Judgment is basically interpreting things through thinking. Every judgment is a thought. Jesus also said, do not judge.

So be unaware of any thoughts of evil or of good that ever crossed your mind of anyone. Now do you know him not? Once you've let go, you don't know him or her.

You see, we have the masculine pronouns. But you are free to learn of him and learn of him anew. What are you learning?

You're learning about the deeper reality of the human being, of who he or she is in their essence, and then knowing yourself in the same way. Now the book continues. Only be quiet.

You will need no rule but this. To let your practicing today lift you above the thinking of the world and free your vision from the body's eyes. Only be still and listen.

Simply do this. Be still and lay aside all thoughts of what you are and what God is. All concepts you have learned about the world.

All images you hold about yourself. Otherwise you are consciousness identified with form, the ego, trapped in form, the dream of form. And then consciousness disidentifies from form, wakes up and knows itself for the first time.

This is a very short question and hopefully the answer also will be short. Who becomes enlightened? So we could say the person does not become enlightened, but the person becomes transparent, one could say, and then light comes through, the light of consciousness comes through where the person was, perhaps still is for a while.

It's not an attainment, it's a disappearance of the density of the mental-emotional layers, that identification with which is the person. So the person becomes transparent, so to speak, all the structures. For example, it starts with the mind.

The mind movement is interspersed with spaces and that's how the light gets through, the light of consciousness. And so nobody becomes enlightened as such. Enlightenment, if you even want to use that word, is an awakening of consciousness.

Was consciousness then asleep? Well, in some way, yes, whenever there's identification with something, consciousness is dreaming the dream of form. And so, on the one hand, consciousness wants to continue the dream of form, and on the other hand, the dream of form means creating more forms.

This is one movement in the universe, is to create more differentiation in the forms. The universe is obviously creating form. Look at the life on one planet.

Even if you just look at the life forms in the sea, millions of different life forms. So the universe actually loves that movement into form. And then there's something else that the universe loves, and that's the return to the source, to know itself.

How do I know these things? Well, just through knowing this outer movement, the return movement. Us here, this gathering, anybody who is present with us here, is really part of the return movement to the source.

The universe wants that as much as it wants to flow out into things and create. So you have the two movements. And it may not even be a question of either one or the other.

It is possible for us to embody within both movements so that we continue to create, but not blindly anymore, not egoically anymore, not compulsively anymore, which is there, for example, with the compulsive wanting more things, wanting more. That's part of the ego, and that's part of the universe's need to have more, more things, more stuff. But we can also embody the return movement, and then when the awakening happens, the awakened consciousness can also create.

Why would it do that? Not out of any need, but out of joy, a joyful creation, like an artist is joyful, not an egoic artist, but an artist who deeply enjoys the act of creativity. So we can consciously create form, but be aligned with the source.

So through the human form, the source can create consciously, rather than dreaming the dream of form, which is identification with forms. Conscious creation, a beautiful thing. So there may be some questions about that today, we'll see.

I know that a very important, we live in this, at this time, on this planet, and perhaps everywhere, it could be that everything that happens here is a reflection of whatever happens in the universe. There's definitely a strong pull towards the return movement of the awakening of consciousness, how it awakens out of identification with form. How do you know that?

Well, because it happens to you. Otherwise, you are consciousness identified with form, the ego, trapped in form, the dream of form, and then consciousness disidentifies from form, wakes up and knows itself for the first time. Nothing needs to change for you to know you stay where you are, and then you suddenly know reality as yourself, and then you become a conscious co-creator.

The universe moves through the human form and creates, either a lot or little doesn't matter, or nothing, it doesn't need to create. It's free not to create. Maybe you're a frequency holder who doesn't, is not interested in creating.

You can just be aligned with the source, and yet there too, something, you're still here in this dimension, something of the source will flow through you into this dimension. Don't attempt to understand all this intellectually because it cannot be understood. I'm giving as much, perhaps too much already, of what can be understood.

The entire thing is far too vast for the human mind to understand. It doesn't need that. It's not necessary.

You can be aligned, I've said it before, you can be aligned with the source, but you cannot understand the source, and yet you can be one with it, conscious oneness with the consciousness. You cannot understand consciousness. God, amazing what they did in the 19th century.

There were some vast, these philosophers that created a huge system, and every philosopher created his own system of thought to explain the entire universe. Intricate. And then they presented these as books that here's the entire universe explained.

And then they had followers, and now it's not fashionable anymore to attempt to explain the entire universe in some kind of system. Hegel did it, Fichte, Schelling, Schopenhauer to some extent. He had deep insights into something beyond.

But it's still a little limited because nobody can present us a mentally constructed system that explains the universe. Or God can explain neither the manifested, let alone the unmanifested. Many humans are going through the enlightening process.

Enlightening has two, fortunately, in the English language. Light has two meanings, which is very nice. As you go through the enlightening or awakening process, you become lighter, not physically, but psychologically.

A lightness comes into your being, not the heaviness of the ego, the seriousness of the ego. You become lighter. But also, the other meaning of light is the light shines through you.

You become porous to the light. Consciousness moves through you. I can sometimes, when I go to a public place or anywhere, occasionally I'm wrong, but usually I can point out the people in whom the process is happening and who are most likely to come up to me and talk to me and say, oh, we read your book.

I can look at, they haven't seen me, I've seen them, and said, out of these, these are the most likely to, I don't think that, I just see it. And then I put my sunglasses on. So no matter where you look on the surface level, you're not going to arrive.

And the Buddha recognized that because he said, wherever you go and whatever you do, you will encounter suffering. Oh. And that, if only read as a statement, sounds very pessimistic or nihilistic, which means you are condemned to perpetual frustration.

Other translations of the term that the Buddha used, which is dukkha, other possible translations of that term would be misery, unsatisfactoriness, unhappiness, frustration. Nothing is ever good enough. And that manifests in some people more extremely than in others, that state of consciousness.

But in many people it manifests as a continuous discontent, a continuous sense of something wrong here, except for brief moments, brief interludes, you've just arrived at your vacation destination, until then that feeling comes up again. So dukkha, it's a very profound realization that on that level, there is no ultimate fulfillment or happiness. And so you cannot look for it in the future, because when you look at it on the surface level of life, to fulfillment through a situation, through a new place, a new activity, a new way of relating to people, becoming important, becoming, getting recognition by others, all these things are surface phenomena, which are dukkha.

And so I've met some people, famous and wealthy people who have actually achieved all that, and then they realized it actually, it got worse, because they could no longer be under the illusion that when they finally have enough money, they'll be free. And so finally they got all the money, and they could go anywhere, and they tried it out, and wherever they went, they found themselves. And they found their own state of consciousness, the unrealized state of consciousness.

And wherever they went, because they found themselves, they found frustration. And they were unhappy sitting in their private jet. And that's a good point to reach, but the good news is you don't need a private jet to get to that realization, because otherwise the chances for most of us would be slim of realization were only possible through the acquisition of a private jet, or at least a share in, a time share in a jet, which you can buy, but that's still very expensive.

So the surface level is not to be totally denied, because undoubtedly you exist here on the level of form also, and there are things to do and to acquire on the surface level as part of who you are on the level of form. So you need to be able to operate well on the level of form, learning new things, trying out new things, creating things on the level of form, whatever it is that you may want to create, or simply being engaged in certain activities on the level of form, having a personality that's not going to totally evaporate, so there's still things that are in you. You need to honor also that level of who you are, which does not mean being totally absorbed by it, trapped in it, and only know yourself as that.

So to to do, to be active, that happens on the on the surface level of life, that's fine. If you live in a place that is not the best, that way perhaps it's noisy or not nice enough, why not see if you can find a better place to live or get a better job? These things still operate.

Where it doesn't work is expecting some ultimate fulfillment through whatever you achieve, and then it, because if you expect some ultimate fulfillment, ultimate happiness, then you're telling the world, the world in whatever form it manifests to you, you're telling the world, make me happy. You have, you place expectations upon the world that it cannot meet. So the world, the world includes whatever happens to you, whatever other people, places, activities, relationships, it's all the, that's all the world, what you own, experiences on the level of form, all that is fine, is part of the dance of life, but if you expect it to make you happy, it's frustrating.

If you no longer expect these things to make you happy, they actually are quite pleasant. You can experience many things, it's very pleasant things. You visit new places, it's nice, you don't expect that someplace you should find some ultimate fulfillment just because you've moved from A to B, or you meet a new person, a relationship, without placing an impossible demand upon the other person, looking for the ultimate spiritual partner to make me happy, please apply here, send your photo too.

So the, when you, when you don't have the expectation that this person should make you happy, then the relationship actually works much better. But how can you not have that expectation only if at the same time that you operate on the level of form, you also are connected with the essence of who you are, you also realize experientially in the present moment, the meaning of the letter E, the inscription, you are. So what the inscription is telling you is to have that realization in the background of your life, so to speak, continuously, to have that inner spaciousness continuously as a backdrop, so to speak, to your life.

So when you do things, not just when you meditate, not just, although it's nice to have glimpses of it, or realizations when you, I mean, there are people who've been meditating for 20 years and never even had a glimpse of that, because they always try to get somewhere through their meditation, not realizing the meditation is not a doing. So if you practice meditation as a doing, you'll continuously miss it, because doing implies you want to get somewhere, which means it keeps you trapped on the surface level, because only on the surface level you can get somewhere. On the depth level, you already are somewhere, or nowhere.

On the depth level, that's the letter E, you are the beingness, to note, and that is the inner spaciousness where you, that consciousness that you are transcends the person, and that is where the sense of being at home, or to put it in a more conventional language, to be comfortable, there's an expression in English, to be comfortable in your own skin, of course it's more than that, it's deeper than in your own skin, but it points to that, to feel that sense of rootedness in something indestructible, and that is knowing that you are, and it's nothing to do with thinking, it's not a concept, it is knowing yourself as consciousness. Now as you might have guessed, I have a bit more yin than yang, this does not mean I'm going to burst into your lady's bathroom.

Another thing to be aware of, that's all part of it, is the yin and yang in every human being, the movement, the polarity manifests in every human being, of the feminine and the masculine, and again it's important to be, to not to stray too much to one extreme, or too much to the other extreme, nothing in excess, but there's no human being who is totally in the middle, and if you're a man, it does not necessarily mean that you energetically have a more yang than yin, there are men who have more yin than some women, there are some women who have more yang than a man. Now as you might have guessed, I have a bit more yin than yang, this does not mean I'm going to burst into your lady's bathroom and claim my right to use it, and if you become aggressive with me and say get out of my bathroom, I can say, I have more yin than you, and the fact that you are aggressive towards me proves it, you should be in the yang bathroom.

Michael, our Swedish organizer, who just spoke to you just now, yin or yang? He has even more yin than me, that's why he's so lovable, but don't go too far with your yin, you have countries too that have predominant, are more yin or yang, in the United States, you have states that can be in the collective energy field, either more yin or yang, typical example, or for example, on the whole, doesn't mean that every individual in that state corresponds to that, but on the whole, probably most people would agree that California is more yin, Texas is more yang, so if your car breaks down in the middle of the night, and your cell phone doesn't work, you have to knock at the door, and if it's an extreme yang household, the door will open with a guy with a gun, what do you want?

Get off my property, if you come to an extreme yin household, oh hi, yes, you will come in and have some soup, now the danger is with the extreme yang, you have just not helped a person who is truly in need of assistance and help, and you're totally closed, your boundary is so rigid that nothing penetrates, you've desensitized yourself in your hardened attitude, it's an extreme form of yang, so you don't even know what you're doing to yourself ultimately, now there's also danger involved in the extreme form of yin, obviously, perhaps you're helping a person in need of help, or you invite somebody in who's going to rob and kill you, and this is because you are loss of awareness, you are not more in the middle, to stay in the middle, more or less, of course you'll fluctuate, I'm always, will always probably be more yin than yang, but in certain situations, I may suddenly be a bit more yang, but that requires wisdom, it requires openness to the present moment, rather than living through mental concepts, and then your response to that situation will be correct, it will be either, there will be more yin in it or more yang in it, on the whole, and that is not a bad thing, Western civilization shifted from a very long time being predominantly and excessively yang, began to shift in the 60s more towards yin, and that was a wonderful thing, absolutely necessary, and that enabled a lot of this spirituality to come in from, spirituality come in from the East, the human potential movement, the equality for women, the respect for people who are outsiders, rather than empathy towards other human beings who are of a different race, or who are of type of minority, or human beings who are other different gay people, finally, the acceptance of gay people, all these wonderful things that happened through the shift to a more empathetic, state of consciousness through shifting to yin, and that was a great thing, otherwise we probably wouldn't even be here talking, but you have to be careful with the movement because when once it starts and there's not enough awareness, it can go on and on and on, and so the empathy towards others, which is a great thing, if you take it to an extreme, it becomes political correctness that can be very extreme, so you cannot say many things you can't say anymore, don't disagree with me because, or with us, because anything you disagree with is hate speech, stop, don't talk, of course, there is such a thing as hate speech, and that is clearly recognizable, so just as an example of an extreme form of permissiveness, well, actually, there was already a great thing, education changed very much, that's much more respecting the child, the end of corporal punishment, all wonderful things, then, of course, permissiveness came so much that there was a total lack of guidance given to a child, so it went too much that way, another interesting thing is, in many schools these days, they don't want to differentiate between children's achievement anymore, and I can see why, because it makes a child feel bad to be said, this, you are better than, you are not as good as that one, so when I was a child, we had sports events, and I wasn't very good, as you might have guessed, at sports, and it was a little bit like the Olympics, you needed to have a certain number of points, and then you got a bronze medal, and then for even better, more points, you got a silver medal, and then you got a gold medal, and I got 39 points, which was just one point below the bronze medal, and all the bigger boys condescendingly came to me and said, oh, you did really well, I'm so surprised, now, nowadays, perhaps, I would have received a gold medal, don't even have to make an effort, is that a good thing? You have to see, finally, nothing in excess, it didn't kill me that I didn't get a bronze medal, I realized that I knew that already, the physical was not my strength, being a puny weakling, oh, as Arnold says, don't be a puny loser, so, just to give a very extreme point of view now, you have to allow the child to choose their own gender at the age of seven already, so if they feel they're a tomboy, a girl is a tomboy, says, would you rather be a boy? Might be a good idea, don't you want to be a boy? Yeah, yeah, I want to be a boy, okay, you dress you up as a boy, and there's a new, I couldn't believe it at first, in Ontario, Canada, there's a new law, if the parents, if the child expresses his or her desire to be the opposite gender, this seems almost incredible, and I hope it's not true, but several people have told me it's true, and I saw it on the internet, a reliable source, not fake news, if the child expresses a desire to be the opposite gender, might be an eight-year-old or a 10-year-old, and the parents refuse to take this child to a doctor for hormone treatment, the state authorities are entitled to take the child away from the parents, seems incredible, but there will be an extreme form of where something has gone wrong, so we need to be very careful with balancing things between the two. Templar tend to identify with a particular movement, so even though yang lends itself more to ego, yin also can become ego, if you're unconscious and you identify, that means it then determines the way you think, and the way you see things, if I've said anything that you feel angry about right now, it means you have identified with something, and your ego identity, you derive from that particular collective position, and that's fine, at least now you know it.

Perhaps that is, this has become the teaching, so the understanding of what happened to me, gradually became the teaching, and I realize it's not complicated at all, and I realize many humans are ready for it.

[Speaker 4] (6:28:30 - 6:28:52)
You said this happened, this peacefulness, awareness, happened to you spontaneously, and I wonder why did it happen to you, and exactly how did that happen, and?

[Speaker 1] (6:28:56 - 6:38:01)
Okay, the first one, I don't know if I'll be able to, the first part of it, I don't know if I'll be able to answer it, it just happened. Well, I can say that it happened because the egoic sense of self got eroded, and what happened was a disidentification from thinking, this is what happened, but I didn't know that that's what happened when it first happened, it just happened, I couldn't have explained it. The last thought that I was identified with was I can't live with myself any longer, and then I looked at the thought, well, there was myself, who am I?

I didn't know that at the time when this thought came, who am I if I can't live with myself any longer? Who is the self and who am I? I didn't know at the time that I had voiced an ancient question that has been used in meditation for hundreds or thousands of years, the question, who am I?

It's spiritual teachers in India have used that question to take people into this realization since ancient times, and the question arose spontaneously in my mind, who am I? Because it seemed strange, I no longer know if the sentence, I cannot live with myself any longer, seemed so strange because there seemed to be two people there, the I and the self, and that was so strange that I was wondering, who am I if I can't live with myself? And that simple question, who am I, led to a realization of the essence of I, of what I means, and the I I realized is not my thoughts, so I disidentified from the unhappy self that was telling itself unhappy stories all the time, and so the sense of I was no longer lodged in thought, it removed itself from thought because it just couldn't stand it anymore, simple as that, that's why it happened, it couldn't stand it anymore, it removed itself, it was too painful, and all was left was that the sense of I-ness or beingness or presence, which is inherently peaceful, which has no problems in it, is timeless, and that is the true source of everybody's identity, the true source of the beingness, the formless, and then the self that consisted of thinking, identification with thinking, couldn't survive the sense of self that was no longer invested with the identification, so the unhappy me, as I called it later, dissolved, and what's left was just the I-presence, it seemed so simple, but even that I couldn't have explained at the time, it took years before I could verbalize something like this, what I'm saying now, but it is basically a very simple thing, in a way it's a very natural thing, and it could well be that at some point in human evolution, perhaps soon, there could be a natural thing that happens to people when they reach adulthood, I would suggest that as you grow up, you're a teenager, it seems a natural stage to still be at, perhaps to still be identified with the ego, to grow identified with thinking and so on, and then you become an adult, and then to outgrow that, and then perhaps ancient cultures, as you know, had rituals and ceremonies, and in ancient Greece, you had the mysteries that people underwent, they were kind of workshops, I suppose, but where transformation of consciousness happened, and so that could happen in a more enlightened culture, as people reach young adulthood, perhaps these are the new mysteries that we can create, mysteries was what is described, not everybody here may know what in ancient Greece was called mysteries, was a kind of initiation process, people were not supposed to talk about it, so nobody knows exactly what they did, but it was some kind of deepening of the human being, there were ancient things going back to ancient times, to Egypt and to India, so we could have this modern mysteries where people step out of identification with egoic self and simply realize the I, the I-ness, perhaps this has become the teaching, so the understanding of what happened to me gradually became the teaching, and I realized it's not complicated at all, and I realized many humans are ready for it, it was a surprise when I realized that, I first realized it when the power of now came out and without any advertising or anything, more and more people started to read it in the first few months, at first when the book was finished, I thought a few people may respond to it, and that's fine, if nobody wants to buy it, that's fine too, I said I will go and sell tomatoes to make a living, why I said that, I don't know, it just came, and then I realized far more people are ready, they actually went into the book and understood it or realized the truth of it because they were ready to hear it, it wasn't totally new, they were ready to hear it, yes, yes, it's always a recognition when you read or listen to true spiritual teaching, something in you already knew it, it's not totally new, and that is the power of the spiritual teaching, is the presence in you that's already there, recognizes the truth when it sees it, and then you feel it, you respond, yes, it's always a recognition, it's never somebody telling you something new, you can read other books, you get lots of new facts that you had never heard of and say, wow, that's interesting, yeah, it may be interesting, but it won't transform you, only things that you recognize as true actually then bring out that level in you, that dimension in you, and that's the power of a spiritual book, and I didn't realize how many humans actually were ready for that, it's only when they start writing to me, at that time people were still writing letters, writing to me and saying, I bought five copies for my four friends or relatives, and then somebody else said, I bought three copies, and there was people, so wow, it's amazing that so many people seem to be ready for it, so that's good, it's happening, it's a relatively simple process, and- Theoretically. Yes, there is still, of course, the old consciousness still has its gravitational pull upon people, but everyone who is here or wherever you are listening to this, seeing this is part of the transformation and contributes to the awakening, so it is a very significant thing that as you awaken, and most people who join us here or here in this room or at home are already undergoing the awakening process, in a few people it comes very suddenly, but that's rare, in most, it's a gradual awakening, and then it doesn't go like that, it goes more in a spiral, you go, this presence arises, and then you fall back, and then again it's, and so it gradually goes, it grows slowly with setbacks.

[Speaker 5] (6:38:01 - 6:38:03)
Why do you think it happened like that for you?

[Speaker 1] (6:38:04 - 6:39:46)
Well, for some reason, it happens for a few people like that, but it seems to be rare, I cannot tell you why that is, there was, it's better, it's good not to look for an event, I almost regret telling people how it happened to me later, because it makes people to look for an event, and in a way what happened, I describe it as something happening, it's not real, it's more of a non-event than an event, because it's a, it's a, you kind of disappear in that, the form, the form self, the form identity kind of dissolves, so it's more of a non-event than an event, it's better not to look for it, it's not an, for most people, it may come as an occasional glimpses, you have the famous Satori in Zen, Satori is a flash of enlightenment, when you suddenly go, wow, yeah, but that doesn't necessarily last, if you have a Satori, it doesn't mean that the next day you're still conscious, but it's a nice thing when it happens, it's a flash of realization, so the Zen master tries to sometimes bring about in you the flash, and that's good, but it's not, of course, it's not the permanent state, that comes gradually, it's an adventure in consciousness, and we can enjoy it while it happens.

[Speaker 7] (6:39:50 - 6:39:52)
Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (6:39:58 - 6:41:36)
Oh, let's ring the bell. You wanted to go on? Yeah, well, it's in, it goes on in you now.

Oh, it's now. It's already now?

[Speaker 6] (6:42:07 - 6:42:08)
Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (6:42:37 - 6:42:51)
Hello Eckhart, my question is not about your breakfast, but a little bit personal, it's about something that I read about you, that at one point in your life, you picked up the name Eckhart for yourself.

[Speaker 6] (6:42:52 - 6:42:53)
Yes.

[Speaker 3] (6:42:53 - 6:43:17)
So you were talking about today, in your books, about form identity, about pain body, about the surface self accumulating the stories of the past, and I just want to know, what was the motivation, or the urge behind that choice, that urge?

[Speaker 6] (6:43:17 - 6:43:18)
Right.

[Speaker 3] (6:43:19 - 6:43:26)
And were there any impacts on your wellbeing, afterwards, of making that change?

[Speaker 1] (6:43:26 - 6:53:15)
Right. Well, one has to come with some kind of arrangement, with a world of form, the world of labels, and so on. Sometimes it's convenient, when somebody asks you, what's your name?

Before I answer your question, I'll get there in a minute. Somebody asks you, what is your name? And then it is more practical, and avoids a lot of complication to say, my name is so-and-so.

It doesn't mean that you identify with that particular sound, but it works better than to say, I have no name and no form. No, that'll throw them. And it'll probably be the end of the conversation.

So it helps to have a name, in normal life. But there's another thing, these are forms, thought forms. And your name, of course, is something connected with your form identity.

And as you grow up, and go through life, you have all kinds of experiences. And your name then kind of absorbs, one could say, the flavor of all those experiences that you have. They become part of what the name absorbs.

So a name can become heavy after years and years, especially of suffering. Then the name reflects the suffering of your whole past. There's a reason why, in many or most spiritual traditions, when you enter the formal spiritual path, whether it's in Christianity, or in Hinduism, Buddhism, you adopt a different name.

And the idea behind it is, that you let go of your past completely, because the name kind of symbolizes your entire past. And sometimes even carries an energetic charge to it, that comes from the past. All the things that cling to that name.

So the idea in many spiritual traditions is, as you embark on the spiritual path, you adopt a spiritual name, which you then regard as more real, or it's not ultimately real, because it's just another sound, but more real than your old birth name. And definitely it's something that does not have this weight of past to it. But the danger with that, of course, is the moment you adopt a spiritual name, then everybody will know that it's a spiritual name.

And so very quickly, there could be an egoic identification with you as having a spiritual name, which immediately makes you superior to all these other people who have not yet chosen the spiritual path, and are still using their birth names, all these unawakened people. But I now have a spiritual name, because I'm spiritual. And so the ego, again, always comes in through the back door.

In my case, there has been a, I felt as the awakening happened, the shift in consciousness, there was a certain or considerable degree of discontinuity with my past. And I felt that my past, my childhood was predominantly unhappy with a few happy moments, of course, but predominantly unhappy caused by parents' unconsciousness. They were not bad parents.

They did their best. I never experienced any kind of physical punishment. And yet there was continuous drama in my parents' home.

I was the only child. My pain body grew through that. It was nightmare living there.

And I sometimes felt, how did I get here? This is so crazy. So there was a lot of suffering, a lot of ideas of suicide.

My first idea of suicide came at the age of about eight. And I was very happy when scaffolding, they built the house where we lived. They painted the exterior of the house and they were scaffolding up to the third or fourth floor, and a ladder going up.

And I said, oh, as long as it's there, I can always climb up and jump down. That's great. So I'm lucky that scaffolding is there.

I can always end it. I'm laughing now because it's gone. It's kind of dissolved completely.

I wasn't laughing then. And then there was already a sense of dissociation from my name and my entire personal past, so that I could remember it. And then the two events that led to it were two synchronistic events.

One is a dream I had in which I walked up the stairs into some circular tower. And in that circular tower, there was a table and on the table, there were some books. They had the name Eckhart on them.

And some, I can't remember what visual, what picture was there. And they had the name Eckhart. And I knew I had written those books, but at that time, my name was not Eckhart.

So that was a strange thing that I saw these books. I had written them, but the name was Eckhart. So I woke up the next morning.

That's how strange. And a few days later, I was walking down the high street, the town I was living in. I mentioned it yesterday.

It was a town that attracts all kinds of spiritual as well as weird people. So I felt quite at home there. It was Glastonbury in Somerset, England.

And I was walking down the high street. Of course, if you live there for a few years, you know almost everybody. And almost everybody is either a channeler or a psychic or a clairvoyant or a reincarnation of King Arthur.

That's all. At any given time, there are several reincarnations of King Arthur living in Glastonbury. And so I ran into this person and he was a psychic, but he wasn't doing any psychic work at that moment.

But he said, hi, Eckhart. I said, what? Oh, he said, oh, I'm sorry.

I don't know why that came. I came into my head that name. And that was that.

That was a synchronistic thing that happened a few days after the dream. And I was ready to let go of the past and to let go of the old name. And that seemed to be a sign to me that it is time for that.

And only later did I... I knew, I was aware at that time already of the medieval mystic, Meister Eckhart. If you have not read Meister Eckhart, I highly recommend the wonderful, deep teachings.

And I often say, if you really want to... Of course, Meister Eckhart was a monk in the Christian tradition in medieval times. But I often say, if you really want to understand Buddhism, Meister Eckhart, of course, had never heard of Buddhism.

If you really want to understand Buddhism, read Meister Eckhart, because he really shows you the essence of Buddhism. And he's very... In Christianity, he's a very strange figure.

He was lucky that he was not burnt or anything. So he survived until he passed away. And only later did I realize interesting things that Eck is Sanskrit for one.

And heart is lovely too. So that became then the... It's still just a name.

It's not... At some point that dissolves and it's fine. It's something that is like a piece of clothes that you wear until you don't wear it anymore.

So it's fine. And basically that's how it happened. Are you considering changing your name or have you done it already?

I am considering. Right. Are you waiting for some kind of sign?

Not really. No, okay.

[Speaker 3] (6:53:15 - 6:53:23)
I just wanted... I read it in your biography and I was just wondering your personal perspective.

[Speaker 1] (6:53:23 - 6:53:52)
And thank you very much for sharing it. Oh, you're welcome. So I was given a kind of sign that's a synchronistic thing.

Often it's very interesting when synchronistic events like that happen. So I wish you well. Thank you.

And maybe at some future retreat or if there are any future... Well, there are no future retreats, but another retreat. Let me know if you have adopted a new name.

[Speaker 8] (6:53:52 - 6:53:52)
Okay.

[Speaker 1] (6:53:53 - 6:54:03)
But of course, realizing the essence of who you are is Anami, nameless, no name.

[Speaker 6] (6:54:04 - 6:54:05)
Thanks.

[Speaker 1] (6:54:25 - 7:52:39)
That is the reason why suffering has a purpose in this world. Suffering is here, including even those forms of suffering that are entirely generated by the mind. And that too is there to ultimately awaken you.

So you have the suffering that is generated through this misuse of the mind, unconscious thinking, and you have suffering that comes through encountering disaster in one form or another in your life. And that's not to be denied. And in the course of this weekend, we will explore how that also can become an opening into transcendence.

And it often is, you will hear stories of people who were confronted with the most extreme forms of suffering and were able to go beyond it, not by denying it, but by transcending. There's a huge difference between denial and transcendence. We'll be looking at that.

So there's the person who lives confronted with problems and with challenges. And there is the potential of discovering, and sometimes through encountering extreme forms of disaster, but not always, not necessarily, but there's a potential of discovering within yourself a dimension of depth that transcends who you are as a person. And in this moment, when the thinking mind stops for a moment and is replaced with an aware presence, then the transcendent dimension has emerged in you.

And the invitation to you is right here and now, to see if you can invite that dimension into your life. And it is almost as if you disappeared temporarily, what you before you called I, because when you're not thinking and just are aware, then the person has temporarily subsided and an aware presence has arisen. And that's the discovery of the transcendent you, or as I call it sometimes, the deep I.

And for some people it comes, and there are many, many accounts throughout history, it comes through encountering extreme forms of suffering. I know that Steve Taylor will probably address it. He's done a lot of research, and we have one speaker, I don't want to say too much, who encountered awakening through very extreme form of suffering.

And that is the potential for awakening that is hiding beyond the seemingly most dreadful thing that could happen to you. And it's all expressed symbolically, whether or not you relate to it as whether you're a Christian or you're not a Christian, you simply understand there's something there that the symbol of the cross points to. This is something I don't think it's fully understood by most churches or conventional Christians, that what the symbol of the cross points to, and a man who is dying on the cross, to me that is the archetype of human and what is possible.

The cross is a torture instrument. It's an expression of extreme suffering. So you have this human being on a torture instrument.

Now, then something happens. There is this human being dies, this in a state of surrender, not my will, but thy will be done. The human being dies in a state of surrender and the very torture instrument is a symbol for the divine.

The cross is a sacred symbol, but the cross is also a torture instrument. The torture instrument, the greatest obstacle to fulfillment, the greatest obstacle to life, it seems, is also potentially the opening into the transcendent dimension. And I believe this to me is the deep symbolism of the cross.

And traditionally, the humans, many humans who encountered awakening, encountered it through extreme suffering. And that drove them to a point of surrender. That drove them, because they couldn't stand the pain anymore, that drove them to the state of acceptance of what is.

And then suddenly the vertical dimension opened up. That's also, you could say the cross also points to the two dimensions of what is. The horizontal dimension and the vertical dimension.

So as awareness arises or presence, then it begins to shine through the person. The person no longer has, does no longer have the density that completely obscures the awareness, the consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness underneath. And it's often the case that the density is destroyed by a suffering.

And that is the reason why suffering has a purpose in this world. Suffering is here, including even those forms of suffering that are entirely generated by the mind, that too is there to ultimately awaken you. So you suffer and the suffering, and all of you have been through different forms of suffering, some very deep, some just a succession of many, many minor frustrations and things going wrong.

So you somehow lost confidence in, you lost belief that this world would ultimately be able to satisfy you or make you happy. That's not it. And perhaps you became frustrated with yourself.

That's possible too. So the suffering is a potential awakener. It has a purpose and it is there to destroy you ultimately, or at least to crack, to create a crack in the egoic shell.

And then something emerges through the crack. Some people in this lifetime continue to have an ego, but it's no longer totally, it's no longer a impenetrable shell. Through suffering, it has received cracks here and there.

There's a, is it Leonard Cohen? I think he has a song or poem. There is a crack, a crack in everything.

That's how the light gets in or gets out, I would say. So suffering destroys the false self, the identification, complete identification with your form identity. So what I call presence, there are other words for it, such as awareness is a state of consciousness that transcends thinking.

You may have noticed that most of the time you have a voice in your head that never stops speaking. And what I call the voice in the head are your habitual thought processes. For many people, the voice in the head, which is the self-talk is not, is predominantly unpleasant because for many people, the self-talk tends to be to a large extent negative.

In fact, there are millions of people in this world who are tortured by their own minds, by the self-talk in the head, which of course is the conditioning of their minds. But they don't even know that because they're so identified with the voice in the head that there's no space beyond from where they can realize that there is a voice in the head because when they're identified with the voice in the head, they are the voice in the head. Presence is the arising of a dimension of consciousness from where you can become aware that there is the voice in the head.

That awareness is above thinking. It's a space of consciousness where you can be the observer of your own mind, the awareness behind the thought processes. And for human beings to discover that dimension within themselves is extraordinarily important.

It is, in fact, as I see it, the next step in the evolution of humanity to discover that unconditioned dimension of consciousness within themselves. And that's an amazing shift. All the ancient spiritual teachers have already pointed to the possibility from the Buddha to Jesus and so on.

But until now, only very few people have been able to actually experience that state of consciousness and embody that state of consciousness. One could say that until now or until fairly recently, it's been a luxury for human beings to attain that new consciousness. But the world situation that we are at now is so critical.

We're faced by so many problems collectively that the transformation of human consciousness, which is what the arising of presence is, is no longer a luxury. It's a necessity for the survival of humanity. The problems that we are facing, most of the problems, if not all the problems we are facing as a species, are actually generated by our own minds.

So all the problems are not problems of natural disaster or anything except disasters that were created by humans. So there is a strong element of, one could almost say, insanity or dysfunction in what I call the old consciousness, the normal human consciousness. It has produced an enormous amount of suffering quite unnecessarily.

And already the ancient teachers have pointed to that. The Buddha said the human condition is one of suffering. And Jesus said, what we need is to find the kingdom of heaven within.

We need salvation. And only now are many, many humans on the planet, still a minority, but far more than ever before, are ready to enter that new state of consciousness and make presence part of their lives so that there is a shift, for most people, a gradual shift, for some, a few people, a radical sudden shift from the state of consciousness of being identified with the continuous stream of thinking, a lot of it dysfunctional, as I said, the shift from that to discovering the possibility and the reality of another dimension of consciousness within you that is the space of presence or awareness. And from there, you can observe your own thought processes and you're no longer trapped, completely identified in the conditioned mind.

That's about the most important thing in your life, to undergo that shift. And it's not extraordinarily difficult. It's not, unfortunately, it's not yet knowledge, general knowledge in the mainstream culture that such a thing is even possible.

So the arising of presence is something that needs to happen now. Humans are ready for it. You are ready for it.

And as this gradually, this new state of consciousness arises in you, you will begin to notice changes in the way in which you react to events in your life, changes in the way in which you relate to other people. And they're all changes for the better. You will find, for example, that situations that before caused you a considerable amount of pain or suffering no longer have the power to cause you that pain or suffering.

You'll also discover the amazing truth. You will discover it experientially within yourself. You can verify what I'm saying now by becoming aware of situations in your life and observe how, when you become unhappy in situations, unhappy in whatever form, unhappiness takes on many forms, whether even irritation is a small form of unhappiness, irritation, anger, resentment, many, many kinds of unhappiness, self-pity, and or...

And you become aware that the unhappiness in your life, to a large extent, is actually due to the thought processes in your mind rather than the actual situation. So you feel unhappy because not in majority of cases, not about the situation you find yourself in, but about what your mind is telling you about the situation. I often give the example of being in a lineup, either at the airport or in a supermarket, and it's not moving, and there's some kind of delay because people are not...

They are too slow, not efficient enough. And easily people get irritated, angry, upset in situations like that. And this is just a minor example.

And they believe that they are being upset because of the situation. However, if they looked more closely into the origin of unhappiness, they would find that they're not unhappy because they're standing there in line. They're unhappy because their mind is saying that it is a bad situation to be standing there in line.

It says all kinds of things. The voice in the head comments. If you could be aware of this, if you were present in that situation, you would become aware of what your mind is saying.

And if you were present in that situation and many, many other situations, even so-called serious situations, if you were really present in that situation, you would see that the unhappiness that you experience actually arises in your mind is not ultimately caused by the situation you find yourself in. And when you discover that, the possibility of freedom comes in, the possibility of choice, because now you have the choice. Do I want to continue thinking these thoughts and feeling unhappy, or would I rather be free of that unhappiness in this situation?

And then presence arises more strongly and suddenly you accept this moment as it is because there's nothing much you can do. And there's a complete shift in the way in which you experience that moment. You'll be free of the burden of unhappiness.

This is just one small example of how presence can actually transform your life. And of course, talking about relationships, when you no longer judge people continuously, through the conditioned mind, you experience many changes in the way in which you relate to other human beings. So I would suggest to you that the most important thing that can happen to you in this lifetime is to undergo this shift in your life so that you're no longer at the mercy of the conditioning of your mind, which has been conditioned through your whole upbringing, your childhood, many, many influences.

And so instead of being at the mercy of the conditioning of your mind, and there's no freedom in that, suddenly the possibility arises of transcending the conditioning of your mind and actually becoming free. And that's why the term liberation is sometimes used in various spiritual traditions. Becoming free, becoming liberated.

Liberated from what? Liberated ultimately from your own mind. And then you're able to use your mind and your thinking ability in a much more effective way.

What changes is that you are no longer used by your mind, but you are using your mind. And that's a vast difference. When you're identified with that continuous stream of thinking that ultimately you are not thinking, the thinking happens to you.

You don't even know it. You identify with it and you think it's you thinking, but it's just the conditioned mind thinking in you and you give it a sense of self. But there is really no self in it as the Buddha already pointed out a long time ago.

So there's a shift from being self-identified with a stream of thinking then discovering that there is a stream of thinking in you, discovering that very often it interprets reality in a certain way that actually produces suffering for yourself and others. And then discovering that you can be free of it. And coming back to the example I just gave just now, a simple situation, you're standing in line at the airport or the supermarket, getting very upset and you discover you can actually be free of unhappiness in that moment by not adding a dysfunctional mental commentary to the situation.

And suddenly the situation is the way it is and you actually feel quite good. So, and this is a small example, but presence affects all areas of your life as you will discover. So if you get a sense of what I'm talking about and it sounds, oh yes, that's interesting, that means you're probably ready for this shift in consciousness.

If, however, you have not the slightest idea of what I'm talking about and it sounds like a load of nonsense, that probably means you're not quite ready yet and I'm not, won't try to convince you that you should be ready. And it also means that you just need a little bit more suffering before you're ready. So we will meet again in a few years time.

Thank you. But this is almost an analogy for the rest of your life too. If things don't get difficult, then there is no growth in consciousness.

So to become aware of presence is not really it. You become aware of yourself as presence. That's a bit better.

Or perhaps even better, presence or consciousness becomes aware of itself. That's kind of the closest you can get if you want to get it as far as language is concerned. So it is important to experience, to awareness, not in relation to, let's forget for a moment our sense perceptions because we talk about that also, how to perceive without conceptualization.

Unless conceptualization is needed, then it's fine and you bring it in and so on. But now awareness, just awareness, which is in essence, this is the essence of meditation. The essence of meditation is not something that you do because it's misleading to think of meditation as a doing, because any kind of doing requires time.

You can't do without time. It implies that there's something, you're moving towards something. So even the underlying idea when you meditate, that you're doing meditation can be an obstacle to true meditation.

So meditation is not a doing because meditation is a realization of being. So you have these two dimensions, the doing dimension, which is to do with the world of form and the transcendent dimension, which is the timeless being itself, the formless, which is consciousness. We want to give it a label.

And you embody both. One could say there's two of you almost. This is not the ultimate truth, but it's a way of putting it.

There's two of you. There is the personal being, the person, the personal self, the human, the human you, and you know that very well. The human you is not easy, doesn't have an easy life.

No human has an easy life. And if you, and maybe one or two of you who were born into very privileged circumstances, and you might say, oh, that's an easy, I'd like to have a life like that, to have a, never need to worry about making enough money, or it's all there already provided. There's a trust fund.

You're born with a baby, you have a trust fund baby. Then for the rest of your life, you have to worry about that. Okay, I love that.

And then everything you want is immediately given to you in your childhood. And then you go on. So it seems an easy life.

And this very easy life would turn out to be your greatest obstacle and create the greatest amount of suffering for you, because you will develop into a very superficial, egoic creature that makes life difficult for yourself and others. And then you suffer more and more. So you can't escape it.

You can't escape the challenges of life, no matter how you imagine it to be. The human is here in order to be challenged. The human is not here in order to find ultimate happiness, ultimate satisfaction or fulfillment on the level of the human.

The level of the human is not designed for that. And the world doesn't know that yet, because humans are looking for solutions, the real solutions on the horizontal level of the human dimension. And it's not there.

You get challenged. And whatever situation you go into, you will find the element of dukkha, the word mentioned last night, unsatisfactoriness, suffering, unhappiness, misery will creep up, creep into whatever you do somehow, sooner or later. If it hasn't crept in yet, just wait a little and you'll find, even if you meet the most wonderful person and then you get married or you don't or whatever, but you start living together and sooner or later, you'll discover this most wonderful person that you thought is going to make you happy, also makes you unhappy, because you hadn't seen the full person yet.

There was something hidden that only reveals itself when you start living together. As long as you only go to have dates, it's fine. You can gaze into each other's eyes and it's wonderful.

So you can't escape it on the human level. You get challenged and that's fine. You need the challenge and you need to challenge yourself.

If you want to create something, if you want to bring about some change in this world, you want to make your life, your so-called life better, you're looking to achieve this or to learn this or to acquire this, that's part of being human. We don't deny that. And if you don't want to achieve anything, let's say you have no ambition whatsoever, you say, oh, it's all pointless because you don't want to challenge yourself, then life will challenge you even more.

If you challenging yourself would be even to engage in physical activity and jogging. You're challenging yourself or you're lifting weights or you're challenging the body on a physical level. The only way you can make the body stronger, the physical body is by making, let's put it like this, it's a strange way of putting it, but it's true.

You have to make life difficult for your body. Otherwise it doesn't get stronger. Well, to lift a weight is, I mean, if you ask the body, would you rather have a good, just relax or lift this weight?

Oh no, I just want to relax. I don't want to make my life more difficult than it needs to be. So I just, okay, you don't get stronger without, but when you make life difficult for the body, then more energy is demanded and more energy comes flowing in.

Energy doesn't come until you demand it. There's a request or a demand for energy because there's a gap between what you want and what, at the moment, the body doesn't have enough energy and suddenly it comes. Then you reach a point when an influx of energy starts, then it's no longer perceived that you make life difficult for your body once the energy starts flowing.

The body enjoys this flow of energy, but before the energy starts flowing, life was difficult for the body. And so you always, you meet always the threshold of life gets difficult for the body and then energy comes in and then suddenly not even perceived as difficult anymore. And that you may experience it every day when you start exercising.

And this is, but this is almost an analogy for the rest of your life too. If things don't get difficult, then there is no growth in consciousness. We talked about the influx of energy for the physical body, but energy can manifest in many frequencies and ultimately it is consciousness.

And so you cannot become a more conscious human being unless you experience the challenges of life. And it's good to create, want to create this or that. So you are choosing to some extent, you can choose the challenges that you want to experience.

Whenever you want to bring about something new in this world, it's a challenge, but you created it. You say, you want to create this. Hopefully it comes from a deeper level, not the ego that says, I need, I need this.

Otherwise I won't be happy and fulfilled. I won't be completely myself. I need to achieve this in order to become happy and recognized and make it, I want to make it.

Weird expression, make what? Myself, I want to make myself. And if you don't challenge yourself, life will challenge you and you will encounter challenges where you certainly didn't want that.

So you can't escape. It's good to challenge yourself in a sane way, not in an insane way. And so one part of the challenges of life is the challenges that you yourself create and that can be divided into conscious creation.

You want to manifest something new, whatever it is that you want to in your career or something you want to build up. And then there are challenges that you create unconsciously through the conditioned mind. And that's a huge amount of suffering for humans.

They create their own challenges, but they perceive it as if the challenges were coming at them from the outside. Not knowing that a huge amount of problems, difficulties, challenges, whatever you want to call it, are created by their unconsciousness in relation to other people, in relation to situations. The reactivity that amplifies every little problem that comes from the outside through other human beings or situations.

The reactivity, the unconscious reactivity of the ego amplifies the problem and makes a drama out of relatively little. It doesn't have, it didn't need to become a drama, but it becomes a drama through reactivity. These are challenges that humans create unconsciously for themselves.

And it's a great moment of awakening when you realize that many of your difficulties, you were a significant contributing factor. Let's put it like that. In the difficulties that you seem to encounter in situations and through other people and so on.

And you discover your own reactivity example. That's a huge discovery. And then there are other types of challenges that come at you seemingly out of nowhere.

It could be that an earthquake could happen here in a minute. Or let's not manifest it. And we don't know, it comes out of nowhere.

Who knows? Or aliens suddenly land. So challenges, some challenges seem to come out of nowhere, but you can't, there are so many different types of difficulties or challenges that you encounter, but you cannot escape the difficulties and the challenges.

And because it is not only on the human level, animals encounter their own challenges. Even plants and trees encounter their own challenges. Every life form encounters obstacles, opposition.

Every life form experiences the fragility of life that it's not, it's very, life is fleeting and uncertain. And that is how gradually consciousness evolved because consciousness needs to come in as a response to the challenges of life. And that is, once we realize that life is meant to be challenging or difficult, once you realize that, then a huge, you become free of the huge illusion that there's something wrong when your life becomes difficult.

It's because these are all necessary and you need to, you need that. That's the good news or bad news. The world isn't here to make you happy.

This is how I put it. The world is not here to make you, this is the human level of this. It's not here to make you happy.

It can't do that, no matter how hard you try. It's here to make you conscious by challenging you. By making your life difficult.

And of course, as I said, that part of, great part of it may be your own unconsciousness, but that's how you, if you make your own life difficult through your unconsciousness, you begin to suffer more and more and more. And you don't even, for a long time, you don't know that you're creating your own suffering. It's always like, it's them, it's there, it's there.

The most unconscious people are continuously projecting that all causes of their misery and unhappiness are outside. It's all outside. When you listen to a very unconscious person, you listen to the themes that run through them, their narrative are blaming, complaining.

It's always, it's them, him, her, them. All the situations, all the places. Emotions do not make their home in you.

You could have, let's see, I don't remember the last time I was angry. I'll have to think. It's not that when you awaken that you no longer experience emotions.

Certain emotions will still arise, but less than in the unawakened state. But certain emotions, such as when there's the death of a loved one, you will feel an emotion, you will weep, and you will experience that emotion. The Zen master who experienced probably the emotion that he experienced, that he detected through becoming aware of his, the palm of his hands becoming moist, was probably anxiety.

But these are different things, different causal factors for these emotions. The Zen master was justified in saying that I'm not, I'm still, this shows me that I'm still in the conceptual mind and I'm not free of role-playing ultimately, because the person who came to him had a particular social role and he proved that to be a reality. On the whole though, emotions are to be accepted and recognized as emotions.

Every emotion that arises in you is something that you are aware of. And then you say, well, there it is. And the strange thing is, the more you live in acceptance of the present moment, the less will you experience negative emotions, because most negative emotions arise through non-acceptance of the is-ness of things, of the present moment.

Some emotions may still be there, but rarely would you experience negative emotions. You may still, but they will be short-lived. Emotions do not make their home in you.

You could have, let's see, I don't remember the last time I was angry. I'll have to think. I can't remember.

It can't have been very long, but it can happen. But it's short-lived because the mind does not keep it alive. The emotion is there and an emotion arises.

It's certainly an emotion of deep sadness that arose when my parents died. Within the space of five months, they both died in the same year, although they lived in different countries. And so I went to the funeral of my mother in the summer.

And in the fall, suddenly my dad died, and I went to the funeral of my dad. And then I was able to experience this, the sadness. And I cried a few times.

I sat with my mother's body, and I sat with my dad's body. And it was very clear that there was an emotion of pain, there was emotional pain. And it was also clear that there was a deep peace behind the pain.

And this is what I described yesterday or whenever it was as the transcendent dimension, like the hint of a smile of the Buddha being in the background. That is, and that comes through acceptance, through acceptance that arises more quickly and more strongly. When you accept something, there's still the emotion on the surface, but, and you accept the emotion, and then there's a peace underneath it.

It's two things that when I talk about them, they almost seem incompatible, but they are totally compatible. Now, without the transcendent dimension, it's a devastating experience. And without awareness, there are people who carry the sadness of the mourning of when somebody close to them dies.

There are people who carry that for, not for a few months, they can carry it for years. Because in the lack of awareness, it gets continuously revived. The emotion is fed again and again by mind activity.

And then you think all those memories and all that's gone, all the times we spent together, three years after they die, you're still weeping at night because you remember all those times and it's all gone, it's all dissolved. And you're continuously devastated. That becomes dysfunctional.

And that arises because there is not enough awareness in you. So the emotion makes its home in you and starts to, it kind of says, oh, I like to be here, actually becomes incorporated into your pain body. And then you continuously suffer the same emotion, which in an aware person, the emotion has a certain lifespan, the sadness, and then it becomes transmuted.

And then it becomes, I still, sometimes I look at photos, my mom, my dad, I have a, my mother, when she died, I had to, within a space of a couple of days, I had to get rid of all her belongings because she lived in Europe. I could only spend a few days there. So I just rescued a few small items that I could take back home.

One is a rug and one is a little clock that she had had for 30 years. And so it's a little clock in a glass dome and it's electric, but it has this revolving thing that goes. And I had that when I visited my mom once a year, I would hear that, the room where I slept at my mom's place, I could hear the ticking of that clock around Christmas time.

And I was there, I heard this tick, tick, tick. And now I have this clock at home and it's still working. And I, this clock to me, I, is the memory of my mother.

When I look at it and I listen to the ticking noise, it's the memory of my mother. It is also a symbol of impermanence of all life forms. And once you accept the impermanence of all life forms, that brings about a deepening in you because you see how fleeting all this is.

And then suddenly you become deeper. And also this little clock, it goes tick, tick, tick. That symbolizes to me, there's the ticking is time, but in between the ticking, there is silence.

And that is the timeless dimension. So I, this clock is more than a clock to me. But when I look at this clock, I no longer experience any painful emotion.

That is gone. I don't experience a painful emotion when I look at pictures of my mom or dad. I only experience a deep peace and a very strong awareness of the fleetingness of all life forms.

And that's a beautiful, very deep and peaceful thing. So in the presence of awareness, certain emotions are natural and are actually fine, but they have a relatively short lifespan. They are not, they don't make their home in you.

Similar is something, somebody makes you angry. Somebody offends you. Somebody does something to you or take something away from you.

You may feel an angry reaction. And that angry reaction has a lifespan. If there's awareness, suddenly you're aware that you're angry, but there it is, you're angry.

And you might even shout something in your anger and then you're aware, okay, there's the anger. And then you become aware of the anger directly, which means it cannot make its home in you. And then it becomes transmuted.

It's not as quick as the duck that I describe in one of my books. When the duck gets into a fight with another duck, the fight doesn't last long and the energy builds up. And every duck, after they separate, they stop fighting, gets up on the water a bit and flaps their wings vigorously, the duck.

And then after that, the duck becomes completely peaceful again. So this, humans are not quite that quick, even aware humans. But metaphorically speaking, that's through awareness, you're able to, the emotion is released and then it leaves you.

So certain emotions have their place and that's fine. But there are many, many emotions that are produced, negative emotions that are produced by mental dysfunction, such as you wake up in the middle of the night and there's enormous anxiety. And you start thinking about all the things that are going to go wrong.

Or you have, you start thinking about the past and you have terrible regret and you have resentment and you have sadness and you're thinking and thinking and you feel more and more the emotion that corresponds to your thinking. And every night it happens. That is not the kind of emotion that is natural to you.

It's not the kind of emotion you need to recognize. Where does this come from? It's produced by my thoughts.

I am producing this emotion every night when I can't sleep. And even during the daytime, I am producing this emotion. And then if there's enough awareness in the moment of thinking those anxious thoughts, you suddenly know what you're doing.

You suddenly realize what you're doing. And then you say, okay, you suddenly remember, oh, Eckhart talked about the inner body. What happens if I stop thinking these thoughts that are totally useless and completely unnecessary and harmful actually?

Why do I not instead choose to place my awareness in the inner body right now instead of thinking? So there's enough awareness. Then you no longer produce all those emotions that are part of dysfunctional misuse of the mind or rather being used by your mind.

So all those emotions, as you become aware, you don't produce them anymore. Certain emotions remain, but their lifespan is short and they are seen for what they are. And that's fine.

So do not believe that you need to arrive at a state where you no longer experience any emotion whatsoever. So some emotions go with the human form. They're part of the human form.

There's a story, I believe I quoted it in one of the books. One of the ancient Greek philosophers, he belonged to the school of Stoicism, which is a wonderful philosophy, but Marcus Aurelius' book, Meditations is one of my favorite books written 2,000 years ago, if you haven't read it. Meditations by Marcus Aurelius, the Roman emperor, is a beautiful, beautiful book.

But that's the school of Stoicism. There was one Stoic philosopher, I can't remember his name. People came to him and said, your son has just died in an accident.

They were, my God, your son has died in an accident. He fell off the horse. And the Stoic philosopher said, I knew he was not immortal.

Now, the question is, we cannot judge what he said because we do not know what, out of what state of consciousness these words arose. Perhaps there was an emotion, but he didn't express it. Perhaps he had already repressed all emotions, it's possible.

I like to believe that he was aware and the emotion was in him, but he didn't express it. And the statement was a statement that came from a deeper consciousness, which is very true because death can happen to any of us at any moment. And I knew he was, and I don't know in what way he said it, but did he say it in a facile way?

Oh, I knew he was, no. Or did he say it, I knew he was not immortal. So you could, perhaps there was an emotion, but there was also a deep awareness there at the same time.

I love the Stoics, so I like to believe that there was an awareness at the same time. Oh, thank you.

[Speaker 6] (7:52:39 - 7:52:39)
Thank you, Jacob.

[Speaker 1] (7:53:01 - 8:08:05)
Here's my wife. And she's better looking than yours. Now you begin to lose the present moment internally when the place you want to get to, whatever that may be, whether it's tomorrow or in five years time, or even a few, five minutes from now, you lose the present moment and your state of mind becomes somewhat or very dysfunctional when whatever goal you have or destination you have in the future occupies more of your attention than the present moment. So the place you want to get to or achieve one day when I'll become a great this or that, perhaps you have a great idea of, maybe let's say you want to become a rock star.

I want to be a rock star. Okay. Well, hopefully you enjoy music and have not just a mental image of who you want to be as somebody important, but you don't enjoy the several years that you need to get there.

If you don't enjoy the journey, which is always now the step you're taking at this moment, if there's a lack of enjoyment, then you have lost the present moment and the place you want to get to has assumed an importance that becomes dysfunctional. So this is already mentioned in ancient scriptures as a teaching, for example, in the ancient Bhagavad Gita, wonderful if you haven't read it yet, wonderful ancient Indian scripture. It talks of not being too attached to what it calls the fruit of your action, which is the outcome, which is you project yourself one day, I'm going to be happy.

That's the fruit. One day when I get, when people realize that I'm a fantastic human being and I get all the recognition from people, then I'll be fine. When I have those possessions that I need, I won't be happy until I have a private jet.

It doesn't have to be big, just a little one. I won't be happy until I, then I feel I'm fully myself. I cannot be fully myself unless I have a car that's better than most people's cars.

And so you strive towards that. And in the meantime, you're not happy because you're striving towards a place that promises some form of fulfillment, whether you call it happiness or having arrived or this weird expression in the English language, making it, making what? I want to make it.

And then you have weird ideas in your mind. An enormous amount of fear arises because you have certain thoughts, especially at three o'clock in the morning, you wake up and the mind starts up and a weird word comes. I don't want to be a loser, a loser.

Oh my God. And then fear, maybe I will be a loser. Maybe I'm not going to get this car and maybe I'm not going to become the greatest this or that.

Or maybe I'm not going to find the person who's going to make me happy. Well, you won't. There is no human being on the planet that can make you happy unless you find the source of happiness within yourself, in which case you'll be quite happy with somebody.

It's likely, but that person will not cause you the happiness except while you are going through the honeymoon period. And that is human beings. They look to, you look to human beings, some future, I need to meet my soulmate.

I need to meet my, or whatever it is, or it's a, maybe it's a trophy wife. It can show off, here's my wife. And she's better looking than yours.

Because she wouldn't be with a loser, would she? So, and then of course, after a little while, the trophy wife won't satisfy you. And then you have to look somewhere else.

In fact, she might make you unhappy. And or you make her unhappy, you make each other unhappy. So this is very common.

Many of you may have experienced as far as looking to a human being to make you happy. You may already have experienced that that didn't work because the very human being that you chose to make you happy, only two or three years later, or four, five, made you unhappy. The very same person whose purpose it was to make you happy and you signed a contract.

So it was all fine. The contract was signed. And then something happened that wasn't supposed to happen.

The person who's supposed to make you happy suddenly starts making you unhappy. And you may not realize that you are making him or her unhappy too. Self-knowledge is more difficult than knowing somebody else.

So always looking to some future moment. And then you realize on a practical level, future works. But on a deeper level of finding a true satisfaction in life, you have to look somewhere else.

All these things are good. Achieving things is good. Even relationships, of course, if they're conscious, then all the better.

I'm not saying stop looking for somebody to marry. That's fine. But don't look for somebody to make you happy.

They're always, I don't look at these things anymore. But in the past, when people put ads, I sometimes enjoyed reading ads. And when they had newspaper ads for finding relationships or marriage ads, it was always amusing what people were looking for.

Nowadays, of course, it's all on your phone. It's called Tinder. And the hand movement associated with it, apparently, I've never actually looked at Tinder, but I know that the hand movement associated with it goes like this.

And each wife represents a human being. Well, that's weird. Very weird.

So when I saw, I enjoyed reading the newspaper ads, and sometimes it said, looking for woman or man to make me happy. Oh dear, I thought. So the future then, what is the future that never appears, that can completely occupy our attention?

To such an extent that we lose, actually, the most important thing in life. And that is to be at home with yourself in the present moment, to feel where you are, to feel a kind of, this may sound a little strange, to feel a connectedness with being, the connectedness with being. So you're rooted in something deep, abiding.

There's a deep peace, not a dead kind of peace, but an alive peace to be rooted within yourself, to be yourself here and now in this moment. Losing that or never discovering it, never realizing even the possibility of this existing in your life, then if you don't find the true meaning of present moment of the now, which is very deep, as we will see, we will see. It's very deep.

Then you live flitting around the surface of life. There's always some future moment to either be afraid of or be attracted to. The future is a two-edged sword, as you might discover when you're starting to think and worry and you're, oh, there's the hope that the future is going to make me happy in some way through a human being, some attainment, a possession, some recognition, whatever it may be, or security, ultimate security.

One day, I just want to feel secure. I want to feel secure. And they might even sell you life insurance and say, you will feel really secure just by this.

And you have a pension plan, and then I'll be okay. I just need a good pension plan. Life insurance, of course, means you have to die first before anything.

So it should be called death insurance. It's security. I'm looking for some sense of security.

And you look some security in external conditions. I want to have a place. Yes, it's a very human thing.

But you may need to live for a while to realize, no matter what situation you go into, no matter who you are with, and no matter what you achieve in life, always this sense of insecurity, of fear, of insufficiency, of some underlying sense of lack or something not quite right, always it resurfaces. Sooner or later, and usually sooner. And so if you thought, let's say you achieve everything that commonly in our civilization, the media and so on, or the magazines or internet, whatever, tell you that the highest you can achieve is wealth and fame.

And then you think, oh, if I only had all that, then I would be a happy human being. I would have security. And of course, many human beings who have achieved it, I have met quite a few, that was quite interesting, who in the eyes of the world had everything and they were unhappy.

In fact, some of them were more unhappy when they got everything than before when they still were striving to achieve those things. They were more unhappy because now, when you have already tasted everything, you no longer have some ideas. Once I achieve that, I'll be happy.

Well, you have everything. What can you achieve now? Okay, well, you could think enlightenment.

I've got the private jet. I've got all the money that I can do anything, but I'm still unhappy. Okay, if the unhappiness that arises there, if that brings you to the possibility of awakening, then that's a good thing.

Now, the thing we need to recognize is no matter what you achieve, there's nothing wrong with achievement. But ultimately, that is not which is going to give you this sense of self that you are looking for, that sense of being rooted, that sense of security. Everything in this world is insecure, ultimately.

No matter how secure your job may be, whatever, there's the radical insecurity. And uncertainty, nobody knows what the next moment will bring because it can only appear as this moment. What is the future then that everybody looks to?

It's always associated with a thinking. It's a thought. On a deeper level, future is a thought in your head and you only experience it ever as a thought in your head.

That's the only reality future has. Isn't that interesting? It has no actual immediate existential reality except as a thought that you're thinking about some future moment.

But even while you're thinking that thought, it's still the present moment and you don't even know it because nothing can happen that's not in the present moment. And then there's the past. When you think about the past, again, where is the past?

It's in your head. It's a thought in your head or a lot sequence of thoughts in your head.

[Speaker 8] (8:08:06 - 8:08:13)
So future and past are associated intrinsically linked with the activity of thinking.

[Speaker 1] (8:08:57 - 8:17:42)

Wisdom can only come if you access the dimension of no thought in yourself. The only thing a wise person has that you don't have, or that's the wrong way of putting it, the wise woman, the wise man has nothing that you don't have. He or she is simply aware of the dimension of stillness, the dimension of no thought, that's out of which all wisdom comes, which is also in you.

So bringing that into everyday life through being aware of the inner energy field of the body, being alert to sense perceptions, another way of entering the state of alert thoughtless presence. Look around the room a few times a day where you're sitting as if you had just been born into that room. It requires a high degree of alertness.

Yes, but that is in you. So periodically, even if it's only five seconds at a time, you bring in thoughtlessness, not in its usual... Thoughtlessness usually is a negative term, but here thoughtlessness implies more consciousness, more intense awakeness, to awaken.

Ah, and then you realize the compulsion to think is just a habit, deep seated habit. And you don't listen to the mind when the mind says, I have no time to be present now, not even 10 seconds. Not true.

You're waiting at the elevator, the lift, press the button. Are you projecting yourself mentally to where you want to get, or are you really there? Are you immersed in thought, or are you using that opportunity to simply be present with your entire being standing there, not waiting for anything?

Because most people spend maybe 70% of their lives waiting for something. There's always the next thing to do that hasn't quite been finished yet. There's always the next thing to happen that I'm just waiting for this.

Why not use all waiting periods for being present? And then you step into the elevator and you press ground floor, and it's going down. And there is an aliveness in your entire energy field, and it's beautiful.

That moment has a fullness to it that is more than the externals that you perceive, because after all, there's only four walls around you, and a light above you, and some buttons. So on the external level, this moment has nothing to fulfill me. But if you go deeper into that moment, which is into yourself, it's actually very fulfilling.

But you have to step out of that which takes you out of the moment. Learning what it means to be present and alert. And then perhaps you arrive at the ground floor, and you forget and you go about your business.

And 10 minutes later, you're in your car, the traffic lights stopping, thinking, come on. And suddenly you remember, oh, the now, this is the now. And then again, you look at the red light, and the red has an intensity to it that's quite beautiful.

That before to notice that, you would have had to take acid. Because taking acid, I'm not recommending this, but for some people, it can give them a first glimpse of what it means not to be burdened by continuous mental commentaries. But it doesn't really raise your consciousness.

It simply amplifies sense perceptions. And the red of the traffic light, don't do it. The red of the traffic light becomes so intense, you haven't got, you can't think about it anymore.

It just is overwhelming. So it gives you a little, it only, I took it once just to try it out, because people told me, people told me, this is like acid, isn't it? And I always had to say, I don't know, I haven't taken it.

And finally, I said, okay, I need to be able to answer these people. So I'm going to try it once. And so what I've experienced was the amplification, everything was vibrating.

There was intensity of smell, hearing, the visual, tasting, everything was amplified. Nothing special that I experienced otherwise. But some people say, wow, the world can be so alive.

It always is. You just don't know it because of the screen of your thinking. So here, this is much better than acid.

But it's a, there's a slight similarity, yes. But here you'd notice it because you become more awake. There's the traffic light.

And here I am. And you feel the energy field in your body as you sit there. And you become aware of the movement of people.

And you just look. The movement of cars, you just look. Oh, it's not that bad.

Before you were complaining about that moment. What's this? Why am I sitting in this?

I should be there, but I'm here. Yes. Can you argue with that?

Well, you can, but it's mad. So you accept the is-ness of that moment and enter that moment more fully. So nobody can tell me that they cannot bring that into their everyday life.

Not continuously, yet it's not required. It is more important how often you become, you awaken out of thinking than it is how long you remain in the state of not thinking. That looks after itself.

Yes, after a while, that will be longer. More important, how often you step out of thinking, becoming alert. There's an intelligence there that wasn't there before.

And it doesn't need to call the world. You know what you're looking at without concepts. You look deeply.

You also sense a certain aliveness in whatever you look at, which is no different from the aliveness that is in you. Everything has being-ness to it. Everything has presence to it.

Even so-called inanimate objects have a beautiful presence when you are not thinking about them, just looking. So I'm not telling you now you must live in that state of consciousness. Just occasionally bring it in.

Enter it. Five seconds is fine. Two seconds.

See the change in relationships as you are able to face another human being without the compulsive judgments and labels of the mind.

[Speaker 7] (8:17:52 - 8:18:38)
First off, I want to say thank you. And just like the lady said earlier, the power of now changed my life. I listened to the book about a year and a half before I got out of the army.

And I just returned from Afghanistan and I experienced acute combat stress. And so just to give you the context of my question, I've created a lot of karma in this life. I'm studying all the teachers, spiritual teachers, and obviously being here now.

My question is, no matter how much karma you create in this life, the life we're all living right now, is liberation possible? Well, that's the question.

[Speaker 1] (8:18:38 - 8:22:50)
Okay, thank you. Thank you. Some people believe they are not right.

Even some teachings would tell you that liberation is achieved by gradually improving your karma. So it's a kind of progression of gradually you get better and you get better lifetimes and better karma and so on. But that's not really how it works.

Because even to have a very good karma is not liberation. You're not free of the conditioning of your mind. At any point within the wheel of karma, it's possible to jump off the wheel of karma.

And it is precisely at the worst times that the opportunities are greatest. So if there is intense suffering in your life, those are times when the opportunity to transcend karma and to step off the wheel, so to speak, is greatest. So you don't need to be concerned about that.

But what you have suffered actually can become an extremely helpful thing in your life because it's the great awakener. Suffering that others inflict on you, suffering that you inflict on others because you are part of this huge, massive accumulation of unconsciousness that is when you're going to a war situation. You are part of a massive accumulation of collective unconsciousness.

And there, of course, you get drawn into that collective karma. You participate in it, become part of it, and then you come out of it. Then your egoic self is at a state of perhaps greater readiness than ever to crack open, and this has brought you here.

So there have been people in prison for many years in prison because they murdered people or whatever. And I regularly receive correspondence from people in prison who have disidentified from the egoic self and their entire life history as if they're emerging out of like a butterfly, the caterpillar becoming transformed into a butterfly. So the important thing for you is not to misinterpret in your mind what has happened in your past and to make it into something that some form of guilt identity could build up.

And this could just become a very heavy mind form, and that would be the obstacle, not what has happened. You were part of this massive unconsciousness, and already you are coming out of it. You responded to the power of now, which means you were already ready.

At what point in your life did that happen? Was that where you at that time before you went to Afghanistan or in the middle or after?

[Speaker 7] (8:22:51 - 8:23:10)
Well, it was after redeploying over and over again, and then I got injured, and then I went back and had anger aggression. Yes. And then by chance, I started meditating and doing yoga, and then I found...

[Speaker 1] (8:23:10 - 8:25:14)
Okay, well, it wasn't by chance. So you are on an accelerated path of awakening.

That's because you were in that situation can be described as an accelerated path of awakening, and it brought you to that point of readiness.

And the awakening process has already begun in you quite clearly. The only obstacle would be your mind misinterpreting your past. So if you don't realize that you are on an accelerated path of awakening, and if you realize it, you will have gratitude for what happened in the past.

So thank you for giving me this accelerated awakening experience, and then you will no longer misinterpret, because when you came here, I could see the beginnings of a misinterpretation of the past. This is not something that has anything to do with your true identity. So be grateful and allow presence to emerge in you, through you, more fully now.

And the universe gave that to you because it saw that you needed it, and it wanted you to awaken quickly. Otherwise, you would have had a more comfortable, a much more prolonged path. So thank you.

I wish you well. You're on your way.

[Speaker 6] (8:25:15 - 8:25:16)
Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (8:26:32 - 8:37:22)
Sometimes, there's awareness there, and there's the pain body there, and you've chosen awareness. Not that the pain body goes away, but then you get to almost like witness your pain body. So you're not in a reaction mode.

You can feel the energy of the pain body, but you witness it. Maybe some words may come out, and you witness that, and you might go, oh my goodness, why did I say that? But you remain present in that awareness, because sometimes this pain body has something to teach us.

So don't be in a hurry, into a rush to think that, and desire that you have no more pain body. Because to tell you the truth, without this pain body, I would not be sitting up here today. And same with Eckhart, without that pain body that he experienced, he would not be here today teaching.

Now, it seldom happens with people to be free of the pain body and free of the ego, virtually overnight, like it happened with Eckhart. And if some of you are wanting that, but I want that, I want it gone. And I want it gone now, and never to come back.

You are in your mind. That is a thought. It can be gone right now, if you choose the present moment.

And choose the unconditioned self. Could be gone right now. And only the mind will come in, and bring in time, and start thinking, oh, but will it be gone forever?

This moment is forever. There's only ever this moment. Time, and it's useful, is a concept.

And we all agree what time it is. What time it is here in Greece. What time it is in Germany.

What time it is in Canada. Those are all agreements that we have made. And we forget that it is just a concept.

There is no time. But this time as a concept is useful, because it gets us, say, for example, here. Otherwise, if we didn't have this concept of time, it may take us a million years for all of us to get here, and be with each other.

So it just, it's useful. Concepts are useful. But we forget that it's just a concept.

Just as we say, we are in Greece. Yes, that's a concept. We are in Greece.

But does Greece really exist? Does Canada exist? Does the USA exist?

No, it's just a concept. And yet we believe in this concept, that we are willing to fight for that concept. We are willing to kill to keep that concept alive.

And yet it doesn't exist. So if no time exists, your name doesn't even exist. Your gender doesn't even exist.

The countries don't exist. What is there? Look within.

It's that sense of Self. The Self with a capital S. That stillness.

The essence of who we are. The nothingness. The Tao that cannot be named.

Your God essence. Consciousness. Your Buddha nature.

So all these are names that point to the formless dimension. I've had many people experience that formless dimension. And then they'll experience a thought.

Now what? What's next? It's that momentum of the mind that will keep going and keep alive.

Keep itself alive for a while. And not that the mind, we don't know, it's not that the mind, we want it to go away. We just don't want that mind to be controlling us with those thoughts.

And they're habitual thoughts. But it's that nothingness, that no-thingness, to be comfortable with that emptiness. So I like the Buddha's teaching where it, you couldn't really hang on to anything.

How can you hang on to emptiness? It's formless. To be comfortable with that.

At first, when that formless dimension arises in you and you're aware of it, it feels a little bit like getting into an elevator. And you're alone and it's okay being alone. And then somebody enters and then it's that awkward feeling.

So become comfortable with the unknown. No thought is it. No emotion is it.

No experience that you have is it. I used to travel to India quite a bit to go meditate in the caves and visit spiritual teachers in India. And I remember being in this temple and suddenly I was just, had this magnificent experience.

Oh my gosh. I saw the sky open up and I saw angels. And I heard music where I don't even know where it was coming from, but it wasn't coming from the earthly realm.

And it was just like, oh my God, wow, this is incredible. It's like, I saw God. And that evening I went to go visit a spiritual teacher and I told him of my experience.

And he says to me, that's not it. I go, no, no, no, no, no. You didn't hear it.

Or maybe you didn't hear me. I saw angels. I saw God.

I heard music. The sky opened up. That's not it.

And this went back and forth, me repeating myself, really believing that I saw angels. I saw God, etc. And him just saying, that's not it.

And his wife who was there said, I'm going to bed. And so I don't know, maybe 20 minutes went by going back and forth. Just, he would just repeat the same thing.

That's not it. That's not it. And me really determined to think, no, no, no, no.

I experienced it. I saw it. That's not it.

And then suddenly, after his, the last time of saying, that's not it, I understood. I didn't have to repeat anymore. That's why it was the last time.

I went, oh my God, you're right. No experience is it. We've all perhaps had that wonderful, profound meditation where you're sitting there and you're just like, wow, you finish the meditation and you go, oh my God, that was great.

Wow. That was incredible. And then the next day you come to sit in your sitting meditation and hidden behind in the background in your mind is that you want the same experience.

And you're just sitting there trying to get that same experience. Of course, that experience will never happen again. And then you finish that meditation.

You go, damn it. Why didn't I have that same experience? You will never have the same experience.

If you want the same experience, you are holding onto the past. And you will never experience this moment again, which may or may not be more profound than the last experience.

[Speaker 1] (8:37:49 - 9:49:39)
So thinking is a wonderful thing if you are not possessed by it. If you're able to use thinking, it's a beautiful, amazing tool for creation. But if thinking becomes a basis for your sense of identity, in other words, a narrative in your mind of who you are, the story of me, then thinking becomes a kind of prison.

Or to use a different analogy, thinking becomes then almost like something that possesses you and you don't even know it. And when you make the statement, I think, I am thinking, it's not quite accurate. It would be more accurate to say, thinking is happening to me.

If you can't stop it, that means it must be happening to you. If you don't even want to stop it, it must be because you are almost addicted to it. You think you would die without it.

So if you can't stop thinking, then you are not thinking. Thinking is happening to you. Or you could say you are being thought.

You are not thinking. Oh, by the way, while I speak to you, and many of you know this, but it's easy to forget, too, since this is a kind of meditation session, although not a conventional one, while I'm speaking to you, be aware of the silent gaps between sentences, between words. Be aware, notice them, be aware of them, because the meditation part of our session together here is in the silent gaps.

The rest is just the words that point us towards the silent gaps, that point us towards stillness. When you become aware of the silent gaps while I speak, breathe, like now. And now, and now, while you notice the silent gaps, acknowledge them, you may also notice that you are not thinking while you notice the gaps, and that's meditation.

In that way, I can talk you into the meditative state, but you have to be aware that our session has two dimensions, the words and the space. The space is the silent gaps. And not only the silent gaps, it's also an underlying silence, or stillness would be a better word.

So you notice those gaps, that's meditation, and in the moment of noticing, you're not thinking. And as you practice here, when you go into your daily, back into your daily life, you may notice silent gaps within yourself, between two thoughts, the space of no thought between two thoughts. Don't need to measure it in time, who knows, three seconds, four.

So you have now, you have then access to a deeper or higher, depending how you want to use the word, dimension of consciousness. And when you notice the gaps between two thoughts in yourself, in daily life, then they deepen, or you become more aware of them, and they get a little longer. Another word for the gaps between thoughts is stillness.

To realize that behind all thoughts, there is a realm of stillness. And you become aware of it when one thought comes to an end, and the other one hasn't started yet, suddenly you become aware of what is beyond thought, consciousness. And then you begin to embody that dimension in your daily life.

And then you become a two-dimensional being, you're a person, and you are an expression of consciousness, which transcends the person. It's the consciousness of the universe, of which you are in your personal self, a temporary expression. You are the universe being conscious in you.

You are the consciousness of the universe. That's a very significant thing. It doesn't matter what you have achieved or not achieved as a person, more fundamentally, you are the consciousness of the universe.

You are a focal point of that consciousness. Of course, the consciousness of the universe pervades all space, but you are a focal point of that consciousness, appearing temporarily under the guise of a person. Not for too long, when the person evaporates, like a soap bubble, it goes pop.

Many people have a problem with self-esteem, with thoughts arising that say, I'm not good enough. I'm not as good as those people or that person. I'm not as good looking, not as physically strong, not as knowledgeable, not as intelligent, not as popular.

But when you, of course, you could work on self-esteem on the level of the person with limited success, some success, yes. You can repeat affirmations. I am good enough.

I am good at everything I do. I'm getting better and better every day in every way. I'm getting better and better.

No doubt that is, that was one of the first affirmations that somebody came up with a long time ago when books started to appear about positive things. Thinking, yes, it is a positive statement. Every day in every way, I am getting better and better.

But who is that I am? The person, not the person. Yes, things can get better.

And then they get worse. And then they get better again. And then something else happens.

So the person exists within the polarities of gain and loss, good and bad, up and down. That's inevitable. There's nobody who can continuously be successful.

The life will put obstacles in your path of different kinds. That's how it is. So you can get better up to a point, but not continuously.

There are polarities, but there's a deeper dimension in you that exists beyond the polarities of good and bad, gain and loss. This dimension is not dependent on the polarities, good and bad, gain and loss. That's a transcendent dimension.

And then you're in touch with something which we could call, if we wanted to use a terminology used by the ancient Greek philosophers, such as Socrates, the good. The good is the ultimate. Sometimes the good, as they use this term, means perhaps something like God.

It just happens to be that the English language good and God are very similar. Words, perhaps that's no coincidence, but that's only in English. Well, in some Germanic languages too.

So you feel there is a good deep down, a something. It's not something. Let's just call it something.

Language always refers to things. Something that is beyond the polarities, that there's a good that's also even there, even when you're experiencing great loss. And sometimes, particularly in those times, when you experience great loss, you feel that which is beyond the polarities of good and bad.

There's a deep peace. It's nothing to do with a person. It transcends the person.

But when there's no cessation in the continuous stream of thinking, then you're unaware of that dimension. People don't realize how much of a burden they carry through overthinking, excessive thinking, purposeless. How many people are making themselves unhappy continuously through unconscious mind activity, judgments, interpretations, negative interpretations of themselves, of other people, of situations.

That's habitual thought patterns that you're identified with and that is karma creates in the external confirmation that it is correct. So if you think the world is full of evil people, you will meet many evil people. Now, of course, everybody is born into a certain external environment and also is born with certain predispositions.

They may be partly genetic. They may be other things that a person is born with certain patterns. In other words, we don't need to examine where they come from, but just to see the fact that the human being is first of all born into a certain environment, which may be violent or it may be relatively peaceful and the person is born with inner patterns.

You inherit certain, even pain bodies, partly inherited. Some babies cry a lot. They have a relatively heavy pain body already in this world.

It doesn't mean they're spiritually less advanced. The opposite may be the case, which there's no knowing. Other babies are relatively peaceful and so there's a whole set of conditioning that happens.

You come into the environment with certain predispositions. Then the environment conditions you further and in all that, there's no choice involved. There's just influences.

And so you find yourself in this world with certain unconscious patterns that have become the conditioning of who the person is, the unconscious conditioning. So karma, as I see it, is the unconscious conditioning that runs your life and that still applies to many humans. And karma is partly collective.

You've been born into it and partly personal. They come together. So really, you can only understand karma not as an abstract subject external to yourself because then you get into belief systems and philosophy.

We're not going that way. You can only understand karma by observing yourself and by observing, and then you'll know many other things. But you need to, really, if you want to understand karma, you need to look at yourself.

And so I began to understand what karma is when there was something arose that was not part of karma at all. And really, here we come to the key. The arising of consciousness or presence or spiritual awakening is not part of karma.

It is another dimension that breaks into the karmic realm. So you do not become awakened by accumulating, as they sometimes say in the East, good karma. That's fine on this level.

You can make the walls or the furniture in your prison a little bit more comfortable. But there is something totally from beyond karma that can come into your life at any point within the wheel of karma and rebirth. Rebirth is, of course, part of karma.

The deeper meaning of rebirth is identification with form. We don't need to even believe in transmigration or whatever. You can look at rebirth in your own life.

Every time you identify with a thought that arises, which is form, you are born into that thought. Because identify, your sense of self is in it. That's karma.

You are reborn. Karma then is unconscious identification with these patterns that you have inherited, the conditioned. Complete identification of consciousness with the conditioned patterns.

So consciousness is dreaming. One could say. This is why we use the word awakening in many spiritual traditions.

Consciousness is awakening. Consciousness is in a dreamlike state when you're identified with the unconscious patterns. And then you are condemned to rebirth.

In fact, many times every day, you are reborn into a reaction, an emotional, mental reaction. No presence at all. Just rebirth into some form.

Or you're reborn into thoughts that arise and you completely believe in every thought. And then you act from those thoughts and emotions. And the action creates further reactions.

And the actions confirm to you that you were right. If you have certain mind patterns about, for example, that other people are basically dishonest. Just one example of people.

People are so dishonest. They're all trying to get something from me. That tends to confirm itself in your life experience.

You can try it out. Or you may have experienced it before you became more conscious. That's habitual thought patterns that you're identified with.

And that is karma. Karma creates, in the external, confirmation that it is correct. So if you think the world is full of evil people, you will meet many evil people.

And in other words, unconscious people. And even people who are on the brink or who are halfway between conscious and unconscious, when you come together with them, your belief will pull them into unconsciousness. And that's karma.

So karma is the complete absence of conscious presence. And so it's automatic. It plays itself out.

And time does not free you of karma. That is a misperception that if you only spend enough time, eventually you can become free of karma. Karma renews itself and repeats itself.

It's a wheel. And so the only thing that can free you of karma is the arising of presence. And how is it that some person's presence arises?

I cannot tell you why. I only know that at any point in the wheel of karma, presence can come in. It can happen to a criminal in prison, condemned to death.

It can happen to somebody who has never heard of anything spiritual. It can happen to somebody who has been meditating for 30 years or not happen to the same person who has been meditating for 30 years. So in your own life, I can see from what you're saying that presence has already, I can sense that presence has already come into your life.

And presence frees you from karma, not all at once. Karma has an enormous momentum, meaning the patterns in yourself, the thought patterns, the emotional patterns, the reactive patterns. There's enormous momentum behind that.

But as presence arises, gradually karma diminishes and the energy behind it diminishes. And gradually you experience a fading out of those patterns. They become weaker.

You're no longer completely in the grip of those patterns. So as presence arises, there's a gradual fading out of karma. Not that it matters that much anymore because once you are present, you can, as a previous questioner said, when we were talking about certain thoughts still arising, certain negative thoughts, that's still part of the karma, the old patterns, the unconscious habit patterns inherited.

They still arise, but it's no longer problematic and they no longer cause the suffering they would have caused before because they are seen in the light of awareness. So the light of awareness arises and in the light of awareness, the patterns no longer dominate your life. They no longer run your life.

And if occasionally it happens that the patterns do take over, then after a little while, your presence returns and you say, ah, well, there it was again. Pain body is part of karma, which may be strong in some people, not so strong in others. And so as presence arises, you are freed from karma.

And then you have another completely different factor coming into your life. And so, for example, for a person to become free of collective karma, you need a considerable amount of presence for that to come in to remove and it then will remove you in one way or another, either internally, you find yourself completely free. You might still live in a violent society, but internally you would be free.

There is a possibility you can have a holy man or woman living surrounded by violence. It's possible. It's rare, but possible.

Or very often it happens that life removes you out of there and you find yourself somewhere else. So let's say vast collective karma, for example, in the case of, let's say, you have the Taliban there, you have all kinds of unconscious movements. You had Soviet communism, you had national socialism in Germany.

And for a person being born into that and not being drawn into that unconsciousness, requires considerable presence. So not that many people, for example, in Germany when Hitler came to power, not many people were able to remove themselves somewhere. Some artists, some writers, they left, they could see what was happening and they were strong enough not to be identified with the collective when there had been a tradition of obedience to authority for hundreds of years, a tradition of following your leader and so on.

To take yourself out of that collective karma requires considerable presence, but some people had it. So it is our destiny then to go beyond karma by being the receptacles for presence. All you can do to be helpful in this world and help others is those people that you come into contact with, everybody in this, who is awakening, will find that sooner or later they become a kind of teacher to others.

And what a spiritual teacher does, the teacher points out the possibility of awakening out of identification with unconscious patterns, which means the spiritual teacher teaches you to go beyond karma. And so that is your function and will become increasingly, you will find in your life, whether you become a formal teacher or an informal teacher, formal meaning that you say, okay, I'm giving a talk or somebody invites you and you give a talk, that becomes formal teaching. For many years before this, I became a formal teacher.

I mean, it's not my identity, it's just a functional thing. It would be terrible if I saw myself as a teacher. Any identity is an illusion, any form identity is an illusion.

But it's a functional thing. You can, I'm saying, you become a... For several years, the teaching happened informally on park benches at first, then in people's living rooms, then in little groups.

And so gradually it grows and some people will continue to teach informally. So people you come into contact with, some people are, more and more people are ready for spiritual awakening. Which means spiritual awakening and stepping out of karma is the same thing.

And so many people will be drawn to you. Anybody who is going through the awakening process is already a teacher. And the more you teach, teaching means you find yourself listening from spaciousness when somebody speaks or asks a question or tells you about their problems.

And then you may find yourself, an answer comes out of that stillness in which you listen. And that's the beginning of teaching. You don't have the sense that, okay, I'm going to teach this person now.

That's never it. You will find that teaching is spontaneous. So you will help people to step out of identification with unconsciousness, which means going beyond karma because it's already happening in your life.

And this applies to everybody who is awakening and going through the awakening process. What is the essence? Let's go there slowly.

What is the essence of who you are? What is the essence of the life that you are? I'm not saying that you should not try to improve the conditions of your life.

But more importantly is to realize that you do not have a life because people say my life. Now, if you look at the structure of that sentence, my life, there's a duality there. Because if you say my life, that implies that you have it, it's mine.

So it implies two duality. If you say my life, there's you and the life that you have. It belongs to me, it's mine.

So this thought, this language creates a duality in your mind. Call it my life. That's interesting.

So there's me and I have a life and then the fear comes in, if I have a life, I might lose it. And of course, then you visit the cemetery and you say, yes, they all once had a life and they lost it. They lost their life.

And that's going to happen to me too. Not realizing you are trapped in certain mental formations that create an illusory identity and create a duality. Actually create delusion.

You don't have a life because there is not a duality. Without life, there's no you. So you can't have it.

You are one with life. There isn't you and life. You are life.

You can't, you don't have it. Now, if you are it, you can't lose it. Because you are it.

But of course, we'll have to see more deeply what we mean when I say you are life. But let's for a moment stay with that. You are life.

You don't have a life. You are. So you can say it for yourself in your mind.

I don't have a life. I am life. This is the end of duality.

So you realize there's a oneness of you and life. And when I say life, we can use another word. The essence of being alive.

What is the essence? Let's go there slowly. What is the essence of who you are?

What is the essence of the life that you are? Okay, now, normal humans, which means unawakened humans, say, well, the essence of my life is my, whatever they identify with in there. It's my possessions, my, what I have, what I know, what I, my body, all those things that I identify with.

Let's see. The essence of who I am is whatever I derive my identity from. It could be the physical body, but, or it could be my car or my house or my work, my function in society.

Or it could be friends that I have, things that I have attained. It could also be, these things are all in the mind also. Because when you identify, let's say your sense of identity, which is, you compare yourself to others all the time.

This is you do when you're in your mind. You compare yourself to others. Let's say your body looks better than other people's body for a while, these two will pass.

But for a while, you can get in there and then you become, this is my body that also is a mental formation. So it's not so much you identify with the body, you identify the thought of my body. That's what you identify.

You don't identify with your Ferrari if you have one. It's the thought of my car, which is, makes you superior to others who only have a little car. Or your body makes you superior to others who have a puny and weak body.

So you can display for a few years, you display your body on the beach and feel good about yourself. And after a while, the day comes when you look in the mirror. What happened?

There's something wrong with the mirror. In the past, the mirrors that people made were so much better than the mirrors now. So for a while, you identify with this or that.

That is quite normal. And so when you ask, what is the essence of who you are? Most people would tell you, well, I am, this is who I am.

This is what my identity is derived from this, this, this, and this, and this bundle of things is who I am. It's not always positive because I was just talking about having a body that looks better than other people's body. You could have a body that looks worse than other people's body.

And so that serves too. You could either, either you look for something else that gives you an identity, like actually you're more intelligent than all these stupid beach bums. So you can say, look at these people, but you have so much more knowledge and intelligence and you can look down on them.

Or you can, or you can be more spiritual. So if you, I can't afford a Ferrari, I'm on my bicycle and you say, look at this materialistic person with Ferrari. So you can still, or if that doesn't work, you can see how, how unfairly treated by life you have been and how much more, so much more miserable you are than most, most people.

And you've really been a victim of, of circumstances. You've been a victim of your birth and of your, your parents did a dreadful job with you. Maybe if their parents had been more conscious, things could have worked out, but they weren't.

So, but that, that also gives you a strong conceptual identity. So if you can't have a positive one, the negative ones can be just as strong, if not stronger. You can have a huge victim identity.

It's a favorite thing. Sometimes in the collective, certain egoic things become fashionable for a while. Nowadays it's the victim identity for certain groups of people are very fashionable.

So people can feel, oh, yes, we are all being victimized by those people. And of course there's some truth in it in some cases, but that doesn't, but to derive an identity is a delusion. To, to, to, to derive a sense of identity from that is a huge delusion.

That is not who you are. That's all my life. That's all.

So if you are not all those things, so when I ask, who are you? If I ask that question, don't go, let's do this for a moment. Don't go into the past.

Can you, can you feel or sense who you are without reference to the past in you?

You don't even need to remember your name right now. What for?

You don't remember your email address or your phone number or what happened to you 10 years ago. Don't need to remember that. Can you still get a sense without reference to your personal history?

Can you get a sense of beingness or presence? There's no past in that at all. But what is that?

You can't really describe it. All you know is that you are. I am.

You can sense the underlying beingness or presence of you. But to really sense it, what needs to happen is that for a moment, the stream of thinking needs to subside. And it may be happening for many of you at this very moment.

The stream of thinking that is normal for most people, that never stops except when they fall asleep, the stream of thinking for a moment subsides. And when I asked you whether you can be, sense yourself without reference to your personal history, what I was really talking about, what I was really asking was, can you get a sense of your presence without thought? Ah, and there's enormous revelation here.

This question, who am I, does not have a real truthful answer on a conceptual level. It's not in thoughts or words. The true answer to who am I has no thought in it.

It is a sense of presence or beingness. And you can only sense that if it's only a moment. So the stream of thinking subsides, and what happened is you are completely present without your mind saying anything.

You can perceive everything. You can still, you can see, you can hear, you're fully there, and your mind is still. Still does not mean that you've gone to sleep.

It's the opposite. You're actually more alert in that stillness than you would be if you were identified with this continuous stream of thinking. That's the stillness, the inherent stillness, that actually every human has that.

You don't need to work hard to attain stillness or think that if I follow the right course of action, it might take me 10 years, and then I'll be able to have a still mind. No, it's already there. And if you're not totally miserable and unhappy every moment of your life, that means without perhaps you knowing it, anybody who is not extremely miserable all the time has a little bit of access, without even knowing it, to that stillness within.

They don't know it. All they know is from time to time they feel a little bit good. They feel, ah, they don't know.

For three seconds, they stopped thinking. Ah, they might have some other explanation of why in that moment they felt good. Maybe they were looking at a dog.

And in that moment, because the dog wasn't thinking anything about them, because the dog doesn't think, the dog is conscious but not conceptual thinking, the dog does not have an opinion about you. And so when you were petting the dog, for perhaps you suddenly felt good about petting the dog. Why?

Because for a moment, the dog freed you of the judgmental, conceptual mind that otherwise would be very active if you were petting a human. It would say something. Of course, you can't do that because people would think you're insane.

You can't go up to a human, may I pet you? That would be nice if they did that to each other, but the humans have judgments about you. So whenever you go to a human, you know that he has certain thoughts about you.

So the other human cannot free you from your thoughts. But the dog or the cat can, for a short moment, free you from your thoughts. And in that moment, it feels good.

That's why people love their pets so deeply. There's a reason, a deeper reason why they love because the pet frees them a little bit from their minds. And there are moments when you interact with your animal that you can hear in brief moments of thoughtless awareness.

Two seconds, three seconds, but it's enough to keep you going. It's enough so that your life doesn't become totally miserable. And then you might have other moments.

You might have moments when you engage in some physical activity, you swim or you climb a mountain. And then there are moments that your total presence is required by the activity so that there's not enough left for thinking. And again, you feel intensely alive.

Oh, that was so good. Why was it so good? I love it.

It's just so good. I don't know why it's good. Well, it's good because it freed you for a moment from the incessant stream of thinking.

And there was some degree of awareness or presence arising, but you didn't even know that. All the things that you identify with as yourself, whether it's your possessions, your relationships or the things you have achieved or the things you failed to achieve, your successes and failures, what other people think of you, they're all thought forms. They're all thought forms in your mind.

And then these thought forms in your mind, they come together, they congregate in a bundle. And then this bundle of recurring thoughts become the place where you derive your sense of self from. It's a story-based entity, the me, me and my story, me and this story is called my life.

Not my life. People think about my life is, I have to think about my life. I need to work out my life.

But my life is actually a mental construct, me and my life. It consists of your past and the memories and the things, the ways in which you interpret your memories, because the things that you think happen to you, that may already be a falsification. You know that when you ask siblings, ask one sibling what the parents did 20 years ago and ask the other sibling, no, this is not what happened at all.

They experienced something, their memory is totally different of the same event. So there's the egoic entity, the me, consisting of thought. And this little me, the person, the historical person, is never at ease for very long.

And many egos live in an almost permanent state of underlying discontent. They don't even know it because it's so permanent. The same way that you don't know the noise of a refrigerator, the humming when you're in the kitchen.

And suddenly it stops and you go, oh, wow. And you had no idea that the noise was going on all the time. So for many people, their state of consciousness is this underlying discontent or unhappiness is there except for brief moments when they step out of thought.

But usually because they're falling below thought, they're not rising above thought, they're falling below thought. So you need a few more drinks in order, at least now I can be a little bit happy. Of course, it doesn't work all the time.

In fact, some people, when they drink, they become even more unhappy and violent. So it doesn't necessarily free you. So you have the, your sense of self is derived from this thinking in your head, which is maybe predominantly personal for, but in, there are also collective aspects to it where you derive your sense of self from.

And in some cultures, more traditional cultures, a person's sense of self is predominantly a collective one, which means there are collective thought forms that this person identifies with. They have been taught at school and through their family background. And this may be an idea, a political ideology, or it may be a religious ideology that you totally identify with.

And it has you in its grip. You don't know it. You don't know that you are in the grip of certain deeply lodged thought forms and through the screen of those thought forms, you look at the world and then you interpret it through that and you react and you take, you act through that screen.

So you are a, you inhabit a conceptual reality cut off from the deeper levels of your being. Terrible, terrible. But that is a transitional stage for humans.

The awakening is to realize that you had been trapped in those thought forms, which we call the ego. And suddenly you realize there's something else in me that is not thinking, but it's conscious. So I can think, and the universe is telling me to stop speaking for a moment and come back to where we started, which is, you remember I said, when you listen to the silence underneath and in between the words, what happens inside you and what happens inside you is you stop thinking.

You cannot notice the silence, even just notice it like now. In the moment of noticing, you are conscious, but not thinking. Wow, that's an amazing discovery that you are able to be conscious without thinking.

Now, how long that can be sustained in you is another question. But first of all, don't ask, okay, don't try to sustain it by applying willpower that doesn't work or stop breathing. Okay, and don't push your thoughts away that is not to be recommended.

You may be able to stop thinking by using willpower and saying, okay, I'm not going to think now. And you will have to stop breathing too. And you can hold it for a while.

But when the thinking comes back, it'll be as if you had taken a lit of a boiling kettle because you have some catching up to do. So, the most amazing discovery, and that is the awakening of consciousness. And let's see if we can go more deeply into that.

The most amazing discovery in yourself is that the arising of that dimension of consciousness where you are conscious, but you're not thinking. I call that rising above thinking, as opposed to falling below thinking. We talked about that already.

Both free you from this problematic level where humans have lived for thousands of years. That is the conceptual thinking mind. Now, we had to go through that, the conceptual thinking mind is a wonderful, wonderful thing.

Where it becomes a burden and a huge source of suffering is when it becomes the source of your identity. Then when you look to thought for your sense of self, and that is a very unsatisfying place to look for yourself. Because that is what the ego does.

And if you look for yourself on the level of thought, you will never be satisfied for very long. You'll always come back to the state of dissatisfaction where you say, okay, that wasn't it. I thought that would free me.

I thought that would make me happy. I thought that person looked so ideal until we started living together. It didn't work.

They were supposed to make me happy. That was a deal. We even signed a paper.

And then you get really angry. You can get angry at that person because you didn't fulfill your side of the bargain. You can become angry at God.

Why don't you say, this is the right person. I want to, I demand a partner that makes me happy. And so you look for the other thing.

And maybe you look for happiness in an acquisition of something. A bigger house or a bigger car might give me a more satisfying sense of self. But this house or that car, when you get it, it's not really the house or the car that gives you temporarily a more inflated sense of self because you only can experience the house and the car as a thought form, as my house and my car.

So you're looking to the enhancement of your sense of self, not really through the car or the house, but it's because you only experience the car or the house as this thought form. This is my car and this is my house. Have you seen it?

It's mine, look. Now that temporarily enhances your sense of self, but that also is based on thought because these things are thought forms. Welcome to our live meditation.

Last month we had our live meditation from Amsterdam. I was still on a Europe tour and we used a webcam rather than a bigger camera as we used to do. And then I realized and many of you realized that our meditation or teaching, whatever it is, actually works better with a little webcam than it does with a bigger camera.

It may have something to do with the fact that I'm very close to this little webcam and there is a deeper sense of connectedness. So we can share this state of consciousness, presence, and we're using the medium, the technology. How it works, I don't know, but there's a transmission of presence and that's why we're here to enter that shared state of consciousness, the dimension of inner space, stillness, presence, whatever you want to call it.

And while we are in that shared space, inner space ultimately, who you are as a person is of little or no importance. Who I am as a person is of no importance, at least while we're here. And then hopefully that will have some effect on the rest of your life when you go about your business so that the me, the person, loses its overriding importance in your life.

It's still there, but it's no longer what dominates your life. So it's really transcending the person and being here together can give you an intensified experience of the shift from being primarily a person to being primarily a presence. I don't speak to you as a person.

My mind is used as a tool through which presence speaks. That's why I have a little book called Stillness Speaks. Seems almost paradoxical.

This entire teaching, if you even want to call it that, does not come from a person. It only happens because the person got out of the way, became transparent, subsided, and so something deeper was able to come through into this dimension.

That's your destiny and purpose also.

So to be the presence consciously, to experience yourself as that underlying presence is liberating. It frees you from the density of being only that person, knowing yourself only as that personal self, being a self in the Buddhist sense, which is ultimately a delusion, deluded. What emerges is, in Buddhist terms, we might say the no self, which is not something.

It's not an object. It has no form. Or in Hindu terms, the transcendent self emerges, the formless self, not the me anymore.

And it's timeless. There's no past and future to it. And so this is recognizing yourself as essentially timeless, timeless awareness.

[Speaker 8] (9:49:53 - 9:49:58)
So when you look at me, you're not looking at a person. You're looking at yourself.
[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 43:01)
But you're connecting with yourself. So the depth of who you are is reflected back to you. That's all.

When you go back into your daily life, there may be times when the person reasserts itself completely. So you lose yourself again in the person. And then you wake up again.

And some presence comes back. There may also be times when you are primarily the presence. That's wonderful as that happens more and more in your life.

With that comes an openness, a non-judgment. The judgmental mind subsides. And a real sense of connectedness or rather oneness with other beings, human beings, other life forms.

And so that means the way in which you experience your so-called life, the way in which you experience the world, people, situations, events, that changes. The reactive person, the reactive me is no longer running the show. And where before there was a reactive, judgmental person, there's now a deep, benevolent presence.

When you go on the internet and read what people have to say about this or that, most of all that is the reactive person. And there are millions of people who are angry and upset and they can energize other people who are equally unconscious. And when you begin to notice in your daily life when things happened, things went wrong, people didn't do what they were supposed to do, which happens a lot, and you begin to notice where before there was an immediate reaction, an immediate complaint, an immediate judgment.

And now when something happens like that, there's a non-reaction, there's just an aware space, that in that space, here's the situation, there's the person, and that's what is. And that's wonderfully liberating when you don't need to react all the time. You can see how very unconscious people love their reactivity.

You can't take it away from them. They have to arrive at a point where they realize that they are causing themselves and others suffering. Until a human being arrives at that point, they don't want to let go of their reactivity.

The ego loves it. So you have to see how it makes your life difficult. You have to experience the suffering that it creates to a sufficient degree so that you reach that point of readiness, because this is really seeing that 90% of the suffering in your life is created by the conditioned mind, by your mind.

And it's good to arrive at a point where you say, I can't stand it anymore, I can't take this anymore. But at that point, some people still think that what they can't take anymore is to do with whatever happens around them. But really, it's to do with their mind.

Now, when we go deeply into the present moment, which is the same as being still, when you're still, you're very present. You can sense within yourself this essential presence right now, which you cannot define or analyze. It can only be sensed directly It has no form, every thought has a form.

It's a thought form, an energy formation. It arises and it subsides. So everything has form, except the presence, without which you wouldn't even be able to be aware of any form, the light of presence.

It is formless, it has nothing to do with time. And there, when you sense that presence, that is the deeper self. That is a deeper sense of identity than anything in your personal history or your life situation, because all that is form.

But underlying that and pervading that is something much more vital. That is the presence of consciousness itself. And you can sense the presence with your entire being, with every cell of your body, right now, here and now.

Every cell of your body can partake of this sense of all pervasive presence in which you need no thinking to tell you who you are because beyond concepts, beyond thinking, you realize this is who essentially I am. Not some thought in my head that tells me who I am, good or bad. So sense the presence, that vital presence with your entire being.

Feel it in your legs, in your hands, in your entire body, but it's not the body. It's that which animates the body. It's the presence.

So here we have another word, another pointer. The presence is the stillness. The stillness is the presence.

The term stillness points to that reality in negative, one could say, in a negative way in the sense that to most people, stillness means lack of absence of noise. In this case, of course, it's the noise of thinking. Yes, it's the absence of the noise of thinking, but it's also a very powerful presence.

The Buddha called it emptiness, but it would be equally true to call it fullness, the fullness of life, the unconditioned life prior to form. Prior to the arising of form. Another term the Buddha used to point to it, he called it the unmanifested, the uncreated, the unborn.

And he said, you can be aware of that. Within yourself, it is already here. It requires a redirecting, one could say, of your attention.

In the unawakened state of consciousness, which is the normal state of consciousness or unconsciousness, your attention is continuously, or your consciousness is continuously absorbed by form. Thoughts and sense perceptions and emotions. And you go into the seductive power of every thought, of every emotion, of every sense perception.

And then suddenly you become aware of the silent space between two thoughts. Or you become aware of a sense perception without the interference of thinking. Then you have the sense perception.

Like right now, you may be looking at the screen and hearing the words. So you have visual and auditory perception. But if this is working for you right now, there is little or no thinking.

And you haven't disappeared. There is a presence. And if it's working for you right now, there is, you are aware in the background of your sense perceptions, so to speak, you are aware of a powerful sense of presence.

Now that is self-realization. That is spiritual awakening. That is enormously liberating because it liberates you from the prison of your conditioned mind, from being controlled, possessed by your conditioned mind and whatever energies the conditioned mind attracts to itself.

Without this, without this dimension operating in your life, you are to a greater or lesser degree insane. And this is why a large part of human history, when you look at it objectively, is a history of collective mental illness. And once you discover this deeper dimension and you sense and realize its intense aliveness, but at the same time, peace.

So not the peace of drowsiness or unconsciousness, but a vibrantly alive sense of peace. And once you realize that that dimension is there in you and how it frees you from the conditioning, which maybe not all at once, which may continue to operate in your life here and there, but you're able to step out of it and go beyond it. And a deeper intelligence can then operate in your life.

And that is the unconditioned intelligence, which can then operate through your conceptual mind also. It can use, it can move through it, but you're not identified then anymore with the conceptual mind because you're not looking for yourself in it. You don't need to identify with the thoughts.

You can use thoughts. You are no longer used by thought. In other words, you know who you are.

When you're used by thought, you don't know who you are. You mistake every thought for who you are. It takes you over.

The presence beyond thought, it's there. Why don't they teach that at school? It's here at this very moment.

That's the real meaning of the power of now. The power of now is the power of presence. And the presence is primordial intelligence.

In theistic language, which I don't use very much, it would be called God. Not the childish God of the angry or jealous man controlling entity somewhere. But in a deeper sense, it is the source of all life.

And that can then, it wants to, for some reason, express itself fully more and more in this dimension through you. You become a channel for it. And you bring something new into this world.

And above all, you bring peace, you bring creativity, joy, aliveness, whatever form that may take. Then you can become whatever you want to be. It is without loss of being, rooted in being.

And then you do whatever life wants you to do, always realizing being is primary. The present moment is primary. Presence is primary.

Everything else flows out of that or any doing or thinking is secondary. So this is being fully yourself. And being fully yourself also is relinquishing ultimately ideas about yourself.

The need to tell yourself who you are, good or bad. For many people, it's more bad than good. And this presence that you sense now, that you are now, can operate in your daily life when you do things and deal with things.

Just remember it's there, not once you remember it's there, you can sense it's there. So you are both the presence, the unconditioned, and you are also a person with his or her history and life situation. But allow the presence to shine through the person and then be the presence more than the person.

That's the most liberating thing that you can walk through life, being essentially a conscious presence. And secondary, yes, you're also a person. Be aware of the mental baggage.

If you're still from time to time, imposing mental baggage on a situation, be aware of the narrative that goes through your head referring to people or situations, or your so-called life. People have all kinds of judgements about my life. And when the moment people think my life, a heaviness descends upon them because, oh God, what is how, what's going to happen?

And what has happened? Ooh. So that they can look to the past, they can have regrets, a few pleasant memories, but it's all gone now anyway.

And then the future is so uncertain of my life. Where is it all going to go, my life? Of course, not realizing that on that level, my life is a mental construct because the absolute reality of what your life is is this moment is your life.

Your life is never not this moment. The rest is a mental construct. Now, it may well be that you cannot live entirely without mental constructs.

Of course, you will have mental constructs, but you do not need to be trapped in your mental constructs and you do not need to derive your entire sense of identity, your entire sense of who you are from the mental constructs in your mind. And that is a liberation. So your life is now, and this is why I believe it's in my first book, there's your life situation.

Normally what's called my life is my life situation. All the stuff that makes up my life and my life situation is I have to remember it. I have to think about it.

Otherwise there is no life situation. So my life situation is a mental construct in the head. That's okay.

I have memories. I can't get rid of that. Nor do I want to or need.

You don't need to get rid of it. But you recognize that there is my life situation, but there's also my life. Now, my life is now and my life situation exists in time and it exists in the head.

And on that left, that is the personality. That's where it lives. And that's fine.

It continues to live, but I don't need to be trapped in that anymore. And more and more you come, you step into the nowness of now and live your life fully now, instead of being prevented from living your life fully now by excessive identification with the narrative, excessive identification with your life situation in your head. And think, oh, how is it ever going to change?

What about this moment? I'm not interested in that. I want to get somewhere else.

Where? I want to get somewhere where my life situation is going to be better. What about now?

And so, and then if you really open yourself to now, you realize actually, and this is an incredible realization for people who think they have lots of problems, which is most people. You cannot have a problem at this moment. You cannot have a problem now.

Challenge, yes. You can be challenged by some situation. Now there could be a grizzly bear escaped from Grouse Mountain coming into here and suddenly attack me.

Now, that's not even a problem because a problem needs time. It's a challenge in this moment. I wouldn't say now I really have a problem.

It's a challenge. And so either nobody can predict how you respond to a challenge. I might either play dead, run away, or who knows, or make friends with it.

And coming to the present moment. And so, yes, there are situations in your life that you need to deal with, or you might have to wait some time before you can deal with them, or there's nothing you can do about them. That's all true.

But the magical question you can ask yourself many times in your life is, especially when you're burdened by problems, do I have a problem right now? You may be ill. Yes, you might feel a disability.

You might feel a weakness. You might feel dysfunction on a physical level. That's the fact of what is.

This does not become a problem until your mind gets in there and starts constructing a story around it. So you can, can you be in the present moment and go into it, what problem do I actually have now? Well, now, well, I mean, I have to, I have to, the moment you go to problems, you go into the future.

I have to, well, tomorrow I'm meeting that guy and I have to think about what I'm going to say to him and then my lawyer has to see him about my divorce. Not mine, but it's just an example. I'm joking, I'm joking.

I have to declare bankruptcy tomorrow. That's a huge problem. My whole, my company, not mine, by the way.

A huge problem. Yeah, I have to think about it. But do you have a problem at this moment?

What? Yeah, I have to think. This moment, well, no, I don't see it.

I don't, I don't see the bankruptcy anywhere. Why is that strange? Well, I see there's the lights and there's flower and there's, I can feel myself breathing.

So the bankruptcy is also a mental construct because in the moment I take action, when it comes tomorrow, which is not tomorrow, it'll be now, then I take action. I'd say this, I'd sign that paper, and then I do that, and then I do that, and then I look at my bank statement and it will say zero. And again, just looking at that is not a problem until your mind, and I'm not saying take no action.

Action may be necessary, but it's not a problem. It's only the desire of the egoic mind to create problems by dwelling unnecessary on situations that creates a problem. And the ego grows.

The more problems you have, the bigger the ego gets. Me, there are many human beings who consider themselves a problem to be solved. That's their identity.

And many people go to a therapist with that underlying assumption. There's nothing wrong with therapists. Therapists do great work if they are connected with a deeper level of God.

And they go to a therapist with the assumption that I am a problem that needs to be solved. That's my identity. But of course, when it really comes to the crunch, they resist it because they are so, that it derives their identity from their problem, so they don't want to let go because then who am I without that?

Oh, okay, better stay in my problems. So what problem do I have at this moment? None, never a problem.

You could have pain, yes, it's pain. Not to be underestimated, but it's not a problem. But most things that make people happy, it's not even pain.

It's not, it's in the head. It's the problem-making faculty in the head. In the present moment, problems cannot survive.

And then you actually become much more effective at taking action when you don't create problems.

[Speaker 2] (43:25 - 1:06:08)
I have this makeup artist that comes to make me pretty for the camera. And as she was putting makeup on me, she goes, so tell me all the secrets to happiness. And I'm like, wow, that's a big question.

I suppose if we just don't think about it, we're happy. And it's so true. I mean, in our lives, I mean, we have all these roles that we play, you know, where perhaps, you know, a wife, a father, you know, a mother, a husband, a daughter, doctor, lawyer, janitor, whatever it is, we have all these roles that we play in our everyday lives.

And it can consume us, literally consume the space that we are and fill up that space. And we believe heavily and identify with those roles. So we will do together a who am I meditation.

Who am I? Beyond the conceptual mind, beyond the roles that we play in life. And roles are okay, as long as we can kind of like know, really know that that is not who we are.

So deep within us, there is a presence, consciousness, the Tao that cannot be named, but yet we can directly experience and know thyself, not through the conceptual mind, but through awareness, being aware of itself. So this day and age, maybe even some of you might be thinking, oh my goodness, a 30 minute meditation well, it's now 20, but 20 minute meditation, that's just like too much. Maybe 10 minutes is good, five minutes is good.

And now they have these apps that will count down for you to do a five minute meditation so you can become present. It's almost like gone are the days where when we would sit down and meditate and you would sit for an hour to meditate. I don't even know if those exist anymore.

However, I'd like to bring back 19 minutes now of meditation. So let's sit comfortably, I know we had lunch and maybe you had a lot of lunch and your tummy's maybe full, but if you think that you may fall asleep, which often can happen during a meditation, perhaps sit away from the back so you're not leaning against your back of the chair. Whatever will be comfortable for you.

Make sure your feet are flat on the floor or if you're sitting cross-legged, that's fine too. But sitting up nice and tall, either your hands can be face down on your lap or palms facing up and close your eyes. Let's everyone take a deep breath and just let it go with the sigh, letting go of the morning.

And one more time. Ah. And just becoming aware of your breathing.

Becoming aware of form and your breath is form. Unseen, but definitely felt. And perhaps some thoughts arise.

If they rise, just let them arise, but let them go and return your attention to your breathing. Become aware of your body, feeling your sit bones on the chair, perhaps scanning your body from head to toe, noticing any tension, tightness, or maybe even pain, just simply observing it, feeling it. Letting go of the label.

And if emotions are there or they arise in you, just simply notice and feel. And relax your body, relaxing your forehead, relaxing your shoulders, your jaw, relax your entire body. And with the sense perceptions of your ears, just notice the sounds that arise.

And now become aware of your inner body, that feeling of aliveness within. If you don't know what that feels like, just draw your attention to your hands and ask yourself, how do I know I even have hands? And just simply feel.

So there's an awareness of the form dimension, the form of your breathing, the forms of emotions, thoughts, sounds, the body, the sensations in the body, and the inner body. All that we can say is the world of form in this moment. Now see if you can become aware of the formless dimension, the awareness that you are aware, awareness itself.

Ask yourself, who am I? And notice maybe that the thoughts may arise and your attention is in the mind, looking for yourself in the mind. Your brain is such a small fraction of the totality of who you are.

So simply be still, be aware that you are aware. The form dimension remains, but yet there is the essence of who you are, the presence. It's always forms that arise.

Keep your attention on the formless and the stillness in which all forms arise and dissolve, arise and dissolve. You are both those dimensions of form and formlessness. Become familiar, as Matthew Ricard said, we can say meditation, we can say contemplation, can say we become familiar with thyself, to know thyself beyond the conceptual mind, to know thyself as that spiritual dimension.

It's why we are here, why we are on this planet, to evolve and awaken, so we can be in this world, but not of this world, can dance in this world, play our roles, but then lay them back down when we're just here sitting together. Or at any time, you're at work, you play your role, but when you go home, you're no longer that teacher, or doctor, or lawyer, or janitor, but to see our true selves, non-conceptually, is that inner happiness, is that joy, that peace that passes all understanding. So you can sit here with your eyes closed, or you can gently open them, taking in the world of form again.

The world of form tells me it's zero minutes left, so I leave you here with yourself. Thank you.
